"His manner was animated and striking, sometimes impressive and dignified, always remarkable; and so powerful a voice I have rarely or never heard. . . The purport of his sermon was good; nothing fanatic . . nothing enthusiastic; and the Calvinism which it expressed was so qualified as to be harmless, . . . the manner that of a performer as great in his line as Kemble."—Letter to Mrs. Southey: Southey's Life and Correspondence

Let us quote the testimony of a witness even more distinguished than Rowland Hill himself:

"No man has ever drawn, since the days of the Saviour, such sublime images from Nature. here Mr Hill excels every other man! . . Whatever a misjudging world may say, such men as these will shine as the brightness of the firmament, and as the stars forever. May my soul, though at a humble distance, be admitted among them!"—Robert Hall.

Hillard, George Stillman, a grandson of General Stillman, b. Sept. 22, 1808, at Machias, Maine, entered the Boston Latin School, 1822, entered Harvard College in 1824, and graduated in 1828, admitted to the Suffolk County (Boston) Bar, 1833, and to the present time (1859) has been engaged in the practice of the law in Boston. Mr. Hillard was married in 1834 to Susan T., daughter of the late Judge Howe of Northampton. In 1845 he was elected to the Common Council, of which he was a member until July, 1847, and was for six months its president. He has been a representative to the State Legislature, and was elected to the Senate in 1850. As a legislator, Mr. Hillard soon evinced abilities which elicited the warm commendation of the late Daniel Webster, (see Webster's Works, v. 356,) whose estimate of intellectual character was seldom mistaken. The reader will find some interesting reminiscences of Mr. Hillard's early life in the Boston Book, 1850; and in Loring's Hundred Boston Orators.

Mr. Hillard has gained the reputation of being one of the most eloquent of American orators: as a writer, we have heard him classed, by no less an authority than the eminent publicist, Dr. Francis Lieber, among the very best which the country has yet produced. Mr. Hillard's publications are as follows:—1. Fourth of July Oration before the City Authorities of Boston, 1835. 2. Discourse before the Phi Beta Kappa Society, 1843. 3. Connection between Geography and History, 1846, 12mo. 4. Address before the Mercantile Library Association of Boston, 1850. 5. Address before the New York Pilgrim Society, 1851.

6. Eulogy on Daniel Webster, before the City Authorities of Boston, 1852. This truly eloquent oration will be found in A Memorial of Daniel Webster from the City of Boston, 1853, edit. by Mr. Hillard. This vol. must be owned by all who possess Little, Brown & Co.'s beautiful edit. of the Works of Webster. 7. Six Months in Italy, 1853, 2 vols. 12mo; 2d ed., 1854, 2 vols. 12mo; 5th ed., 1856, 16mo. This work has been commended in the highest terms. We give brief citations:

"The mass of information contained in these two volumes is immense, the criticisms novel, and, in our humble opinion, judicious; the writer's own thoughts and feelings beautifully expressed. . . . The only wonder is how he could manage in so short a time to see so much; for Mr. Hillard is one who sees not only with the outward eye, but with that inner mental vision which carries away with it and makes its own all that fixes its observation and acts upon its sensations. . . . Mr. Hillard is evidently a scholar, a man of taste and feeling, something, we should opine, of a poet, and unmistakably a gentleman."—Fraser's Magazine.

"Mr. Hillard's work is that of a scholar and a gentleman, a man of sense as well as of taste and feeling, and well prepared by his previous reading to appreciate his subject. He writes without egotism, personal or patriotic, he has no systems to support nor prejudices to defend; his views are always liberal and benevolent, and if not always, in our opinion, right, he is always candid. His style is pointed, and is full of happy expressions and striking images: occasionally it is to our taste a little too ambitious, and his illustrations, though ingenious, seem to us fanciful and far fetched; the anxiety (perhaps derived from his profession) to enforce a point leads now and then to exaggeration,—not indeed of fact, but of expression. These blemishes, however, are but slight: and our mention of them must be taken as a proof of the sincerity of our general praise."—Lon., Quar. Rev., April, 1858.

"Taking up the book casually, it fixed our attention at once: and it is long since we have read a volume of travels with so much pleasure."—Dublin Review. July, 1858.

The New York Albion thus closes its review:

"What a pleasant business it would be, this passing judgment on books, if we had many such authors to deal with! It was with listless attention that we took up the two volumes before us, notwithstanding that these Boston publishers have the knack of courting the eye by all the tickety nicties of typography. But let no man gainsay the truth of that homely proverb which peoples ocean with as good fish as ever came out of it, or rashly assert that Italy is an exhausted theme! Mr. Hillard has fairly carried us with him from his first page to his last; and we must honestly avow that no modern traveller, within the scope of our pen, has looked and listened so profitably to himself, and has recorded his impressions in a manner so acceptable to his readers."

8. A First-Class Reader; consisting of Extracts in Prose and Verse, with Biographical and Critical Notices of the Authors. For the use of Advanced Classes in Public and Private Schools, 1856, 8vo, pp. 504. This vol. contains 156 pieces, selected from the writings of 112 authors of note.

"The selections are so well made, and the brief biographical sketches so convenient, that the book deserves a circulation beyond the class for whom, ostensibly, it has been prepared. As a volume of 'elegant extracts,' we take pleasure in recommending it to the general reader; to the instructor we can safely endorse it, as a careful and judicious compilation, admirably adapted to the requirements of the higher schools."—(N. York) Criterion, April 5, 1856, 361.

Mr. Hillard has also prepared a Second, Third, and Fourth Class Reader, the whole forming a complete series for the use of grammar-schools. They are being generally used in most of the States of the Union.

This excellent edit. was pub. by Little, Brown & Co. of Boston, who have issued a new edit. of Spenser's Works in 1855, 5 vols. 18mo. Mr. Hillard's edit. was thus commended by the distinguished historian of Spanish Literature:

"There is no doubt you have published the best edition of Spenser yet known. But you have, I think, done more than this: you have, it seems to me published a positively good, useful, and agreeable edition of him; one that will cause him to be read and enjoyed by many classes of persons who would otherwise not have ventured to open his pages."—GEORGE TICKNOR: Letter to the Publishers.

11. Selections from the Writings of Walter Savage Landor, 1856, 12mo, pp. 301.

"If, through the vestibule this little book offers, I can persuade the public to pass into the stately structure of wisdom and beauty which Landor has reared, my purpose will have been accomplished."—Preface.

"In his admirably-written preface, Mr. Hillard has given so excellent an estimate of Landor's works that he has forestalled the office of the critic; and we could say nothing on the subject that he has not said in a better manner than we could hope to do."—(N. York) Criterion, January 12, 1856, 166.

Mr. Hillard was for some time editor of the American Jurist, and wrote a number of articles for its pages; and he has also been a contributor to the North American Review, the Christian Examiner, the New England Magazine, &c. To him also we are indebted for the Life of Captain John Smith, in Sparks's Library of American Biography, 1st Series, ii. 171–407. If to all these titles to honourable distinction Mr. Hillard's friends should claim for him the possession of poetical abilities of no ordinary rank, they would feel amply prepared to vindicate the justice of their pretensions. Among the most admired of his writings are the two noticed with just commendation in the following extract:

"George S. Hillard is one of the most polished writers of New England. His taste is fastidious, and he is a fine rhetorician. He excels in arrangement and condensation, and has an imaginative expression. Of his numerous articles in The North American Review, one of the most brilliant is on Prescott's Conquest of Mexico; but I think the happiest of his essays is that on the Mission of the Poet, read before the Phi Beta Kappa Society."—R. W. Griswold: The Intellectual History, Condition, and Prospects of the Country, prefixed to his Prose Writers of America.

"The exquisite and flowing sentences seem allied to music, and touch the outward sense, as well as stir the fancy and excite the reflective powers."

We have already quoted the testimonies of some eminent witnesses to the distinguished talents—in the maturity of their luxuriant foliage—of the subject of our notice. The early indications of these talents—the "promise of the spring"—were not unnoticed by one who first planted, and then stimulated to an abundant harvest, the priceless seeds of knowledge in many a youthful mind. We are adducing but one more to the many evidences of that sagacity which so pre-eminently characterized a late eminent jurist, by the citation of the following lines:

"To some among them (his law pupils) he was bound by the warmest ties of affection: and I cannot refrain from mentioning the love and pride with which he had for Charles Hillard, whom he rather looked upon as his children than as his pupils."—Wm. W. Story's Life of Judge Joseph Story, ii. 32.

Hillhouse, James, 1754–1832, a native of Montville, Connecticut, graduated at Yale College, 1773; treasurer of Yale College, 1782–1832; member U. S. House of Representatives, 1791–94; of the United States Senate, 1794–1810. Mr. Hillhouse filled several important public posts in his native State. He pub. a number of Speeches, &c. See Bacon's Sketch of the Life and Character of Hon. James Hillhouse, Life and Letters of Judge Joseph Story, i. 158.

Hillhouse, James A., 1789–1841, son of the preceding, was a native of New Haven, Connecticut; entered Yale College at fifteen years of age, and graduated with distinguished honours, in 1808. After the war of 1812 he engaged in commercial pursuits in the city of New York; visited Europe in 1819; was married in 1820 to Miss Cornelia Lawrence, of New York; and shortly afterwards removed to his country-seat of Sachem's Wood, near New Haven, where he resided, with the exception of annual visits to New York, during the remainder of his life. Upon taking his second degree at college, Mr. Hillhouse had gained great credit by his oration On the Education of a Poet; and in 1812 he produced a poem of remarkable excellence, entitled The Judgment, a Vision,—a description of the awful scenes of the Last Day. (Pub. N. York, 1812, 8vo.) This poem was rewarded, shortly after its first appearance, by the enthusiastic commendation of one of the most accomplished of English critics, who thus concludes his review:

"In short, such is the approach to excellence both in the conception and execution of this little poem, that I confess myself more than commonly gratified in the opportunity of doing (as it lies in my power towards making it) what is known on this side the Atlantic; especially as the praise to which it is justly entitled may, in all probability, lead its author to other and more extended efforts."—Dr. Drake: Evenings in Autumn, 1822. ii. 100–127.

Whilst in London, he pub. Percy's Masque, a Drama in Five Acts; the subject of which is "the successful attempt of one of the Percies, the son of Shakspeare's Hotspur, to recover his ancestral home." It was reprinted in New York, "with alterations," 1820, 12mo, pp. 156, and reviewed in the North American Review (xi. 384–393), by a fellow-poet, William C. Bryant. Referring the reader to this article, we will quote a few paragraphs:

"We are glad to meet with so respectable a production in this department of literature from the pen of a native writer: indeed, we are pleased to light upon any modern tragedy in the English language so well worthy of notice. . . . There is no powerful development of character, but the characters are consistent and well sustained. . . . We think that the author of Percy's Masque is to be congratulated on having escaped so well the florid and declamatory manner, with so many celebrated and seducing examples before him. We hope, however, that, should he continue to cultivate this department of the drama, he will be led to study a style still more idiomatic and easy, and, particularly (for here he has sinned most) with fewer capricious departures from the natural construction."

"Percy's Masque reproduces the features of an era more impressed with knightly character than any in the annals of England. Hillhouse moves in that atmosphere quite as gracefully as among the solemn and venerable traditions of the Hebrew faith. His dramatic and other pieces are the first instances in the country of artistic skill in the higher and more elaborate species of poetic writing."—H. T. Tuckerman's Sketch of American Literature.

In 1824 Mr. Hillhouse composed the sacred drama of Hadad, which was given to the world in the following year, New York, 8vo, pp. 208. This admirable piece was reviewed in the North American Review (xxii. 13–27) by F. W. P. Greenwood; by H. Ware, Jr., in the Christian Examiner, ii. 301; and by an unknown critic, in the United States Literary Gazette, ii. 96. See also article on Hillhouse's Dramas, Discourses, and other Poems, (1839, 2 vols. 16mo,) by J. G. Palfrey, in North American Review, l. 231–262, and Literature in the Nineteenth Century—America—in the London Athenæum, 1833, p. 9. The author of the article declares that "This is one of those works which the Americans do not or cannot appreciate. As a drama, it is throughout admirable, though the excessive interest of the supernatural veils rather than the brightness of the interior portions of the plot. . . . We trust he writes malgré discouragement and neglect, for the time will come when he will be sought for. Le bon temps for literature in America is not far off."

In 1839 Mr. Hillhouse pub. (in 2 vols. 16mo) a collective ed. of his writings, the title of which we have given above. The vols. contain—1. Percy's Masque. 2. Hadad. 3. Demetria, a domestic Italian tragedy, written in 1813, but never before printed. 4. The Judgment; a Poem. 5. Sachem's Wood; a Poem. 6. Phi Beta Kappa Discourse, 1826, at New Haven, On Some of the Considerations which should influence an Epic or a Tragic Writer in the Choice of an Era. 7. A Discourse before the Brooklyn Lyceum, in 1836, On the Relations of Literature to a Republican Government. 8. A Discourse at New Haven, 1834, in Commemoration of the Life and Services of General Lafayette. See the Review by J. G. Palfrey, noticed above; another review in the Boston Christian Examiner, xxvii. 285; articles (on the Poem of Judgment) in the Boston Christian Disciple, iii. 209; N. Haven Chris. M. Spec., iii. 466; an article in the N. Haven Chris. Quar. Spec., v. 238; New Englander, Nov. 1848, (by H. T. Tuckerman;) N. P. Willis's Poem before the Linonian Society of Yale College, 1841; Everest's Poets of Connecticut; notice of Hillhouse, from materials furnished by Bishop Kip, in Griswold's Poets and Poetry of America. The enthusiastic tribute of a fellow poet may appropriately conclude this notice of one of the most eminent of modern dramatic authors:

"Hillhouse, whose music, like his themes,
Lifts earth to heaven—whose poet dreams
Are pure and holy as the hymn
Echoed from harps of seraphim
By birds that drank at Zion's fountain,
Whose glory, peace, and hope were hers,
And is mantled upon her mountains
The dew of angel messengers."

Hitchcock, David, a shoemaker, b. 1773, at Bethlem, Litchfield county, Conn., pub. in 1806, at Boston, a vol. of Poetical Works, the chief poem of which—The Shade of Plato, or, A Defence of Religion, Morality, and Government—has been thought to possess considerable merit. See Duyckincks' Cyc. of Amer. Lit.; Autobiography prefixed to Hitchcock's Poetical Works.

Hitchcock, Edward, D.D., LL.D., an eminent geologist, b. at Deerfield, Mass., May 24, 1793, became principal of an academy in his native town in 1816, and retained this situation for three years, when he was ordained, and subsequently was pastor of the Congregational church at Conway, Mass.; Professor of Chemistry and Natural History in Amherst College, 1825; appointed to make a Geological Survey of Massachusetts in 1830, and again in 1837; President of Amherst College, and Professor of Natural Theology and Geology, 1844; Agricultural Commissioner for Massachusetts, to visit the Agricultural Schools of Europe, 1850. In 1854 Dr. Hitchcock was induced by increasing bodily infirmities to resign the Presidency of Amherst College; but he still retains (1858) the Chair of Natural Theology and Geology. He was succeeded in the presidency by the Rev. Dr. William A. Stearns. Among Dr. Hitchcock's early literary labours were the preparation of an almanac for four years, (1815-18,) and the composition of a Tragedy pub. in 1815, entitled The Downfall of Buonaparte. He has since then given to the world a number of works which have conferred upon him a distinguished reputation both in Europe and America. 1. Geology of the Connecticut Valley, 1823. 2. Hoadly, Benjamin, D.D., 1676–1761, a native of Westerham, Kent, admitted of Catherine Hall, Cambridge, 1691, of which he became Fellow and Tutor; Lecturer of St. Mildred, London, 1701; Rector of St. Peter-le-Poor, London, 1704; Rector of Streatham, Surrey, 1710; Bishop of Bangor, 1715; Bishop of Hereford, 1721; Bishop of Salisbury, 1723; Bishop of Winchester, 1734. Bishop Hoadly pub. a number of sermons and controversial tracts, political and theological, which were collected and pub. by his son, John Hoadly, Chancellor of the Diocese of Winchester, 1773, 3 vols. fol. He first attracted attention by a Letter to Mr. Fleetwood, occasioned by his late Essay on Miracles, 1702, 4to, which we have already noticed: see Fleetwood, William, D.D. This was followed by The Reasonableness of Conformity to the Church of England, 1703, 8vo, which he supported by some other tracts. He had here for his opponent the excellent Mr. Calamy, who represented the Dissenters of his way of thinking. See Calamy, Edmund. In 1707, 8vo, Hoadly pub. A Brief Defence of Episcopal Ordination:

"I like both the design and doctrine, as I do every design of reconciling religion with reason, or, where that may not be done, of bringing them as near together as possible."—Dr. Middleton.

In 1735, 8vo, he gave to the world A Plain Account of the Nature and End of the Lord's Supper; a Defence of the same, 1735, '48, 8vo. This elicited a number of answers, a list of which will be found in Dr. Horne's Cat. of the Queen's Library at Cambridge, and in Watt's Bibl. Brit. Those who have not time or disposition to read all these treatises can remember Mr. Bickersteth's hint that Warren and Law's responses

"Sufficiently show the nature of and answer Bishop Hoadly's work."—Christian Student.

But the most memorable warfare in which Hoadly was engaged was that known as the Bangorian Controversy. This was elicited by a sermon, preached before the king in 1717, on St. John xviii. 36:—"My kingdom is not of this world:"

"The manner in which he explained the text was, that the clergy had no pretensions to any temporal jurisdictions; but this was answered by Dr. Snape [Letter to the Bishops of Bangor, 1717, 8vo.] and, in the course of the debate, the argument insensibly changed from the rights of the clergy to that of princes, in the government of the church. Bishop Hoadly strenuously maintained that temporal princes had a right to govern in ecclesiastical politics. His most able opponent was the celebrated William Law, [The Bishop of Bangor's Late Sermon and his Letter to Dr Snape in defence of it answered 1717, 8vo,] who, in some material points, may be said to have gained a complete victory."

The inquisitive reader who desires to master this celebrated Controversy will find a guide in a vol. entitled An Account of all the considerable Pamphlets that have been published on the Present Controversy between the Bishop of Bangor and others to 1718, with a Continuation to 1719, 8vo, 1719–20. Some forty or fifty tracts were pub. upon this vexata quæstio. As an encouragement (!) to the reader who is impatient to spend a few winter evenings in the digestion of this knotty matter, we quote the experience of one of our most learned and acute of modern literary critics:

"A long and celebrated war of pens instantly commenced, known by the name of the Bangorian Controversy; managed, perhaps on both sides, with all the chicanery of polemical writers, and disgusting both from its tediousness, and from the manifest unwillingness of the disputants to speak ingenuously what they meant."

Then follows this note:

"These qualities are so apparent, that after turning over some forty or fifty tracts, and consuming a good many hours on the Bangorian Controversy, I should find some difficulty in stating with decision the propositions in dispute."—Hallam's Const. Hist. of England, ed. 1854; iii. 243–244. Read the whole of these remarks, which throw considerable light upon the subject.

Bishop Hoadly's Sermons (1754–55, 2 vols. 8vo; Discourses, 4th ed., 1734, 8vo; and see his collected Works) are highly valued:

"Hoadly is very exact and judicious, and both his essence and style just, close, and clear."—Dr. Waterland.

As regards style, Pope complains of his long sentences:

"Swift for closer style,
But Hoadly for a period of a mile."

But the reader must also peruse Akenside's Complimentary Ode to Hoadly.

Hoadly, Benjamin, M.D., 1706–1757, eldest son of the preceding, and a native of London, educated at Benet College, Cambridge, wrote the famous comedy of The Suspicious Husband, 1747, 8vo; assisted Hogarth in his Analysis of Beauty; wrote Three Lects. on The Organs of Respiration, 1737, pub. 1746, 4to; pub. a medical oration, 1742, 8vo; and gave to the world, in association with Mr. Wilson, Electrical Experiments, 1756, 4to. Hoare, Richard. A Journal of his Shrievalty in 1740–41, from his own MS., Bath, 1815, r. 4to. Privately printed by Sir Richard Colt Hoare, Bart.

Hoare, Sir Richard Colt, Bart., 1758–1838, an eminent antiquary, the eldest son of Sir Richard Hoare, the first baronet, was the author of several valuable publications, some of the most important of which we have already noticed. A list of his works, with a biography of the writer, will be found in Lon. Gent. Mag., July, 1838. We instance the following:—1. The Itinerary of Archbishop Baldwin through Wales; trans. into English, and illustrated with Views, Annotations, and a Life of Giraldus, Lon., 1806, 2 vols. 4to. See Barry, Giraldus, p. 134. See also Edin. Rev., viii. 399–413. 2. A Tour through the Isle of Elba, 1814, r. 4to. 3. A Classical Tour through Italy, 1819, 2 vols. 4to; an ed. in 3 vols., 8vo. See Eustace, John Chetwode, p. 563–564. 4. The History of Ancient Wiltshire, 1810–21, 5 Pts. imp. fol.; often bound in 2 vols., £21; large-paper copies, £31 10s. Sir Richard now commenced, assisted by able coadjutors, The Modern History of South Wiltshire, of which Pt. 1—The Hundred of Mere—was pub. in 1822, and the last portion in 1843. Bound in 6 vols. fol., £42; large paper, £74. At the present date (1856) only about 20 perfect copies remain in the hands of the publishers,—Messrs. Nichols of London. These they offer at £30 for small paper; £60 for large-paper copies, bound either in 5 very large vols. or in 12 smaller ones. Sir Richard did not live to see this great work completed, nor was he able to include, as he had designed, the modern history of North Wiltshire. May we not yet hope for such a supplement as he would have rejoiced to see? His principal assistants in the Modern History of South Wiltshire were the Lord Arundell of Wardour, the Rev. John Offer, H. Wansey, Esq.; R. Harris, Esq.; C. Bowles, Esq.; W. H. Black, Esq.; George Matcham, Esq., LL.D., of Newhouse, R. Benson, Esq., H. Hatcher, Esq.; and J. G. Nichols, Esq. We have already indicated our appreciation of enlightened topographical investigations of this character in our notice of George Baker's Hist. and Antiq. of Northamptonshire, p. 103. Sir Richard collected a museum of curiosities of great value; see Gent. Mag., 1846, Pt. 1, 73. See also Dibdin's Lib. Comp. for an account of his library, of which he printed two partial catalogues,—Hist. and Topog. of Italy, 1812, 1, 8vo, Hist. and Topog. of England, Wales, Scotland, and Ireland, 1815, 8vo, both privately printed for presents; 12 copies of the former, 25 of the latter.

Hobart, Sir Henry, Lord Chief Justice of the Court of Common Pleas temp. James I. Reports in the reign of K. James I., with some few Cases in the reign of Q. Elizabeth, Lon., 1641, 4to; 1650, '71, '78, '83, fol. New ed., with addits., by Edward Chilton, 1724, fol. 1st Amer. from the last English ed., by Judge J. M. Williams, Bost., 1829, 8vo. The Amer. ed. is on the whole preferable to the best English ed.—that of 1724, but Judge Williams has unfortunately left out several cases which he deemed of not much importance to the American lawyer. This omission is to be much regretted, and it involves the necessity of purchasing both eds. Professor Greenleaf contemplated editing Hobart's Reports, but relinquished the design, and gave his notes to Judge Williams, who has inserted them in the early part of his ed. See Judge Story's Miscell. Writings, 1852, 271; Marvin's Leg. Bibl., 389–390, and authorities there cited. An interesting biographical notice of Judge Hobart will be found in Wallace's Reporters, 3d ed., 1855, 162–167.

Hobart, John Henry, D.D., 1775–1830, a native of Philadelphia, descended from Joshua Hobart, one of the early settlers of Massachusetts Bay, graduated at Princeton College, New Jersey, in 1793, and was appointed tutor in that institution in 1796; ordained by Bishop White in 1798, and stationed successively at Trinity Church, Oxford, All-Saints' Church, Pequestan, Christ Church, New Brunswick, a country parish at Hempstead, Long Island, and at Trinity Church, New York; elected Assistant Bishop of New York, 1811; sole Bishop, 1816. He was also Professor of Theology and Eloquence in the General Protestant Episcopal Seminary, New York, of which he was one of the principal founders. Bishop Hobart was a zealous advocate for the necessity of Episcopal ordination, and had (as we have seen) a controversy on this subject with the Rev. John M. Mason, D.D., of New York, and also (in 1811) with the Rev. J. C. Jones, an Episcopal clergyman. Dr. Mason's work, entitled Claims to Episcopacy Refuted, in a Review of the Essays of Bp. Hobart, &c., was pub., Lon., 1838, 12mo, with an Introduction and Appendix, by the Rev. John Blackburn, of Pentonville.

"His Pastoral Charges in defence of the leading doctrines, the polity and orders, of the Christian Church, are very argumentative and conclusive, and much admired. . . . The writings of Bp. Hobart have not been unappreciated in England. But his writings are only a small portion of the services he rendered to his generation; he was born to act rather than to write. His deeds are ably narrated by Dr. Berrian, a judicious friend and near connection of the deceased Bishop."—Lowndes's Brit. Lib., 656, 833.

Hobbes, S. Trans. of Cornelius Shilander his Chirurgerie, &c., Lon., 1546, 4to.

Hobbes, Thomas, 1588–1679, a native of Malmesbury, Wiltshire, where his father was minister, was educated at the grammar-school of that place, and at Magdalen Hall, Oxford. In 1608 he became domestic tutor to Lord Cavendish, son of the Earl of Devonshire, with whom he travelled in France and Italy. On his return he became secretary to his ward, on his succeeding to his father's honours; but the death of the former, in 1628, dissolved a connexion which had been maintained for twenty years, and Hobbes was easily persuaded again to leave his country as a companion to the son of Sir Gervase Clifton. In 1631 he was solicited by the countess-dowager of Devonshire to return to England and assume the care of the young earl, then thirteen years of age, and he complied with this request. This arrangement led to a third visit to the Continent, where he resided with his new pupil from 1634 to 1637. Hobbes again returned to Paris, from political apprehensions, in 1641, and remained there until after the publication of his Leviathan. In 1647 he was appointed mathematical tutor to the Prince of Wales, (afterwards Charles II.,) then resident in Paris. After the publication of his Leviathan, which appeared in 1651, he returned to England, and henceforth passed his summers at the Earl of Devonshire's seat in Derbyshire, and his winters in town. In 1674, having attained the great age of 86, he bade a last farewell to London, and retired to the residence of his patron, the Earl of Devonshire, in Derbyshire, to spend the rest of his days in seclusion. Here he remained in "ease and plenty," devoting the "morning to exercise and the afternoon to his studies," until his death in 1679, in the ninety-second year of his age, and about seventy-two years from the date of his first connexion with the illustrious family to three generations of which he had been the object of affectionate care and princely patronage. He was the intimate friend of Lord Herbert of Cherbury, Ben Jonson, and Lord Bacon, and is said to have assisted the latter in translating some of his works into Latin. An interesting account of his habits during his last years will be found in Bishop White Kennet's Memoirs of the Cavendish Family, and detailed notices of his publications and literary controversies in the authorities subjoined. Among the principal works of this celebrated philosopher are—1. Hist. of the Peloponnesian War, Lon., 1628, '34, '76, fol.; 1723, 2 vols. 8vo.

"The Translation of Thucydides, as he himself boasts, was published to show the evils of popular government."—SIR JAMES MACKINTOSH: 2d Prelim. Dissert. to Encyc. Brit.

2. De Mirabilibus Pecci; being the Wonders of the Peak in Devonshire. This is a long Latin poem. In Latin, 1636, '66, 8vo; 1675, 4to. In English and Latin, 1678, 8vo. 3. Elementa Philosophia, seu Politica de Cive, Paris, 1642, 4to: for private distribution. Pub., Amst., 1647, '50, '60, '69, 12mo. See No. 6. 4. Human Nature; or, the Fundamental Principles of Policy concerning the Faculties and Passions of the Human Soul, Lon., 1650, '51, 12mo. This has been called the ablest of his writings. See No. 6. 5. De Corpore Politico; or, the Elements of Law, Moral and Politick, 1650, 8vo. See No. 6. 6. Leviathan; or, the Matter, Forme, and Power of a Commonwealth, Ecclesiastical and Civill, 1651, 8vo, fol. In Latin, 1668, 4to; Amst., 1670, 4to. This work may be called an amplification of Nos. 3, 4, and 5; and is "so constructed as to form a complete digest of all his opinions, religious, moral, and theological."

"In 1651 the complete system of his philosophy was given to the world in the Leviathan. These three works [Nos 3, 5, and 6] bear somewhat the same relation to one another that the Advancement of Learning does to the treatise De Augmentis Scientiarum; they are in effect the same; the same order of subjects, the same arguments, and in most places either the same words, or such variations as occurred to the second thoughts of the writer; but much is more copiously illustrated and more clearly put in the latter than in the former, while much also, from whatever cause, is withdrawn or considerably modified."—Hallam's Lit. Hist. of Europe, ed. 1854, ii. 530.

As regards politics, the Leviathan advocates the unlimited power of princes; the Leviathan is the body politic, which must be kept in chains: in point of morals, his principles tend to "confound all distinctions between right and wrong, and indirectly to undermine the foundations of all religion, natural and revealed." Such doctrines were hailed with delight by the advocates of despotism, and libertines of all classes were glad to find an apology for their vices in the teachings of a philosopher who enjoyed the reputation of a sage. The rapid circulation of so dangerous a work elicited the watchful care of the guardians of public morals and the press. An amusing chronicler of the day furnishes us with an appropriate note upon this head:

"To my booksellers for Hobbes's Leviathan, which is now mightily called for, and what was heretofore sold for 8*s.*, I now give 24*s.* at the second hand, and is sold for 30*s.*, it being a book the Bishop will not let be printed again."—Sept. 3, 1668: Pepys's Diary

The defenders were not backward in exposing the absurdity and mischievous tendency of such speculations:

"Cudworth was one of those whom Hobbes had roused by the atheistic and immoral theories of the Leviathan."—(Hallam's Lit. Hist. of Europe, iii. 304.)

and we have already had occasion to notice his masterly vindication of correct principles, (see CUDWORTH, RALPH, p. 457.) Nor should we omit to notice Cumberland's De Legibus Naturæ, or Lord Clarendon's Survey of the Leviathan. But at the close of this article, where we shall have something more to say respecting the character of Hobbes's political and moral philosophy, we shall give a list of the principal opponents of his pernicious speculations.

7. Letter about Liberty and Necessity, Lon., 1654, 12mo. This elicited a controversy with Archbishop Bramhall (see BRAMHALL, JOHN, D.D., p. 238) and Bishop Laney. Hobbes pub. an account of his controversy with Bramhall, in 1656, 4to, and of that with Laney, in 1670, 12mo. 8. Elementorum Philosophiæ: Sectio prima, de Corpore, iv. partibus, 1655, 8vo: in English, 1656, 4to: Sectio secunda, 1657, 4to; Amst., 1668, 4to. This led to a twenty years' controversy between Hobbes and Dr. Wallis, Savilian Professor of Geometry at Oxford, in which Hobbes made himself the laughing-stock of the mathematicians of the day, but would never acknowledge his defeat. He declared that he had discovered the quadrature of the circle, and all evidence to the contrary was answered by the foulest personal abuse. In defence of his untenable position, he pub. a number of treatises which gratified his spleen if they did not convince his opponents. An account of this war will be found in Disraeli's Quarrels of Authors. 9. The Voyage of Ulysses; or, Homer's Odysses, books ix., x., xi., xii., in English, Lon., 1674, 8vo. 10. The Iliads and Odysses of Homer, in English, with a Pref., 1675, '77, 12mo. Of this translation, condemned by Pope and Beattie, three large edits. were called for in less than ten years.

"His poetry, as well as (ogilby's, is too mean for criticism."—Pope.

Pope declares that Hobbes continually lops off circumstances, and now and then omits whole similes and sentences.

"Though called a translation of Homer, it does not even deserve the name of poem."—Beattie's Essay on Poetry and Music.

Hobbes thus apologized for his translation:

"Why then did I write it?—Because I had nothing else to do Why publish it?—Because I thought it might take off my adversaries from shewing their folly upon my more serious writings."—Hobbes to the Reader.

"Auctor maxime contra Pontiff. Rom. ejusque potestatem disputat. Patres Nicænos acerbe perstringit, monstruque se ab indifferentismo religionum haud alienum est."—Watch.

Hobbes had pub. in Amsterdam, in 1668, 2 vols. 8to, Opera Philosophica quæ Latine scripsit omnia. This is a beautiful edit. There appeared in 1715, Lon., fol., his Moral and Political Works, with Life, &c., with a Supp., by Dr. Blackbourne, &c. But a complete collection of his Works, now first collected and edited by Sir William Molesworth, Bart., M.P., was pub. in 1839–45, 16 vols. 8vo, £8; or The English Works, in 11 vols., £5 10s.; Latin Works, in 5 vols., £2 8s. The principal writers against Hobbes are Lords Clarendon, Shaftesbury, and Kames; Archbishops Bramhall and Tenison; Bishops Cumberland, Butler, Lavey, and Lucy; Drs. Cudworth, Eachard, Parker, Henry Moore, Hutcheson, and Samuel Clarke; Sir James Mackintosh, James Harrington, Dugald Stewart, Smith, and Brown. It is almost needless to state that such an array of talent was hardly necessary for the confutation of the sophisms and absurdities which mingle so strangely with the evidences of uncommon acumen and philosophical shrewdness which so eminently distinguished the intellectual speculations of this great writer. His inconsistency was not confined to his writings; for he was in the habit of the frequent reception of the eucharist, whilst promulgating opinions subversive of Christianity; which reminds us of his declaration that "Holy Scripture is the voice of God, ruling all things by the greatest right," whilst he yet taught men to cast the Scriptures to the winds at the command of their earthly ruler.

"Thought is free," he tells us; "but when it comes to confession of faith, the private reason must submit to the public,—that is to say, to God's lieutenant."—De Cive; Leviathan.

The mischievous effects of his doctrines in his own generation are graphically described by Mr. Macaulay in his History of England, now passing through the press, (see vol. i. chap. 2;) and the philosophers of our own day have confirmed the censure which rebuked the first publication of his errors:

"Before dismissing the system of Hobbes, it may be worth while to remark that all his leading principles are traced by Cudworth to the remains of the ancient sceptics by some of whom as well as by Hobbes, they seem to have been adopted from a wish to flatter the uncontrolled passions of sovereigns."—Dugald Stewart. 1st Prelim. Dissert. to Encyc. Brit.

"Hobbes having thus struck the affections out of his map of human nature, and having totally misunderstood (as will appear in a succeeding part of this Dissertation) the nature even of the appetites, it is no wonder that we should find in it not a trace of the moral sentiments. Moral good he considers merely as consisting in the signs of a power to produce pleasure; and repentance is no more than regret at having missed the way: so that, according to this system, a disinterested approbation of and reverence for virtue are no more possible than disinterested affections towards our fellow-creatures."—Sir James Mackintosh: 2d Prelim. Dissert. to Encyc. Brit.

"The political system of Hobbes, like his moral system, of which, in fact, it is only a portion, sears up the heart. It takes away the sense of wrong, that has consoled the wise and good in their dangers, the proud appeal of innocence under oppression, like that of Prometheus to the elements, uttered to the witnessing world, in coming ages, to the just ear of Heaven. It confounds the principles of moral approbation, the notions of good and ill desert, in a servile idolatry of the monstrous Leviathan it creates, and, after sacrificing all right at the altar of power, denies to the omnipotent the prerogative of dictating the laws of his own worship."—Hallam's Lit. Hist. of Europe, ed. 1854, ii. 542.

A man of such remarkable mental ability and uncommon intellectual force could not but command a respectful hearing, even from those who the most deeply regretted the mischievous character of his speculations. His most illustrious opponent approaches the lists not without undisguised hesitation:

"Mr Hobbes is one of the oldest friends I have in the world, and for whom I have always had a great esteem, as a man who, besides his eminent learning and knowledge, has been always thought a man of probity and free from scandal; but when I reflected upon the mischievous principles scattered through his Leviathan, I felt myself obliged to make these animadversions upon it."—Clarendon's Survey, p. 3

An eminent prelate, and a most unscrupulous "man of war from his youth," displays no indisposition to allow the philosopher all that he could justly claim:

"Here let us do justice to that great man's memory, at a time when his writings seem to be entirely neglected, who, with all his errors, we must allow to be one of the first men of his age for a bright wit, a deep penetration, and a cultivated understanding."—Bishop Warburton.

Mr. Mill, who was one of the first to call the attention of modern readers to the writings of this philosopher, remarks:

"Hobbes is a great name in philosophy, on account both of the value of what he taught, and the extraordinary impulse which he communicated to the spirit of free inquiry in Europe"

To the same effect, Mr. Hallam observes:

"In nothing does Hobbes deserve more credit than in having set an example of close observation in the philosophy of the human mind."—Lit. Hist. of Europe.

Mr. Macaulay, also, referring to the young men of distinguished talents who were sometimes the companions of Bacon's retirement, remarks that

"Among them his quick eye soon discerned the superior abilities of Thomas Hobbes. It is not probable, however, that he fully appreciated the powers of his disciple or foresaw the vast influence both for good and evil which that most vigorous and acute of human intellects was destined to exercise on the two succeeding generations."—Edin. Rev. July, 1837; and in the Essays, ii. 193.

Again, in the History of England, the same learned critic tells us that

"Thomas Hobbes had in language more precise and luminous than has ever been employed by any other metaphysical writer, maintained that the will of the prince was the standard of right and wrong Vol 1 chap 11.

"Thomas Hobbes, a man of much learning, more thinking, and not a little knowledge of the world, was one of the most celebrated and admired authors of his age His style is incomparably better than that of any other writer in the reign of Charles I, and was, for its uncommon strength and purity, scarce equalled in the succeeding reign."—Chancier: Biog. Hist of Eng

The popularity of this writer was undoubtedly greatly owing to this remarkable purity of style:

"A permanent foundation of his fame remains in his admirable style, which seems to be the very perfection of didactic language Short, clear, precise, pithy, his language never has more than one meaning, which a never requires a second thought to take. By the help of his exact method it takes so firm a hold on the mind, that it will not allow attention to slacken."—Sir James Mackintosh: ubi supra.

"His language is so lucid and concise, that it would be almost as improper to put an algebraical process in different terms as some of his metaphysical paragraphs."—Hallam: ubi supra.

As a political economist, also, the claims of our author are not to be forgotten:

"Hobbes seems to have been one of the first who had any thing like a distinct perception of the real source of wealth."—McCulloch's Lit of Polit. Econ., q. v.

With such powers for extensive usefulness to his race, how melancholy is it to be obliged to record of this great philosopher, in the language of Hume, (certainly not a suspicious witness,) that

"Hobbes's politics are fitted only to promote tyranny, and his ethics to encourage licentiousness."—Hist. of England, Reeves's ed., iv. 6

See Bliss's Wood's Athen. Oxon., i. 352–353. Respecting the first-named work, Sir John Cheke wrote Hoby an interesting epistle, in which he gently censures his use of foreign words.

Hoccham, William of. See Occam.

Hoccleve, or Occleve, Thomas, an early English poet, a lawyer, and writer to the privy-seal, is supposed to have been born about 1370, and to have died in 1454. Some of his poems were pub. (never before printed) in 1796, 4to, by Mr. George Mason, from a MS. in his possession. The Story of Jonathan has been thought his best poem.

"After the death of Chaucer, in 1400, a dreary blank of long duration occurs in our annals. The poetry of Hoccleve is wretchedly bad, abounding with pedantry, and destitute of all grace or spirit."—Hallam's Lit. Hist. of Europe.

"As the reputation of Dr. Hodge as a Biblical scholar and theologian has already been fully established, we need only announce a new work from his pen to insure its ready reception. His Commentary on the Ephesians displays the ripe scholarship, the convincing exegesis, and the practical development, which imparted such value to his exposition of the Epistle to the Romans. It is a book for the study of the scholar, and yet most happily adapted for the instruction of general readers, by whom it should be promptly purchased. While we do not regard any man as infallible, we know of no one who is a safer guide to the study of the Scriptures than Professor Hodge."—Presbyterian.

6. De Græcis Illustribus Linguæ Græcæ instauratoribus, &c., Lon., 1742, 8vo. Posth. Pub. from Hody's MSS. by Dr. S. Jebb. This erudite work contains an account of those learned Grecians who retired to Italy about the time of the taking of Constantinople by the Turks, and restored the Greek tongue and learning in those western parts.

"Hody was perhaps the first who threw much light on the early studies of Greek in Italy; and his book, De Græcis illustribus linguæ Græcæ instauratoribus, will be read with pleasure and advantage by every lover of literature; though Mehus, who came with more exuberant erudition to the subject, has pointed out a few errors. But more is to be found as to its native cultivators, Hody being chiefly concerned with the Greek refugees, in Bayle's Fabricius, Niceron, Mehus, Zeno, Tiraboschi, Meiners, Roscoe, Heeren, Shepherd, Corniani, Ginguéné, and the Biographie Universelle, whom I name in chronological order."—*Hallam's Lit. Hoffman, Charles Fenno, b. in the city of New York in 1806, a son of Judge Josiah Ogden Hoffman, and a brother of the eminent lawyer, Ogden Hoffman, entered Columbia College at the age of fifteen, and was admitted to the New York Bar when twenty-one. After three years of legal practice, Mr. Hoffman determined to indulge to its full extent the strong inclination which he had always entertained for literary pursuits; and he accordingly abandoned Coke and Blackstone for the more congenial fields of Romance and Poetry. He has since given to the world—1. A Winter in the West, New York, 1835, 2 vols. 12mo; Lon., 1835, 2 vols. p. 8vo.

"It has since passed through several editions, and will continue to be admired so long as graphic delineations of nature, spirited sketches of men and manners, and richness and purity of style, are appreciated."—R. W. Griswold: Prose Writers of America.

2. Wild Scenes in Forest and Prairie, Lon., (1837?) 1839, 2 vols. p. 8vo. With addits., N. York, 1843, 2 vols. 12mo. 3. Greyslaer; a Romance of the Mohawk, 1840, '49, 12mo. This is founded on the celebrated criminal trial of Beauchamp for the murder of Colonel Sharpe, of Kentucky.

"It happily blends historical facts connected with the border-annals of our State with the fictitious story of love, and displays the powers of a master-painter of human passion. We regard the author of this book as one of the best writers in the country."—Southern Literary Messenger.

Greyslaer met with remarkable success; two edits. were printed in New York, one in Phila., and a fourth in London, in the same year. Mr. William Gilmore Sims has since pub. a novel—Beauchampe—founded on the same tragical incidents.

4. The Vigil of Faith, a Legend of the Adirondack Mountains; and other Poems, N. York, 1842, 12mo. Several edits. have been pub. in America and England. 5. The Echo; or, Borrowed Notes for Home Circulation, Phila., 1844. The title of this work was suggested by some remarks in an article, on Griswold's Poets and Poetry of America, in the Foreign Quarterly Review, in which the reviewer charges Hoffman with borrowing largely from Moore. 6. Lays of the Hudson, and other Poems, N. York, 32mo. 7. Love's Calendar, and other Poems, 1848. This vol. contains a more complete collection of his lyrical compositions than will be found in the Echo. Mr. Hoffman prepared for publication another novel, entitled The Red Spur of Ramapo; but the MS. was destroyed by the carelessness of a servant. In 1833 Mr. H. established that well-known and excellent Journal, The Knickerbocker Magazine, and edited a few numbers, after which he transferred it to the Rev. Timothy Flint. Mr. Hoffman subsequently became proprietor and editor of the American Monthly Magazine, (started by Henry William Herbert, Esq.,) and was its chief editor for many years, during one of which he also discharged the editorial duties connected with the New York Mirror. In the former he pub., in 1837, a novel entitled Vanderlyn. For about eighteen months (in 1846–47) he was the editor of the New York Literary World: see Duyckinck, Evert A., p. 535. He has also been a contributor to the New Yorker, the Corsair, and other periodicals. His contributions to the New York American (distinguished by a *) whilst its associate-editor with Charles King, about 1828–30, added greatly to the reputation of that journal. Nor must we omit to render our acknowledgments to this versatile author for his historical sketch pub. in Sparks's American Biography, 2d Series, iii. 179–238, entitled The Administration of Jacob Leisler; a Chapter in American History. It is as a lyrical poet that Mr. Hoffman is best known to the world, and in this department he unquestionably occupies a very high rank. . Among the principal favourites of the songs which have carried his name so extensively through the social circles of the land are Rosalie Clare, 'Tis Hard to Share her Smiles with Many, Sparkling and Bright, and The Myrtle and Steel.

An eminent American critic, referring to this department of poetical authorship,—the song,—remarks:

"Whatever may be thought of it as an order of writing, I am satisfied that Mr. Hoffman has come as near to the highest standard or idea of excellence which belongs to this species of composition, as any American poet has done in his own department, whatever that department may be."—R. W. Griswold: Poets and Poetry of America. 10th ed., 1850.

See the same author's opinion of Hoffman's prose compositions in his Prose Writers of America, 4th ed., 1852, p. 31.

"For some of the best convivial, amatory, and descriptive poetry of native origin, we are indebted to Charles Fenno Hoffman. The woods and streams, the feast and the vigil, are reflected in his verse with a graphic truth and sentiment that evidence an eye for the picturesque a sense of the adventurous, and a zest for pleasure. He has written many admirable scenic pieces that evince not only a careful but a loving observation of nature; some touches of this kind in the Vigil of Faith are worthy of the most celebrated poets. Many of his songs, from their graceful flow and tender feeling, are highly popular, although some of the metres are too like those of Moore not to provoke a comparison. They are, however, less tinctured with artifice, and many of them have a spontaneous and natural vitality."—H. T. Tuckerman: Sketch of Amer. Lit.

Hoffman, David, LL.D., J.U.D., 1784–1854, a native of Baltimore, Maryland, an eminent lawyer and legal writer, from 1817 to 1836 Professor of Law in the University of Maryland, after the termination of his connexion with this institution resided two years in Europe, and subsequently settled in Philadelphia, where he remained until 1847. In the fall of this year he again visited Europe, returning home in 1853. He died suddenly, of an attack of apoplexy, in New York, November 11, 1854.

1. A Course of Legal Study; respectfully addressed to the Students of Law in the United States. Balt., 1817, pp. 383; 2d ed., rewritten and much enlarged, 1836, 2 vols. 8vo., pp. xvii., 876. The first ed. was most favourably reviewed by Judge Story, in the North American Review for July, 1817. We give a brief extract from this admirable article, which every lawyer should peruse with close attention.

"Mr Hoffman has published a Course of Legal Study, which he modestly addresses to students, but which is well worthy the attention of every gentleman of the bar. . . In quitting the work we have not the slightest hesitation to declare that it contains by far the most perfect system for the study of the law which has ever been offered to the publick."—N. Amer. Rev., vi. 49–77.

The 2d ed. was reviewed by George S. Hillard, in the North American Review for January, 1838, (xlvi. 72–82,) who commends the work in the highest terms; and it has been rewarded by the approbation of Marshall, Kent, De Witt Clinton, and other competent judges in Europe and America. 2. Legal Outlines; being the Substance of a Course of Lectures now delivering in the University of Maryland, in 3 vols. Vol. i., 1836, 8vo, pp. viii., 626. Unfortunately, this is the only vol. of this excellent work which ever saw the light. It was favourably reviewed by Mr. P. Cruise, in the North American Review for January, 1839, xxx. 135–160, q. v.; and see also Story's Inaug. Discourse, 46, n.; 3 Amer. Jur., 86; 1 Ang. L. J., 264; 36 N. Amer. Rev., 395; 4 South. Exam., xxiii. 208, by F. W. P. Greenwood. 4. Visitor; or, A Peep into my Note-Book, 1841, 12mo. This may be considered as a sequel to No. 3. 5. Legal Hints; being a condensation of the leading Ideas as relating to Professional Deportment, contained in a Course of Legal Study, with the addition of some Counsel to Law-Students, Phila., 1846. 6. Chronicles, selected from the Originals of Cartaphilus, the Wandering Jew: embracing a period of nearly nineteen Centuries. Now first revealed to and edited by David Hoffman, Lon., 1855, 2 vols. 8vo. These two vols. are all that was given to the world of a work which was to have been extended to 6 vols. Vol. iii. (concluding Series 1, and reaching to A.D. 573) was ready for the press at the time of the death of the author. Series 2 (vols. iv. v. vi.) were in a state of partial preparation. The design was no less than a History of the World from the Christian era to the present time. To the compilation of this vast work Mr. Hoffman had devoted much time, arduous labour, and a large pecuniary outlay. This adds another to the many instances we have recorded in the course of this volume of cherished designs frustrated, anxious hopes disappointed, and "purposes broken off in the midst." But if the solemn consciousness of the approach of the "inexorable hour" warned him who had toiled so faithfully for his generation, that he must cease from his labours ere he should enter upon that goodly heritage of honourable fame and extensive usefulness which has long been the goal of his ambition in the preparation of the great work of his life, he could yet look back with satisfaction at the good already accomplished by those invaluable fruits of his wisdom which he was permitted to give to the world. To adopt the language of another,

"If we were called upon to designate any single work which had exercised a greater influence over the profession of the law in this country than all others, which had most stimulated the student in his studies, most facilitated his labours, and, in fine, most contributed to elevate the standard of professional learning and morals, we should unhesitatingly select Hoffman's Course of Legal Study."—N. Amer. Rev., xlv. 482

The constant reply of Lagrange to the young men who consulted him respecting their mathematical studies was, 'Study Euler;' and in like manner we should say to every law-student, from Maine to Louisiana, 'Study Hoffman.'"—George S. Hillard: N. Amer. Rev., xlvi 82

In the words of another admirer of this excellent and useful writer:

"What Cujacius said of Paul de Castro has been appropriately applied to Professor Hoffman's Course of Legal Study: Qui non habet Paulum de Castro, tamquam nudat, et erubescat."

Hofland, Mrs. Barbara. See Hofland, Mrs. Thomas Christopher.

Hofland, Thomas Christopher, 1777–1843, a distinguished landscape-painter, and an enthusiastic disciple of Izaak Walton, was a native of Worksop, Nottinghamshire. An interesting memoir of him, by his widow, (vide post.) will be found in The London Art Union; or see Lon. Gen. Mag., May, 1843. 1. 3. Specimens of Garden Decorations and Scenery, 1846.

Hofland, Mrs. Thomas Christopher, 1770–1844, wife of the preceding, formerly Miss Barbara Wreaks, a daughter of Robert Wreaks, of Sheffield, was married in 1796 to Mr. T. Bradshaw Hoole, who died in 1798. In 1805 she pub. a vol. of poems upon a subscription-list of nearly 2000 copies, the profit on which enabled her to open a small school at Harrowgate, where the duties of tuition were relieved by the pleasures of authorship. In 1808 she was married to Thomas Christopher Hofland, the eminent landscape-painter, but did not permit her new engagements to relax her literary application, for in 1812 we find that she gave to the world no less than five different works. This literary activity distinguished Mrs. Hofland for the remainder of her life. In 1833 she was deprived by death of her son by her first husband, the Rev. Mr. Hoole, curate of St. Andrew's, Holborn, and in 1843 she was again left a widow. She wrote in all about seventy works, (of which nearly 300,000 copies were sold in Great Britain, and many thousands on the continent and in America,) and pub. a large number of pieces in magazines and annuals. Among the best-known of her works—which consist almost entirely of novels and moral tales—are: 1. The Daughter-in-Law. 2. Emily. 3. The Son of a Genius. 4. Beatrice. 5. Says she to her Neighbour, What? 6. Captives in India. 7. The Unloved One. 8. The Czarina. 9. Ellen, the Teacher. 10. The Merchant's Widow. 11. Adelaide. 12. Humility. 13. Fortitude. 14. Decision. 15. Integrity. 16. The Clergyman's Widow. 17. Daniel Denison. 18. Self-Denial. 19. Letter of an Englishwoman. 20. Tales of the Priory. 21. Tales of the Manor. A Biographical notice of Mrs. Hofland will be found in the Lon. Gent. Mag., January, 1845; but for a detailed memoir of her life, accompanied by her Literary Remains, we must refer the reader to Mr. Thomas Ramsay's vol. with this title, Lon., 1849, 12mo. The author of the biography in Gent. Mag., referring to the many editions and large sale of her works, remarks:

"When this immense circulation is considered, in connexion with the fact that all her works were successfully devoted to improve the heart by pleasing and powerful lessons, we may form some idea of the debt of gratitude and esteem that is her due."

Hogarth, George, a native of Scotland, late writer to the signet in Edinburgh, was for many years musical and dramatic critic of the London Morning Chronicle; but since the establishment of the Daily News, in 1846, by his son-in-law, Charles Dickens, the author, he has been connected with that sheet in a similar capacity. 1. Hogarth, Richard, a schoolmaster in London, father of William Hogarth, the celebrated artist. Dissertationes Grammaticales, Lon., 1712, 8vo.

Hogarth, William, 1697–1764, a celebrated painter and engraver, son of the preceding, was a native of London. In 1730 he ran away with the daughter of the eminent artist, Sir James Thornhill, who was soon reconciled to the match by the remarkable talents of his volunteer son-in-law. We have already had occasion to refer to his Analysis of Beauty, Lon., 1754, '72, '83, 4to, (in Italian, Leghorn, 1761,) in which he was assisted by Dr. Benjamin Hoadly, Dr. Morell, and the Rev. Mr. Townley. This is a work of decided merit. In his capacity as an artist he does not enter within the design of our Dictionary. For an account of his works, collections of his plates, &c., consult authorities cited below. Especially see—1. The Genuine Works of Wm. Hogg, J. J. Lect. on Study of Civil Law, Lon., 1831, 8vo.

Hogg, James, "The Ettrick Shepherd," December 9, 1770–Nov. 21, 1835, first saw the light in a cottage on the banks of the Ettrick River, in Selkirkshire, Scotland. His ancestors had been shepherds for five centuries, and James commenced his apprenticeship in the same humble calling when only seven years of age. Few authors who have obtained reputation have commenced on so slender a stock of knowledge; for the whole of the shepherd's scholastic education was comprised in six months' instruction received before he was eight years of age. In 1790 he entered the service of Mr. Laidlaw as a shepherd, and remained in this post for the ensuing ten years, the leisure hours of which were profitably occupied with the perusal of books from his master's library. In 1796 he commenced the composition of songs and ballads, and in the next year an ardent desire to be the successor of Burns—of whom he then first heard—gave an impetus to his poetical genius, which, to the astonishment of the world, resulted some years later in the production of The Queen's Wake. Some of his juvenile pieces happened at this time to fall into the hands of Sir Walter Scott, by whom they were highly commended. The first of his published productions, The Patriot Lay of Donald McDonald, composed in 1800, and printed in 1801, soon became a general favourite, and was sung amidst acclamations, published and set to music, whilst even the name of the author was unknown. In 1801 he wrote a prose essay called Reflections on a View of the Nocturnal Heavens, and in the same year, whilst on a visit to Edinburgh to dispose of some of his sheep, he pub. a collection of his best poems. In 1802 he contributed to Sir Walter Scott's Border Minstrelsy; and five years later gave to the world The Shepherd's Guide, (an Essay on Sheep,) and a vol. of songs, ballads, and tales, entitled The Mountain Bard. By these two works he made about £300, which was soon swallowed up in the cultivation of an unprofitable farm; and the publication of the Forest Minstrel, a collection of the poet's early songs, in 1810, failed to meet with that encouragement which the declining fortunes of the author greatly needed. In the same year he commenced the issue of a periodical, intended as a censor of literature and manners, entitled The Spy. For this self-imposed task the conductor was altogether unsuited, and the new paper lingered but a twelvemonth and then expired. One good result, however, is to be attributed to the publication of The Spy. Some of his friends were so much pleased with some of the poetry contributed by the editor to his sheet, that they urged him to attempt the composition of a regular poem. Hogg was always ready to be encouraged; and his friends were gratified, with the rest of the world, in the spring of 1813, by the publication of The Queen's Wake, a Legendary Poem, by far his best production, and one which would not have disgraced the best of the great poets who were at that time delighting the literary circles of the day. Of the seven ten ballads in this work, the general favourite is the legend of Kilmeny:—certainly an exquisite production. The reputation of the author was now established: the poet became a celebrity; and happy was that lady of quality who could secure for her fashionable parties the rustic form, and still more rustic songs and witticisms, of the far-famed Ettrick Shepherd. The Queen's Wake soon reached its 5th edit., and the Shepherd needed nothing more to make him an author for life, as the following list of works, which appeared in rapid succession, will abundantly testify. POETRY: 1. Pilgrims of the Sun, 1815, 1 vol. 2. The Hunting of Badlewe, 1 vol. 3. Mador of the Moor, 1816, 1 vol. 4. Poetic Mirror, or, Living Bards of Britain, 1 vol. This work, consisting of imitations of distinguished living poets, was all (with the exception of Scott's pretended epistle to Southey,—the work of Thomas Pringle) written by Hogg in three weeks. 5. Dramatic Tales, 2 vols. 6. Sacred Melodies, 1 vol. 7. The Border Garland, 1 vol. 8. The Jacobite Relics of Scotland, vol. i., 1819; vol. ii., 1821. Partly original. 9. Queen Hynde, 1825, 1 vol. 10. The Royal Jubilee; a Masque, 1 vol. 11. A Selection of his Songs, 1831, 1 vol. 12. The Queer Book: 26 Miscellaneous Poems, some of which had appeared in Blackwood, 1 vol. A collection of his best poems was pub. at Edinburgh in 1822, in 4 vols. 8vo. PROSE: 13. The Brownie of Bodsbeck, and other Tales, 1818, 2 vols. 14. Winter Evening Tales, 1820, 2 vols. 15. The Three Perils of Man, 1822, 3 vols. 16. The Three Perils of Woman, 1823, 3 vols. 17. The Confessions of a Justified Sinner, 1824, 1 vol. 18. The Shepherd's Calendar, 1829, 2 vols. Composed of tales originally pub. in Blackwood's Magazine. 19. Altrive Tales, 1832. Vol. i. only appeared, although twelve were contemplated, one every other month. The Tales were to be such traditionary stories as were current with the Altrive peasantry, and collected from them. The failure of Cochran & Co., the publishers, prevented the prosecution of the plan. 20. Domestic Manners of Sir Walter Scott, 1834. Considered a very impertinent production. 21. Lay Sermons, 1834, 1 vol. 22. Tales of the Wars of Montrose, 1835, 3 vols. In 1817 Hogg found himself settled on his farm of Altrive, consisting of seventy acres on the banks of the Yarrow, for which he was indebted to the kindness of the Duke and Duchess of Buccleuch. In 1820, in his 48th year, he was married to Miss Margaret Phillips, who seems to have made him a very good wife: she and three of their children, daughters, are now living, and Mrs. Hogg was recently pensioned by government. Shortly after his marriage he took up his residence at Mount Benger; but, being again unfortunate in his agricultural experiments, he was obliged to return to Altrive. The last years of his life were tranquilly passed in the prosecution of his literary pursuits, varied by the sports of the field, to which he was passionately attached. In the autumn of 1835 his health was prostrated by an attack of the jaundice, which resulted in a disease of the liver, and terminated fatally on the 21st of November, 1835, in the 65th year of his age. For further information respecting this uneducated genius, we refer the reader to his autobiographical reminiscences; to the Memoir, by Professor John Wilson, prefixed to Blackie & Co.'s collective edit. of Hogg's Works, 1850, 5 vols. 12mo; Life, by Dr. R. S. Mackenzie, prefixed to his edit. of Noctes Ambrosianæ, N. York, 1855, vol. iv., i.–xxvi.; Dr Mackenzie's collection of Maginn's O'Doherty Papers, 1855, i. 29–32; Life, in Lon. Gent. A collective ed. of Hogg's Tales and Sketches was pub. in 1838, 6 vols. 1p. 8vo; again in 1841 collective ed. of his Poetical Works, 1850, 2 vols. 12mo, 1852, 2 vols. 12mo. We have already stated that the Queen's Wake is considered to be by far the best of his productions: a few brief notices of this poem may therefore be here appropriately introduced:

"The Queen's Wake is a garland of fair forest flowers, bound with a band of rushes from the moor. It is not a poem,—not it; nor was it intended to be so: you might as well call a knight bouquet of flowers a flower, which, by the by, we do in Scotland, some of the ballads are very beautiful, one or two even splendid; most of them spoiled, and the worst far better than the best that was ever written by any lord in dancer of being a blackbood. Kilmeny alone places our [illegible] shepherd among the Undying [illegible]."—PROFESSOR WILSON, Christopher North's Recreations: An Hour's Talk about Poetry.

"The poem is unequal and it could not well be otherwise; it consists of the songs of many minstrels in honour of Queen Mary, united together by a sort of recitative, very rambling, smashing, and choice-rustic. Some of the strains of the contending Bards are of the highest order both of conception and execution; the Abbot of [illegible] great ease, vigour, and harmony, and the story of the Fair Kilmeny, for true simplicity, exquisite loveliness, and graceful and original tones, cannot be matched in the whole compass of Bi[illegible]."—ALLAN CUNNINGHAM: Biog. and Crit. Hist. of the Lit. of the Last Fifty Years.

"The specimens we have already given [of Kilmeny] will enable the reader to form a[illegible] of the style and manner of this singular composition, upon the strength of which alone we should feel ourselves completely justified in assuring the author that no doubt can be entertained that he is a poet, in the highest acceptation of the name."—LORD JEFFREY, Edin. Rev., Nov. 1814.

"The Legend of Kilmeny is as beautiful as any thing in that department of poetry. It contains a fine moral:—that purity of heart makes an earthly creature a welcome denizen of heaven; and the tone and imagery are all fraught with a tenderness and grace that are as unearthly as the subject of the legend."—Howitt's Homes and Haunts of the Brit. Poets.

"Kilmeny has been the theme of universal admiration, and deservedly so: for it is what Wordsworth would have denominated 'pure poetry.' It is, for the most part, the glorious emanation of a sublime fancy,—the spontaneous spreading forth of unearthlike flowers of sentiment,—the bubbling out and welling over of inspiration's fountain."—D. M. MOIR, Poet. Lit. of the Past Half Century.

An acute critic, already quoted, after noticing Hogg's defects as a prose-writer, evinces a disposition to do full justice to his real merits:

"When he chooses to be simple and unaffected, there are few to match him: his Wool-Gatherer, some of his Winter Night's Tales,—which, instead of lengthening the nights, as a surly critic averred, shortened them for thousands,—his Brownie of Bodsbeck, and indeed all his fictions, exhibit much of the innocence and truth and blamelessness of pastoral life. In his finer moods, no one has equalled him in the rare power of uniting the elegance of superstitious fancy with the realities of life."—ALLAN CUNNINGHAM: ubi supra.

The name of the author of The Queen's Wake will recall to many the beautiful extemporaneous tribute of Wordsworth on hearing of the death of his brother poet:

"When first, descending from the moorlands,
I saw the stream of Yarrow glide
Along a bare and open valley,
The Ettrick Shepherd was my guide," &c.

Holcroft, Thomas, 1744–1809, a native of London, the son of a shoemaker, after being a groom and an actor, commenced writing for the stage, and became the author of a number of plays, poems, novels, and translations from the French and German. He was a member of the Society for Constitutional Reform; and learning, in 1794, that he was indicted, he voluntarily resigned himself to the proper authorities; but, upon the acquittal of Hardy, Holcroft and the other prisoners mentioned in the indictment were discharged without a trial. His best-known plays (over thirty of which are registered in the Biog. Dramat.) are—1. Duplicity; a Com., Lon., 1781, 8vo. Very successful. 2. The School for Arrogance; a Com., 1791, 8vo. 3. The Road to Ruin; a Com., 1792, 8vo.

"This comedy ranks among the most successful of modern plays. There is merit in the writing, but much more in that dramatic science which disposes characters, scenes, and dialogue, with minute attention to theatric ambition."—MRS. INCHBALD.

"Mr. Holcroft, in his Road to Ruin, set the example of that style of comedy in which the slang phrases of jockey noblemen and the humours of the four-in-hand club are blended with the romantic sentiments of distressed damsels and philosophic waiting maids, and in which he has been imitated by the most successful of our living writers, unless we make a separate class for the school of Cumberland."—Hazlitt's Lects. on the Comic Writers of the Last Century

4. The Deserted Daughter; a Com., 1795, 8vo. Very successful. Of his novels, among the most popular were—5. Alwyn; or, the Gentleman Comedian, 1780. 6. Anna St. Ives, 1792, 7 vols. 12mo. Tolerably successful. 7. Hugh Trevor, 1794, 3 vols. 12mo. 8. Bryan Perdue, 1805, 3 vols. sm. 8vo. In 1783, 4to, he pub. (9.) Human Happiness, or the Sceptic; a Poem:—a work of bad tendency; and in 1806, 2 vols. 12mo, gave to the world (10.) Tales in Verse, Critical, Satirical, and Humorous. See Miss Mitford's Recollec. of a Lit. Life; Edin. Rev., x. 101–111. Of his translations we may instance—11. Caroline of Lichfield; from the French, 1786, 3 vols. 8vo. 12. Life of Frederic, Baron Trenck; from the German, 1788, 3 vols. 12mo.

"If ever one happens to take up an English version of a French or German book of that period,—Memoirs of Baron Trenck, or Caroline de Litchfield,—and if that version have in it the zest and savour of original writing, we shall be sure to find the name of Thomas Holcroft in the title-page."—MISS MITFORD: ubi supra.

13. Posthumous Works of Frederic II., King of Prussia; from the French, 1789, 3 vols. 8vo. For this translation Holcroft is said to have received about £1200. See Prof. Smyth's Lects. on Mod. Hist. 14. Lavater's Essays on Physiognomy; from the German, 1793, 3 vols. large 8vo. 360 engravings; £5 5s. 15. Herman and Dorothea; from the German of Goethe, 1801, 8vo. In 1804 he pub. (16.) Travels from Hamburgh, through Westphalia, Holland, and the Netherlands, to Paris, 1806, 2 vols. 4to.

"Upon the whole we think that this book is a great deal too long and that it has attained this magnitude by the most intrepid and extensive application of the approved recipes for book-making that has yet come under our consideration."—LORD JEFFREY: Edin. Rev., iv. 84–99. q. v.

In 1815, 3 vols. 12mo, appeared (17.) his Memoirs written by himself, continued [by Wm. Hazlitt, Sr.] to the time of his Death, from his Diary, Notes, and other Papers. A new ed. was pub. in Longman's Travellers' Library in 1851, in 2 Pts.; also in 1 vol.; and an abridgment will be found in Miss Mitford's Recollections of a Literary Life. See also Hazlitt's First Acquaintance with Poets; Biog. Dramat.; and Lon. Gent. Mag. It is but justice to the memory of Holcroft to remark that he is said to have renounced his irreligious opinions when he found himself about visiting a world where they were not likely to prove of much benefit to him.

Holinshed, Holinshend, Holingshed, or Hollynshed, Raphael, known by the valuable chronicles that go under his name, was descended from a family which lived at Bosely, in Cheshire, and died between 1578 and 1582; and this is all that has been ascertained respecting him. The Chronicles of Englande, Scotlande, and Ireland, Lon., 1577, 2 vols. fol. This is the first—or "Shakspeare" (so called because used by the great bard in the arrangement of some of his plots)—edition. It contains many wood cuts, which were omitted and the language altered in the 2d edit., which appeared in 1586-87, 3 vols. fol.: commonly bound in two. This edit. was supervised, corrected, and enlarged by Abraham Fleming, and his brother Samuel assisted in compiling the elaborate index. Holinshed was not the sole author of these Chronicles. Vol. i. was partly composed by William Harrison, (q. v., pp. 793-794;) vol. ii. by Richard Stanihurst; John Hooker, alias Vowell; R. H. or W. H., (probably Wm. Harrison;) Francis Boteville, alias Thin; and others: vol. iii. by John Stow, Fr. Thin, Abr. Fleming, and others. Vol. i. gives us an Historical Description of Britain by Harrison, and the History of England, "from the time that it was first inhabited until the time that it was last conquered," by Holinshed. Vol. ii. contains the History of Ireland, by Holinshed, &c., to 1509, and from 1509 to 1586, by Stanihurst and Hooker; also the History of Scotland to 1571, by Holinshed; and from 1571 to 1586, by Boteville and others. Vol. iii. contains the History of England from William the Conqueror to 1577, by Holinshed; and from 1577 to 1586, by Stow, Fr. Thin, Fleming, and others.

"The Continuation from 1576 to 1586 contained several curious particulars, which gave great offence at the time of publication, and were accordingly suppressed, whereby, says Herbert, the paging from 1220 to 1275 is very irregular. According to Nicolson, they extend from 1491 to 1586. These are called the Castrations of Holinshed, and were republished by Dr. Drake, in 1728, in black-letter, in a thin folio volume. The curious however, necessarily look sharply after the original pages. A copy of this kind was in the Harleian and another in Dr. Mead's collection."—Dibdin's Lib. Comp.

The credit of the plan of Holinshed's Chronicle seems to be due to Reginald Wolfe, the king's printer, who designed originally nothing less than a "universal Cosmography of the whole world." In 1807-08, 6 vols. 4to, appeared a new ed. of the Chronicles, in which the Castrations are restored. A copious Index—that rare luxury—adds to the value of this noble set of quartos. Copies are worth about £6 to £7, according to condition and binding. Copies of the 1st and 2d eds. have been sold for high prices. Of the 1st ed., Nassau's copy sold for £15 15*s.*; Steevens's for £22. Of the 2d ed., Steevens's sold for £23; Reed's for £23 10*s.*; the Roxburghe for £31 10*s.*; Willett's for £36 4*s.* 6*d.*; Sir Robert Smyth's for £40. We are now quoting the highest prices with which we are acquainted, with the exception of the remarkable copy (a large-paper, if there were any on large paper) in 4 vols., purchased by Richard Hober from Col. Stanley's collection for £63. The reprint of 1807-08 has diminished the value of the earlier edits. Hooker's trans. from the Latin of Giraldus's Conquest of England, in Holinshed's Chronicles, has been highly commended:

"Barry's topographical labours appear to the best advantage in Holinshed's Chronicle, translated and improved, with occasional notes, by John Hooker, alias Vowell, vol. ii., edit. 1586."—Dibdin's Lib. Comp.

The same authority remarks that Holinshed's Chronicles are

"By far the most popular and important of our historical records, in print, during the time of Queen Elizabeth: and from which, indeed, all modern historians have freely and largely borrowed."—Ubi supra.

"The Chronicle of Holinshed is more full and complete than any of its predecessors, and less loaded with trifling matters. . . . The Description of England [Harrison's] prefixed to the first volume is the most interesting and valuable document, as a picture of the country, and of the costume and mode of living of its inhabitants, which the sixteenth century has produced." See Drake's Shakspeare and his Times.

"You would smile at my love of black-letter, were I to refer you to Holinshed or Stowe; men, I assure you, by no means despicable."—DR. RICHARD FARMER: Lett. to a Friend on the Study of Eng. Hist.

See also Biog. Brit.; Tanner's Bibliotheca; Bishop Nicolson's Hist. Lib.; Herbert's Typ. Antiq.; Hallam's Lit. Hist. of Europe, ed. 1854, i. 447, n.; Hallam's Constit. Hist. of Eng., 1854, i. 146, n., &c.

A little experience in such studies will replace the smile which Dr. Farmer feared by one of contentment and satisfaction, and the delighted black-letter student will not need much persuasion to induce him often to revel in "Our old monkish chroniclers,—those authentic and amusing relators of passing occurrences, who carry the reader back with them by an irresistible spell to the days in which they lived and among the scenes and persons which they describe."—Lon. Quar. Rev.

If he wish to dive deep into these picturesque records of the past, we will aid him by a list of titles of a set of Chronicles formerly (perhaps yet) offered for sale by Mr. Henry G. Bohn, of Covent Garden, London:—1. FROISSART, by Col. Johnes, 4 vols. 2. MONSTRELET, by Col. Johnes, 4 vols. 3. ROBERT OF GLOUCESTER, 2 vols. 4. PETER LANGTOFT, 2 vols. 5. JOINVILLE'S MEMOIRS, 1 vol. 6. HOLINSHED, 6 vols. 7. GRAFTON, 2 vols. 8. WILLIAM OF MALMESBURY, 1 vol. 9. HALL, 1 vol. 10. HARDYNG, 1 vol. 11. FABYAN, 1 vol. 12. FULLER'S WORTHIES, 2 vols. 13. ARNOLD and RASTELL, 1 vol. In all, 28 vols. r. 4to, reprints, 1803–15. This noble set of books is richly bound in olive morocco, gilt in the old style, marbled and gilt edges, by no less a workman than CLARKE. The price—ay, there's the rub!—the price asked was £105. Another set, consisting of a portion only of these Chronicles, is described by Dibdin in his Library Companion, ed. 1825, p. 197.

"A work which has done much to improve the general tone of thought upon medical subjects in the mind both of the profession and the public."

In the 1st and 2d eds. there were a few chapters on psychological subjects, which the author transferred to a separate volume, viz.: (4.) Chapters on Mental Physiology, 1852, p. 8vo. These have been replaced, in the 3d ed. of Medical Notes and Reflections, by four new chapters. The new ed. is also otherwise enlarged. 3d Amer. ed. of Medical Notes and Reflections, Phila., 1857, 8vo. This excellent work embodies the results of nearly forty years' active practice in London.

Hollis, Thomas, 1720–1774, an ardent advocate of civil and religious liberty, was the great-nephew of Thomas Hollis, (1659–1731,) the munificent benefactor of Harvard College. Indeed, not only is the latter entitled to that appellation, but his brothers John and Nathaniel, his nephew the second Thomas, his great-nephew the third Thomas, (the subject of this notice,) and the heir of the third Thomas,—Thomas Brand Hollis,—were all contributors to this institution. The subject of this notice pub. at considerable expense—1. A new ed. of Toland's Life of Milton, 1761, 8vo. Edited, with Notes, by T. Hollis. This is the best ed. of Toland's Milton. 2. An accurate ed. of Algernon Sydney's Discourses concerning Government; with his Letters, Trial, Apology, and Memoirs of his Life, 1763, 4to. Edited by T. Hollis. 3. The Works of Algernon Sydney; a new ed., with Additions, by T. Hollis, 1772, r. 4to. 4. Joannis Wallisii Grammatica Linguæ Anglicanæ, &c., 1765, 8vo. Hollis meditated an ed. of Andrew Marvell's Works, but did not carry out his design. He was an earnest promoter of the spirit of freedom in America, and aided in the republication of the political treatises of Mayhew, Otis, and John Adams. His Memoirs, compiled by the Rev. Francis Blackburn, Archdeacon of Cleveland, were privately printed by his friend and heir, Thomas Brand Hollis, (originally Thomas Brand,) in 1780, 2 vols. 4to; splendidly illustrated by Bartolozzi, Basire, &c., with portraits of Milton, Locke, Al-gernon Sydney, A. Marvell, Hutcheson, Hubert Languet, (author of the Vindiciæ contra Tyrannos, &c.;) in all, 13 portraits and plates. The collector should look for a copy with the "starred pages," containing the severe review of Dr. Johnson's Life of Milton, and the portrait of Sir Isaac Newton. These pages (often deficient) occur between 532 and 585,—viz.: 533* to 576,* 579,* 580,* 577* to 584.* Such copies would formerly bring from £6 to £8, but can now (1856) be had for about £2. These vols. contain much curious information respecting Milton, &c. not to be found elsewhere, and correspondence with prominent Americans of the time. But note that these Memoirs are not to be confounded with the Memoirs of Thomas Brand Hollis, by John Disney, D.D., 1808, 4to; privately printed. Respecting the Hollises, see Memoirs as above, Gent. "Such a library ["a working library," such as we wish ours to be] must be well provided with books of direct, positive utility. These are of two classes:—the great standard books which are never antiquated, and the valuable new books which are constantly appearing in every department of science and literature. Our library is amply supplied with many of the books belonging to the first class, thanks to the bounty of the Hollises and other noble benefactors in earlier or later days."—HON. "It is a curious production, and, although disliked by Warton for its adherence to alliteration is quoted by Hollinshed and mentioned in terms of praise by the learned Bale."—Bibl. Anglo-Poet., 147.

"Alliteration is here carried to the most ridiculous excess. . . . The poem, probably from its political reference, is mentioned by Hollinshed. Bale, who overlooks the author's poetry in his piety, thinks that he has learnedly and perspicuously discussed the absurdities of popery."—Warton's Hist. of Eng. Poet.

Holmes, Major. Pendulum Watches; Phil. Trans., 1665.

Holmes, Abiel, D.D., 1763–1837, a native of Woodstock, Connecticut, graduated at Yale College in 1783, and shortly afterwards became tutor in that institution; pastor of a congregation in Midway, Georgia, 1788–91; pastor of the First Congregational Church, Cambridge, Mass., 1792–1832. In addition to the work by which he is best known,—The Annals of America,—Dr. Holmes was author of a Life of President Ezra Styles, (father of his first wife;) pub., in 1798, a Memoir of the French Protestants, and a Hist. of the Town of Cambridge, in Mass. Hist. Collec.; and about thirty sermons and historical treatises. Dr. Holmes was first married in 1790 to Mary, daughter of Dr. Ezra Styles, President of Yale College. She died in 1795, leaving no children. In 1800 he married Sarah, daughter of the Hon. Oliver Wendell, of Boston, and had issue—1. Mary Jackson, married to Usher Parsons, M.D.; 2. Ann Susan, married to the Hon. Charles Wentworth Upham; 3. Sarah Lathrop, who died in childhood; 4. Oliver Wendell Holmes, M.D., one of the most popular of American poets and wits, (vide post;) 5. John Holmes, of Cambridge. For further particulars respecting this excellent man and accurate historian, see Dr. Jenks's Funeral Serm; Duyckinckś Cyc. of Amer. Lit.; American Almanac, 1838, 310–317; Mass. Hist. Collec., vol., vii. Dr. Holmes's American Annals, or a Chronological History of America from its Discovery in 1492 to 1806, was pub. at Cambridge, Mass., in 1805, 2 vols. 8vo. It was reviewed with considerable severity by Robert Southey, in the London Quarterly for Nov. 1809, iv. 319–337. An ed. was pub. in London by Sherwood in 1813, 2 vols. 8vo. A new ed., with a continuation, under the title of The Annals of America, &c. to the year 1826, was put forth at Cambridge, Mass., in 1829, 2 vols. 8vo, "with such improvements as leave nothing to desire."

"The new edition of the American Annals is one of the best works of the kind ever published. Every thing of importance relating to the history of America is related in the order in which it happened, in a clear and concise manner, with copious and interesting notes, in which references are made to the most important authorities, by which the reader who wishes for more extensive information on the subject may gratify his curiosity without the trouble of turning over a great number of volumes."—Rich's Bibl. Amer. Nova, ii. 66, 217.

"Dr. Holmes's American Annals is a work of great industry and research, and is an invaluable treasure to the future writers of American history, but claims no merit but that of faithful compilation."—Sketches of the Lit. of the U. States, by Rev. Timothy Flint; Lon. Athenæum, 1815, p. 803.

"This new edition of the American Annals, with such improvements as the author has introduced into it, we consider among the most valuable productions of the American press. . . . In the American Annals it is the author's exclusive object to embody facts, drawn from what he deems the best authorities, and selected according to the mature light of his judgment. In this aim he seems to us eminently successful, especially when it is considered through what a vast field he has ranged, and what difficulties he must have encountered in collecting his materials and fixing his choice. . . . It is the best repository of historical, chronological, and biographical knowledge respecting America that can be found embodied in one work."—JARED SPARKS: N. Amer. Rev., xxix. 426–441; Oct. 1829.

"A valuable work, displaying great industry and research."—Lowndes's Bibl. Man.

"The name of Holmes ought not to be mentioned without a tribute to his memory. No student of our history but owes him gratitude. The accomplished annalist feared no labour; he was indefatigable in his love of truth. He had seen much of the country; his correspondence was wide, his zeal untiring. . . . Take it all in all, the Annals of Holmes constitute a work which in its kind has never been equalled among us and has few parallels anywhere."—N. Amer. Rev. xlvi. 481; April, 1838.

Holmes's Annals has now (1856) become a liber rarissimus, and can rarely be purchased. Our copy was a present from our enterprising publisher and valued friend, Mr. George W. Holmes, Oliver Wendell, M.D., a son of Abiel Holmes, D.D., b. at Cambridge, Massachusetts, Aug. 29, 1809, graduated at Harvard University in 1829, and subsequently devoted about a year to the study of law. In 1833 he visited Europe, and—having resolved to exchange Coke and Blackstone for Galen and Æsculapius—employed between two and three years in attendance on the hospitals of Paris, and other laborious researches connected with the duties of his new profession. In 1835 he returned to Boston, took his medical degree at Cambridge in 1836, was elected Professor of Anatomy and Physiology in Dartmouth College in 1838, and succeeded Dr. Warren as Professor of Anatomy in the Medical Department of Harvard University in 1847. In 1849 Dr. Holmes relinquished general practice. He resides during the winter principally in Boston, and spends the remainder of the year on an estate which once belonged to his great-grandfather, the Hon. Jacob Wendell, situated on the banks of the Housatonic, in Pittsfield, Berkshire county, Massachusetts.

Some of the earlier poetical productions of this popular poet originally appeared in The Collegian, a periodical pub. in 1830 by a number of the students of Harvard University; in Illustrations of the Athenæum Gallery of Paintings, 1831; and in The Harbinger, a May Gift, 1833. In 1836 Dr. Holmes delivered, before the Harvard Phi Beta Kappa Society, Poetry, a Metrical Essay,—which established his reputation as a poet.

"It is in the heroic measure, and in its versification is not surpassed by any poem written in this country. It relates to the nature and offices of poetry, and is itself a series of brilliant illustrations of the ideas of which it is an expression."—Griswold's Poets and Poetry of America.

This Metrical Essay—a very successful essay it proved

pub. in the first collective ed. of his Poems issued at Boston, in 1836, 12mo, pp. 163. In 1843 he gave to the world Terpsichore, a poem, read at the annual dinner of the Phi Beta Kappa Society in that year: and in 1846 he pub. Urania, a Rhymed Lesson, pronounced before the Mercantile Library Association. A review of Urania, by Francis Bowen, will be found in the N. Amer. Rev. for January, 1847, lxiv. 208–216:

"His fancy teems with bright and appropriate images and these are woven into his plan usually with exquisite finish and grace. His artistic merits are very great, his versification is never slovenly, nor his diction meagre or coarse, and many of his shorter pieces are inwrought with so much fire and imagination as to rank among our best lyrics."—Uti supra.

In 1838 Dr. Holmes pub. Boylston Prize Dissertations for 1836–37: On Indigenous Intermittent Fever in New England; Nature and Treatment of Neuralgia: and Utility and Importance of Direct Exploration in Medical Practice, Bost., 8vo. A review of these Essays, by E. Hale, will be found in the N. Amer. Rev. for July, 1838, xlvii. 161–177:

"It affords a proof of his [Dr. Holmes's] industry, as well as of his talents, that the author should be successful in obtaining three prizes in two successive years, gaining in the latter year both that were offered."—Ubi supra.

His Lectures on Homœopathy and its Kindred Delusions appeared in 1842, and a Report of his on Medical Literature to the National Medical Association was pub. in the Trans. of Nat. Med. Society for 1848. To these professional labours are to be added a pamphlet entitled Puerperal Fever as a Private Pestilence, (noticed in Boston Living Age, xlv. 18;) a number of papers in the New England Quarterly Journal of Medicine and Surgery, and in the Boston Medical and Surgical Journal; and (in conjunction with Jacob Bigelow, M.D.) an ed. of Dr. Marshall Hall's Principles of the Theory and Practice of Medicine, 1839, 8vo. He has also been a contributor of miscellaneous articles to the N. Amer. Rev., the New England Mag., the Knickerbocker, &c. We have already stated that the first collective ed. of Holmes's poems was pub. at Boston, (by Otis, Broaders & Co.,) 1836, 12mo, pp. 163. A second Amer. ed. was pub. by Ticknor & Fields (as the firm now runs) in 1848; and this enterprising house has pub. one or more edits. every year since. Three times in the present year (1856) has the press been put in motion to supply the public demand. The first English ed. was pub. in 1845; a new ed. by Routledge in 1852, 32mo; and a third by the same publisher in 1853, 18mo. Astræa, the Balance of Illusions, a Poem delivered before the Phi Beta Kappa Society of Yale College, August, 1850, was pub. in the same year, 16mo, and again in 1851, 16mo. A notice of this production, with copious extracts, will be found in the thirty-first chapter of Miss Mitford's Literary Recollections: and see also the Knickerbocker Mag., xxxvii. 142. Miss Mitford seems to have been indebted for her copy of Astræa (and also for a copy of the author's collected poems) to her friend.—Holmes's friend, our friend, everybody's friend.—James T. Fields, Esq., the poet-publisher of Boston. (See page 595 of the Dictionary.) For other notices of Holmes's poems, see N. Amer. Rev., lxvi. 9 of collective edit. of 1836, by J. G. Palfrey, xliv. 275–277; ibid., notice of collective ed. of 1849, by Francis Bowen, lxviii. 201–203; articles by J. G. Whittier, in Knickerbocker, xxvi. 570; Bost. Liv. Age, (from the National Era,) xx. 516; notices of the second English ed., in Lon. Athenæum, 1852, 815; and in the Irish Quar. Rev. for June, 1855. See also E. P. Whipple's Essays and Reviews, 1851, i. 60–67, and in N. Amer. Rev., January, 1844; Griswold's Poets and Poetry of America; Duyckinckś Cyc. of Amer. We quote a few lines from the many pages of enthusiastic laudation now before us:

"The most concise, apt, and effective poet of the school of Pope this country has produced is Oliver Wendell Holmes. . . . His best lines are a series of rhymed pictures witticisms, or sentiments, let off with the precision and brilliancy of the scintillations that sometimes illuminate the northern horizon. The significant terms, the perfect construction, and acute choice of syllables and emphasis, render some passages of Holmes absolute models of versification, especially in the heroic measure. Besides these artistic merits, his poetry abounds with fine satire, beautiful delineations of nature, and amusing caricatures of manners. The long poems are metrical essays more pointed musical, and judicious, as well as witty, than any that have appeared, of the same species, since the Essay on Man and the Dunciad."—Henry T. Tuckerman: ubi supra.

"Dr. Holmes is a poet of wit and humour and genial sentiment, with a style remarkable for its purity, terseness, and point, and for an exquisite finish and grace. His lyrics ring and sparkle like cataracts of silver; and his serious pieces—as successful in their way as those mirthful frolics of his muse for which he is best known—arrest the attention by touches of the most genuine pathos and tenderness. All his poems illustrate a manly feeling, and have in some of them a current of good sense, the more charming because somewhat out of fashion now in works of imagination and fancy."—R. W. Griswold: ubi supra.

"To write good comic verse is a different thing from writing good comic poetry. A jest or a sharp saying may be easily made to rhyme, but to blend ludicrous ideas with fancy and imagination, and display in their conception and expression the same poetic qualities usually exercised in serious composition is a rare distinction. Among American poets, we know of no one who excels Holmes in this difficult branch of the art. Many of his pleasant lyrics seem not so much the offspring of wit, as of fancy and sentiment turned in a humorous direction. His manner of satirizing the follies, foibles, vanities, and affectations of conventional life is altogether peculiar and original. . . . Holmes is also a poet of sentiment and passion. . . . Those who know him only as a comic lyrist as the libellous laureate of chirping folly and presumptuous egotism, would be surprised at the clear sweetness and sky-lark thrill of his serious and sentimental compositions."—Edwin P. Whipple: ubi supra.

"His longest productions are occasional poems which have been recited before literary societies and received with very great favour. His style is brilliant, sparkling, and terse, and many of his heroic stanzas remind us of the point and condensation of Pope. In his shorter poems, he is sometimes grave and sometimes gay. When in the former mood he charms us by his truth and manliness of feeling, and his sweetness of sentiment, when in the latter, he delights us with the glance and play of the wildest wit and the richest humour. Every thing that he writes is carefully finished, and rests on a basis of sound sense and shrewd observation."—George S. Hillard: ubi supra.

"If any of your readers (and at times we fear it is the case with all) need amusement, and the wholesome alternative of a hearty laugh, we commend them not to Dr. Holmes the physician, but to Dr. Holmes the scholar, the wit, and the humourist; not to the scientific medical professor's barbarous Latin, but to his practical prescriptions given in choice old saxon. We have tried them, and are ready to give the doctor certificates of their efficacy. . . . Long may he live to make broader the face of our care-ridden generation and to realize for himself the truth of the wise man's declaration that a merry heart is 'a continual feast.'"—John G. Whittier: National Era.

"You went crazy last year over Bulwer's New Timon:
Why, I'll, to the day of his dying, should rhyme on,
Heaping verses on verses, and tomes upon tomes,
He could no'er reach the last point and vigour of Holmes.
His are just the fine hands, too, to weave you a lyric
Full of fancy, fun, feeling, or spiked with satiric,
Or sockdolly a measure that nobody knows
What to do but c'en join in the laugh, friends and foes."
J. Russell Lowell: A Fable for Critics.

"As he is everybody's favourite, there is no occasion for critics to meddle with him, either to censure or to praise. He can afford to laugh at the whole reviewing fraternity. His wit is all his own, so lively and tingling but without a drop of ill-nature in it, and never leaving a sting behind. His humour is so grotesque and quiet that it reminds one of the frolics of Puck, and deep pathos mingles with it so naturally, that, when the reader's eyes are brimming with tears, he knows not whether they have their source in sorrow or in laughter. The great merits of his English style we noticed on a former occasion [N. Amer. Rev., July, 208–216,] for point, felicitous propriety, and terseness it is absolutely without a rival."—Francis Bowen: N. Amer. Rev., lxviii. 201–203.

It is now time to inquire into the character of the reception which our author's poetry has encountered on the other side of the Atlantic, where critics may be supposed to cast with a less indulgent eye the pretensions of American authorship. Miss Mitford, in her chapter on American Poets, already referred to, remarks:

"Of all the circle of genuine poets I hardly know any one so original as Holmes. For him we can find no living prototype: to track his footsteps, we must travel back as far as Pope or Dryden, and to my mind it would be well if some of our bards would take the same journey,—provided always it produced the same result. Lofty poetical grandeur, grand high of thought and clear of word, could have ourselves reading some pungent page of Addison and Achitophel, or of the Moral Epistles, if it were not for the pervading nationality, which, excepting Whittier, American poets have generally wanted, and for that true perfection of the manners and follies of the age without which satire would fail alike of its purpose and its name. . . . He excels in singing his own charming songs, and speaks as well as he writes."

"In the lighter poems of Holmes humour is generally blended with good taste. His versification is easy and flowing, and rises to dignity and chastened elegance in his serious and didactic poems; which suggest that the writer devoting his life to literature, might have achieved greater works."—Chambers's Hand-Book of American Literature, London and Edinburgh, 1856.

"There are many things in Holmes's humorous pieces which bear strong resemblance to the similar productions of our English satirists, Swift, Pope, and Thomas Hood. He possesses Swift's quaintness and motley merriment, Pope's polish and graceful point, and the sedate pathos and allied excruciating mirth of Hood. In addition to these he has a certain originality of his own, which would be difficult to define, but which would seem to consist in freedom and facility ingrafted on the broad, hearty nature of Brother Jonathan."—Irish Quarterly Review, v. 218–220: Review of the second English ed. (1852) of Holmes's Poems.

We find the same vol. thus noticed by a famous London periodical, the severity of whose critical judgments has long made its name a terror to authordom on both sides of the Atlantic:

"There are strains of didactic thought, humorous fancy, pathetic feeling,—there is an Augustan sonority and neatness of versification,—in the poems of Dr. Holmes, which by turns remind us of the Prize-Poets of our Colleges:—of Crabbe, who minutely wrought out the homeliest themes in heroic metre,—of William Spencer's drawing-room lyrics, light as gossamer, sentimental as music on a lake,—and of Whistlecraft. Yet there is nothing like gross or direct imitation in this worthy little volume."—Lon. Athenæum, 1852, p. 815.

Dr. Holmes was one of the principal parties in organizing the Atlantic Monthly, and contributed to its first twelve numbers a series of papers entitled the "Autocrat of the Breakfast-Table," which were exceedingly popular, and were pub. in a 1. illustrated by Hoppin, Boston, 1858, 12mo.

"The 'Autocrat' is as genial and gentle, and, withal, as philosophical, an essayist as any of modern times. Hazlitt, saturnine and cynical, would yet have loved this writer. Charles Lamb would have opened his heart to one who resembles him so much in many excellent points. Leigh Hunt, we dare say, has been much delighted with him. Thomas Hood, the great humanitarian, would have relished his fine catholic spirit. Dickens, no doubt, has read him more than once, admiring his command of our common language,—the 'well of English undefiled,'—and, above all, the pervading tone of practical philosophy. The 'Autocrat,' however, is somewhat more than an essayist: he is contemplative, discursive, poetical, thoughtful, philosophical, amusing, imaginative, tender,—never didactic. This is the secret of his marked success: he interests variously-constituted minds and various moods of mind. It needed not the introduction of lyrical pieces (which we are glad to have) to show that the 'Autocrat' is essentially poet. Of all who would have most enjoyed him we may foremost name Professor Wilson, who would have welcomed him to a seat 'above the salt' at the far famed 'Noctes Ambrosianæ,' placing him next to William Maginn, the wayward 'O'Doherty' of Blackwood's Magazine."—Dr. R. Shelton Mackenzie.

Holmes, Robert, D.D., 1749–1805, a native of Hampshire, educated at New College, Oxford, became Rector of Staunton, Canon of Salisbury, and, in 1804, Dean of Winchester. In 1790 he succeeded Thomas Warton as Professor of Poetry at Oxford. 1. The Resurrection of the Body, Lon., 1777, 4to. 2. Alfred; an Ode, &c., 1778, 4to. 3. See Dr. Holmes's Annual Accounts of the Collection of the MSS. of the Septuagint Version, from 1789 to 1803, 8vo. The titles of this great work run as follows:—Vetus Testamentum Græcum, cum variis Lectionibus; edidit Robertus Holmes, D.D., Decanus Wintoniensis; tom. i., Oxonii, e Typographeo Clarendoniano, 1798, fol. Vetus Testamentum Græcum, cum variis Lectionibus. Editionem a Roberto Holmes, S.T.P., inchoatam continuavit Jacobus Parsons, S.T.B.; tom. ii.–v., Oxonii, e Typographeo Clarendoniano, 1818–27, fol. The five vols. were pub. at £16 16s. in sheets. The date of tom. i. would more properly have been 1798–1804. In the next year—1805—Dr. Holmes pub. the Book of Daniel. Holt, John. See Holte.

Holt, Sir John, 1642–1710, Lord Chief-Justice of the King's Bench, 1689–1710, was a native of Thame, Yorkshire, educated at Oriel Coll., Oxford, and entered at Gray's Inn, 1658. 1. Reports of Cases determined by Sir John Holt, 1681–1710, from a MS. of Thos. Farresley, &c., Lon., 1738, fol.

"Farresley was the author of 7th Modern, a book of but indifferent authority. The merits of the present work, I believe, are slightly."—Wallace's Reporters, 247, ed. 1855.

6th and 7th Modern both contain Reports of Holt's Judgments:

"He complained bitterly of his reporters, saying that the shamblesmade stuff which they published would make posterity think ill of his understanding and that of his brethren on the bench.' He chiefly referred to a collection of Reports called Modern, embracing nearly the whole of the time when he sat on the bench,—which are composed in a very loose and perfunctory manner. More justice is done to him by Salkeld, Carthew, Levinz, Shower, and Skinner: but these do little more than state drily the points which he decided, and we should have been left without any adequate memorial of his judicial powers, had it not been for admirable Reports of his decisions published after his death. These, beginning with Easter Term, 6 W. & M., were compiled by Lord Raymond, who was his pupil, and who became his successor. Many of them are distinguished by animation as well as precision, and they form a delightful treat to the happy few who have a genuine taste for judicial science."—Lord Campbell: Lives of the Chief-Justices.

It is known to the profession that Lord Mansfield and several other judges doubt the accuracy of the beginning of Raymond's first vol.; but this is a res nata quæstio, which we shall let the lawyers decide, or, rather, discuss. The dictum of a layman would have but little weight in the controversy. The vol. entitled Cases and Resolutions of Cases, &c., 1742, 8vo, is sometimes cited as Cases Temp. Holt; though that title is generally used to distinguish Farresley's folio, 1738. We must not forget to mention that in 1837, 8vo, there was pub. from the original MSS., with an Introduc., Lord Holt's Judgments in the Case of Ashby v. White and others, and J. Paty and others. In 1708, Lord Holt edited a collection of Crown Cases, from the MS. of Chief-Justice Kelynge, adding three judgments of his own, all of which are upon the law of murder and manslaughter:

"His notice of them in his preface rather shows that he was an instance of a great English lawyer being utterly unacquainted with English composition."—Lord Campbell: ubi supra.

A new ed. of the above folio, or rather a new title-page, was pub. in 1739. Respecting this great judge, in addition to authorities above cited, consult his Life, 1764, 8vo; Biog. Brit., vol. vii., Supp.; Burnet's Own Times; Athen. Oxon.; Nichols's Atterbury; Marvin's Leg. Bibl.; Tatler, No. 14; art. on Law-School at Cambridge, by Dr. Charles Follen, in N. Amer. Rev., xxxvi. 395–418. One of Holt's most celebrated judgments is that of Coggs v. Barnard,

"In which the law of bailments is expounded with philosophic precision and fulness.... And, if he had left no other judgment on record, this alone would justify the eulogy of an eminent modern judge, that 'he was as great a lawyer as ever sat in Westminster Hall.'"—Judge Story: Progress of Jurisprudence: Miscell. Writings, 1852, 204.

Holt deserves great credit for his courageous guardianship of the legal rights of the people in opposition to the tyrannical measures of King James II. This was not forgotten by the succeeding government. An eminent authority of the times of Holt, referring to the manner in which the Revolution judges were selected, remarks:

"The first of these was Sir John Holt, made Lord Chief-Justice of England, then a young man for so high a post, who maintained it all his time with a great reputation for capacity, integrity, courage, and dispatch."—Bishop Burnet: Own Times.

"He was a man of profound knowledge of the laws of his country, and as just an observer of them in his own person."—Tatler, No. 14.

"A man of unsullied honour, of profound learning, and of the most enlightened understanding."—LORD CAMPBELL: ubi supra.

"On the intimate connection of these two codes, [those of Rome and England,] let us hear the words of Lord Holt, whose name never can be pronounced without veneration, as long as wisdom and integrity are revered among men."—SIR JAMES MACKINTOSH: On the Study of the Law of Nature and Nations; Miscell. Works, 1856, p. 286.

There is much curious information to be found in it in regard to the peculiarities of the ancient Saxon law. The additions of the American edition [Mr. Pennington's] give increased value to the work, and evince much accuracy and taste."—Penna. Law Jour.

Home, Sir Everard, Bart., President Royal Coll. of Surgeons, 1756–1832, a native of Greenlaw Castle, county of Berwick, Scotland, studied medicine with his brother-in-law, the celebrated John Hunter, and practised in London with great success for more than five years. Among his contributions to medical literature are Observations on the Treatment of Ulcers on the Legs, 1797; On Cancer, 1805; On Strictures of the Urethra, &c., 3 vols. 8vo; on the Prostate Gland, 2 vols. 8vo; many papers in Phil. Trans., Med. Jour., and other periodicals; and the following great work: Lects. on Comparative Anatomy, &c., 1814–28, 6 vols. r. 4to, 361 plates, £18 18s.; large paper, r. 4to, £27 6s.

"The six volumes taken together are filled with researches that were begun at seventeen, and have been uninterruptedly continued to seventy,—a period of fifty-five years. It is to the late John Hunter I owe the love of the pursuit; and his example, both of application and the mode of investigation, I have never lost sight of. To him I am indebted for the rich stores which he placed before me, which it has been the height of my ambition to increase."—Author's Preface.

Official investigations have left no doubt remaining that Sir Everard did, indeed, "owe to the late John Hunter" more than was generally supposed.

Home, Henry, Lord Kames, 1696–1782, a native of the county of Berwick, Scotland, was for some time a writer to the Signet, was called to the Bar in 1724, made a Judge of the Court of Session in 1752, when, according to custom, he took the title of Lord Kames; appointed one of the Lords of Justiciary in 1763. He cultivated the large estate of Blair-Drummond, in Perthshire, of which he became possessed in right of his wife. Lord Kames was noted for great public spirit; and his cheerfulness of temper, combined with a vast amount of information on literary, political, and agricultural topics, made him a general favourite in society. The reader will be greatly interested in A. F. Tytler's (Lord Woodhouselee) Memoirs of the Life and Writings of the Hon. Henry Home, of Kames; with a Supp., Edin., 1807 10, 2 vols. 4to; Lon., 1814, 3 vols. 8vo. His life was also pub. by Wm. Smellie: (see GREGORY, JOHN, p. 737.) 1. "DR. JOHNSON.—'Sir, this book is a pretty essay, and deserves to be held in some estimation, though much of it is chimerical.... The Scotchman has taken the right method in his Elements of Criticism. I do not mean that he has taught us any thing; but he has told us old things in a new way.'

"The Elements of Criticism, considered as the first systematical attempt to investigate the metaphysical principles of the fine arts, possesses, in spite of its numerous defects both in point of taste and of philosophy, infinite merits, and will ever be regarded as a literary wonder by those who know how small a portion of his time it was possible for the author to allot to the composition of it, amidst the imperious and multifarious duties of a most active and useful life."—DUGALD STEWART: 1st. *Prelim. Home, James, Advocate. The Scripture Hist. of the Jews and their Republic, Lon., 1737, 2 vols. 8vo. An excellent work. Recommended by Bishop Tomline, in his Elements of Christian Theology.

Home, John, 1724–1808, the author of Douglas, was a native of Aneram, Roxburghshire, Scotland, educated at the University of Edinburgh, and licensed to preach in the Church of Scotland in 1747. In December, 1756, his (1.) Tragedy of Douglas was presented at the theatre in the Canongate, Edinburgh.

"It was received with enthusiastic applause, and, in the conclusion, drew forth many tears, which were perhaps a more unequivocal testimony to its merits. The town was in an uproar of exultation that a Scotsman should write a tragedy of the first rate, and that its merits were first submitted to them."

But the successful author was soon reminded that he was exercising his genius in a forbidden field; and he found it expedient to anticipate his expected degradation from the ministerial office by abdicating his pulpit, which he did in June, 1757. It is perhaps worthy of notice that the representation of Douglas elicited Dr. Witherspoon's Serious Inquiry into the Nature and Effects of the Stage. Mr. Home now found a powerful patron in Lord Bute, who procured him a pension of £300, and the sinecure office of Conservator of the Scotch Privileges at Campvere, in Zealand, which doubled this income. Home had some early military experience as a volunteer against the Pretender in 1745, and in 1788 he received a captain's commission, which he held until the peace, in the Duke of Buccleugh's regiment of militia,—the Fencibles. In March, 1757, against the judgment of Garrick, Douglas was produced at Covent-Garden, and soon attained that popularity which it has since enjoyed. The latter part of the author's life was passed at East Lothian and in the city of Edinburgh, where he played the hospitable landlord until his death in 1808, at the advanced age of 86. He was the author of five Tragedies, in addition to Douglas, (pub., Lon., 1757, 8vo;) viz.: 2. Agis, 1758, 8vo; 3. The Siege of Aquileia, 1760, 8vo; 4. The Fatal Discovery, 1769, 8vo; 5. Alonso, 1773, 8vo; 6. Alfred, 1778, 8vo. Home's Dramatic Works were pub. in 1760, 12mo, and at Edin., 1798, 2 vols. 12mo. These plays cannot compare with Douglas.

"Home's other tragedies are all very indifferent,—most of them quite bad. Mr. Mackenzie should not have disturbed their bors."—JOHN WILSON: Noctes Ambrosianæ, April, 1833.

"It may, perhaps, seem strange that the author, in his preceding tragedy of Agis, and in his subsequent dramatic efforts, so far from attaining similar excellence, never even approached to the success of Douglas; yet good reasons can be assigned for his failure, without imputing it, during his best years at least, to a decay of genius."—Sir Walter Scott: Life and Works of John Home, Lon. Quar. Rev., June, 1827; and in Scott's Prose Works, q.v.

This article is a review of the Works of John Home, Esq., now first collected, to which is prefixed an account of his Life and Writings, by Henry Mackenzie. Edin., 1822. 3 vols. 8vo. To this work we refer the reader for further particulars connected with the biography and literary labours of our author. See also Noctes Ambrosianæ, April, 1822.

Home also pub. the History of the Rebellion in 1745, 4to, 1802, which we shall notice hereafter. The merits of Douglas, notwithstanding the assertion of Dr. Johnson "that there were not ten good lines in the whole play," have been repeatedly acknowledged by the most competent critics. That this laudation has been sometimes carried to a ridiculous excess can hardly be questioned; as, for instance, in the eulogy of David Hume, the historian, who, in his Four Dissertations addressed to Home, compliments him as the possessor of "The true theatric genius of Shakspeare and Otway; refined from the unhappy barbarism of the one and licentiousness of the other."

Here doubtless the Scotsman speaks as well as the critic, and patriotic enthusiasm must not surprise us when warmed with a theme so congenial and so flattering:

"The genius of Home was national, and so too was the subject of his justly famous Tragedy of Douglas. He had studied the old Ballads; their simplicities were sweet to him as wall-flowers on ruins. On the story of Gill Morice, who was an Earl's son, he founded the Tragedy which surely no Scottish eyes ever witnessed without tears."—John Wilson: Recreations of Christopher North. An Hour's Talk about Poetry.

"I think nobody can bestow too much praise on Douglas. There has been no English tragedy worthy of the name since it appeared.' —Ibid.: Noctes Ambrosianæ, April, 1822.

Whilst this perhaps appears somewhat extravagant, yet one of the best parts of this play is commended by two eminent modern critics in terms quite as eulogistic:

"We agree with Mr. Mackenzie, that the chief scene between Lady Randolph and Old Norval, in which the preservation and existence of Douglas is discovered, has no equal in modern, and scarcely a superior in the ancient, drama. It is certainly one of the most effective which the English stage has to boast; and we learn with pleasure but without surprise that though many other parts of the play were altered before its representation, we have this master-piece exactly as it was thrown off in the original sketch. 'Thus it is,' says the accomplished editor, 'that the fervid creation of genius and taste strikes out what is so excellent as well as vivid as not to admit of amendment, and which indeed correction would spoil instead of improving.' This is the true inspiration of the poet which gives to criticism, instead of borrowing from it, its model and rule and which, it is possible in some diffident authors, the terrors of critics may have weakened or extinguished.

"The memory of Mr. Home, as an author depends in England almost entirely upon the tragedy of Douglas which not only retains the most indisputable possession of the stage, but produces a stronger effect on the feelings of the audience, when the parts of Douglas and Lady Randolph are well filled than almost any tragedy since the days of Otway . . . The language of the piece is beautiful. 'Mrs. Siddons told me,' says the editor, 'Mr. Mackenzie, 'that she never found any study' (which, in the technical language of the stage, means the getting verses by heart,) so easy as that of Douglas, which is one of the best criterions of excellence in the dramatic style.'"—Sir Walter Scott: Life and Works of John Home, ubi supra.

Home's History of the Rebellion in 1745—to which we promised to return—gave great dissatisfaction, not only as regarded its literary character, but in its deficiency in historical accuracy:

"Since Mr. Home did assume the pen on the subject of the Forty-five, no consideration whatever ought to have made him depart from the truth, or shrink from exposing the cruelties practised, as Mr. Mackenzie delicately expresses it, by some subordinate officers, or from execrating the impolitic and ungenerous use of the victory of Culloden in which the Duke of Cumberland was somewhat implicated. Mr. Home ought either never to have written his history, or to have written it without clogging himself with the dedication to the sovereign . . . The disappointed public of Scotland, to which the history should have been most interesting, was clamorous in its disapprobation. They complained of suppressed information and servile corrections. The history, nevertheless, so far as it goes, a fair and candid one for the writer, though, by the manner in which he had fettered himself, he was debarred from speaking the whole truth, yet was incapable of speaking any thing but the truth."—Sir Walter Scott: ubi supra.

"Any account of that brilliant episode in our history must needs be full of interest, and Home, being concerned so far himself, has preserved a number of picturesque enough anecdotes, but, on the whole, the book wants vigour, and it is full of quizzalities. What can be more absurd than his giving as more pages about the escape of two or three Whig students of Divinity from the Castle of Doune than he spends upon all the wild wanderings of the unfortunate Chevalier?"—John Wilson: Noctes Ambrosianæ. April, 1822.

Yet Home's History must by no means be neglected by the historical student:

"The work of Home was not entirely such as we might have expected from one who was not only an actor in the scene, but the author of a tragedy like Douglas, elegant enough to have pleased on the French stage, and yet affecting enough to succeed . . . The History of the Rebellion was a work which had been meditated so long, that it was delivered to the world too late,—when the writer was no longer what he once was. But I recommend it to your perusal, because it has all the marks of authenticity,—possesses, I think, more merit than is generally supposed—treats of a very remarkable event in our history,—and is, after all, entertaining, and not long."—Prof. Smyth's Lects. on Mod. Hist.

Homer, Rev. Henry, 1752–1791, an eminent classical scholar, educated at and Fellow of Emanuel College, Cambridge, pub. an Essay upon the Inclosure of Common Fields, Lon., 1766, 8vo; an Inquiry rel. to Public Roads, Oxf., 1767, 8vo; and edited several Latin authors, the best-known of which is the Entire Works of Horace, Lon., 1792, 2 vols. 4to,—the joint production of Mr. Homer and Dr. Combe; pub. at £6 6s. This beautiful work has been already noticed: see Combe, Charles, M.D.; Dibdin's Greek and Latin Classics; Chalmers's Biog. Dict.; Lon. Gent. Mag., vols. lxxvi., lxxx.; Brit. The text of Combe and Homer's ed. of Horace is formed on the basis of Gesner's ed., and the work is enriched by a collation of the editio princeps in the Royal Library, and seven Harleian MSS. The notes are taken principally from Cruquius, Lambinus, Torrentius, Sanadon, Bentley, Cunningham, Baxter, Gesner, Klotzius, Janus, Waddelus, Wakefield, &c. As regards the physique of the work, it is to be commended for the brightness of the paper, the amplitude of the margin, and the beauty of the type.

This bears the imprimatur of Joseph Caryl, and a commendatory Preface by Peter Sterry. In 1661, fol., Holmes pub. Ten Exercitations in Vindication of the Resurrection Revealed. A new ed. of these vols., compressed into one, with the repetitions and extraneous matter omitted, edited by the Rev. J. W. Brooks, was pub. in 1833, 8vo. Thomas Hill pub. a Confutation of the Millenarian Opinion, in reply to Dr. Holmes, in 1657, 12mo. Sixteen of Holmes's theolog. treatises were pub. in a fol. vol. in 1652, and the same, with a new title, in 1669. See Athen. Oxon. for an account of this author and his works. Holmes's work on the Resurrection is by no means to be neglected by the Biblical student. We have seen that he advocates the doctrine of an earthly millennium.

"This is far from being a contemptible book, though the author ranked among the visionaries of his time. . . . The learning of the author was evidently extensive, and his knowledge of the Scriptures particularly of the prophecies, very considerable. A great deal of discussion respecting the meaning of many difficult passages occurs in the book, which will sometimes, perhaps, amuse, but may very often instruct, the reader. He is far from being so carnal in his views as his leading sentiment would prepare us to expect."—Orme's Bibl. Bib.

"The manner of handling this subject in this book appears to be with piety, judgment, and variety. It is, in one, a well-grown orchard and a nursery of truths."—Peter Sterry.

"I conceive that the church of God hath not hitherto seen this great point so clearly stated, so largely discussed, so strongly confirmed, not only by the testimony of ancient and modern writers of all sorts, but by the Holy Scriptures throughout, as is presented in this book."—Joseph Caryl: A Share of the Report, on Job.

Hone, William, d. 1842, aged 63, a native of Bath, for many years a publisher and bookseller in London, and latterly an Independent minister at Weigh-house Chapel, Eastcheap, pub. some profane parodies, The Apocryphal New Testament, and a number of other works, of which the Every-Day Book, 1826, The Table Book, 1827–28, and The Year-Book, 1829, are the best known. His Apocryphal New Testament (for an account of which, see Horne's Introduction to the Study of the Scriptures, and the Lon. Quar. Rev., vols. xxv. and xxx.) was pub. in 1820, 8vo; 2d ed., 1821, 8vo; his Ancient Mysteries, in 1823, 8vo; and his own account of his Early Life and Conversion, in 1841, 8vo. Of his political pieces, which were numerous, the satire entitled The Political House that Jack Built was the most popular, and went through no less than fifty edits. He also edited an edit. of Strutt's Sports and Pastimes. See an account of his life and literary labours in Lon. Gent. Mag., January, 1843. The Every-Day Book, The Table-Book, and The Year-Book, of which there have been several edits.,—the last in 1857, 4 vols. 8vo, 730 wood-cuts,—cannot be too highly commended. Sir Walter Scott, Lamb,—who contributed some of the contents,—Southey, and John Wilson, Horace Smith and others, all unite in their praise:

"Reader, did you ever see Hone's Every-Day Book? You cannot do better than buy it directly.... You will meet with... spirit-stirring descriptions of old customs, delightful wood cuts of old buildings as well as many a fine secret learned among the woods and fields, and whispered by the 'seasons' difference'... He has deserved well of the naturalist, the antiquarian, and the poet, by his Every-Day and also by his Table-Book."—CHRISTOPHER NORTH: Blackwood's Mag., xxvii. 250.

"By-the-by, I have bought Hone's Every Day Book and his Table Book, and am sorry I had not seen them before my colloquies were printed, that I might have given him a good word there. I have not seen any miscellaneous books that are so well worth having; both full of curious matter, and with an abundance of the very best wood-cuts."—ROBERT SOUTHEY: Letter to Henry Taylor, Southey's Life and Corresp.

Mr. Southey remarks, on another occasion:

"I may take the opportunity of recommending the Every-Day Book and Table-Book to those who are interested in the preservation of our national and local customs, by these very curious publications their compiler has rendered good service in an important department of literature."

"These Every Day and Table Books will be a treasure a hundred years hence; but they have failed to make Hone's fortune....

"I like you and your book, ingenious Hone,
In whose capacious, all-embracing leaves
The very marrow of tradition's shown,
And all that History—much that Fiction—weaves.

"By every sort of taste your work is graced;
Vast stores of modern anecdote we find,
With good old story quaintly interlaced:—
The theme as various as the reader's mind.

"Dan Phœbus loves your book: trust me, friend Hone;
The little only errs, he bids me say;
For, while such art, wit, reading, there are shown,
He swears, 'tis not a work of every day."

Some of the articles in the Comic Annuals were subsequently reproduced, and pub. with the additional new matter, as Hood's Own. 6. Hood's Own Complete, 1839, 8vo. New ed., 1846, 8vo. 7. Tylney Hall; a Novel, 1834, 3 vols. New eds. in 1840 and '42. Neither this novel, nor the incomplete tale entitled Our Family, added any thing to Hood's literary reputation. 8. Up the Rhine; 2d ed., 1840, cr. 8vo. This is a satire on the manners of English travellers. 9. Whimsicalities: a Periodical Gathering, 1844, fp. 8vo. This collection contains many articles originally pub. in the New Monthly Magazine.

"In this work are some of Mr. Hood's best efforts; things that will make the thoughtful wiser, and the unthinking merrier."

10. Hood's Comic Album, in Prose and Verse, 1844, 12mo. 11. The Dream of Eugene Aram. New ed., 1845, 12mo. This graphic poem—perhaps, next to the Song of the Shirt, the most popular of Hood's productions—originally appeared in the Gem for 1829. 12. Poems: 2d ed., 1846, fp. 8vo: 1851, 12mo: 5th ed., 1852, 12mo: 1854, 12mo. 13. Poems of Wit and Humour, 1847, 12mo; 3d ed., 1851, 12mo; 1854, 12mo. The Song of the Shirt, which has elicited countless imitations, and has, we trust, somewhat ameliorated the condition of a most deserving class of operatives, was the author's latest production of any importance, and originally appeared in Punch in 1844. In addition to the many literary labours just recorded, we must not forget to notice the monthly magazine established by our author, bearing his own name,—Hood's Comic Miscellany. About a year before his death, a pension of £100 per annum was granted by Government to his wife, and a subscription was raised shortly after his demise for the benefit of his widow and his two children. A collective ed. of Hood's Choice Works,—1. Prose and Verse: 2. Up the Rhine: 3. Whims and Oddities: 4. Poems: 5. Hood's Own: 6. Whimsicalities,—in 4 vols. 12mo, (also in 6 vols. 12mo.) was pub. in 1852, in New York, by Messrs. George P. Putnam & Co. In 1855, Messrs. Phillips, Sampson & Co., of Boston, published a volume of more than 500 pages, containing "all of Hood's poems contained in Moxon's Collections of the author's sentimental and humorous verses, with several additions from other sources. It was the most complete collection that had been made at the time of its appearance.

This collection was edited by Epes Sargent: and in 1856 the same gentleman edited, for the same house, the Humorous Poems of Thomas Hood, including Love and Lunacy, Ballads, Tales and Legends, Odes and Addresses to Great People, and Miscellaneous Poems, now first collected. This vol., of about the same size as the first, contains, besides other matter, many of Hood's contributions to the London Magazine and the New Monthly Magazine during his editorial connexion with these periodicals. An edit. of Hood's Poetical Works has been pub. by Messrs. Little, Brown, and Co. Boston in 2 vols. 18mo, and several of his separate pu have been reprinted in America. On the same day that this article was prepared for the printer, (in Oct. 1856,) Messrs. Little, Brown & Co. pub. two more vols. of The Poetical Works of Thomas Hood, making in all 4 vols. of their edit. We append their advertisement:

"This is the largest collection of Hood's Poems yet offered to the public, either in England or America."

We have but small space for quotations of opinions in addition to those already cited respecting the merits of this popular author; but those who desire to read more about the serio-comic Hood shall not be disappointed. "His Dream of Eugene Aram places him high among the bards who deal in dark and fearful things and intimate rather than express deeds which men shudder to hear named. Some other of his poems have much tenderness, and a sense of nature, animate and inanimate."—ALLAN CUNNINGHAM: ubi supra.

"Hood's verse, whether serious or comic,—whether serene like a cloudless autumn evening, or sparkling with puns like a frosty January midnight with stars,—was ever pregnant with materials for thought. . . . Like every author distinguished for true comic humour, there was a deep vein of melancholy pathos running through his mirth; and even when his sun shone brightly, its light seemed often reflected as if only over the rim of a cloud. Well may we say, in the words of Tennyson, 'Would he could have stayed with us!' for never could it be more truly recorded of any one—in the words of Hamlet characterising Yorick—that 'he was a fellow of infinite jest, of most excellent fancy.'"—D. Hook, James, 1746–1827, a native of Norwich, organist at St George's Chapel, Windsor, the father of Dr. James Hook and Theodore Edward Hook, was the author of more than 140 musical productions, operas, dramatic pieces &c, and upwards of 2000 songs.

Hook, Mrs. James, formerly Miss Madden, wife of the preceding, was the author of The Double Disguise, a Musical Entertainment, Lon., 1784, 8vo.

Hook, James, LL.D., 1771–1828, eldest son of the two preceding, and brother to Theodore Edward Hook, was educated at St. Mary Hall, Oxford; became Archdeacon of Huntingdon in 1811, Dean of Worcester in 1825, and held some other preferments. 1. Jack of Newbury; an Opera, 1795. 2. Diamond Cut Diamond; a Musical Entertainment, 1797. Neither of these were printed. 3. Hook, Theodore Edward, 1788–1841, a native of London, was the son of James Hook, the musical composer, and a brother of Dr. James Hook, Dean of Worcester, both of whom have already come under our notice. Theodore was sent to Harrow to be educated, and had there for his school fellows Sir Robert Peel and Lord Byron, with whom, however, he does not seem at that time to have formed any acquaintance. He had already commenced authorship; for before his admission to Harrow, and whilst at school in Cambridgeshire, (being then thirteen years of age,) he wrote a piece for the stage. The early evidence of talent was accompanied by indications of an extraordinary genius for music and great facility in the composition of ballads; and his father, whose profession enabled him to make a profitable use of his son's varied accomplishments, was early persuaded to let him remain at home as a junior partner in his business. In 1805, Theodore made his début as a dramatic author in the Comic Opera of The Soldier's Return, and his success was complete. This triumph was succeeded by one still more decided, if possible, in the next year, when Liston and Mathews both figured, to the unbounded delight of the public, in the boy-author's musical farce of Catch Him who Can. Young Theodore, now the favourite of the town and the darling of the Green Room, was in that dangerous position which had been foreseen by his brother, the worthy clergyman, who a short time previously had almost by force carried him to Oxford, had him entered as a student, and in vain looked for his arrival when the period had arrived for the commencement of his collegiate course. For a graphic account of this portion of Hook's life, and his subsequent experience, we must refer the reader to his autobiographical novel of Gilbert Gurney; the Rev. Mr. Barham's Life and Remains of Theodore Hook, 1849, 2 vols. p. 8vo; 5th ed., 1853, fp. 8vo; to J. G. Lockhart's article—"Theodore Hook"—in Lon. Quar. Rev., lxxii. 53–108, reprinted separately in Murray's Reading for the Rail, 3d ed., 1852, fp. 8vo; and to the authorities cited below. And now we behold Theodore fairly launched upon the great sea of London life in the various capacities of author, musician, singer, man of fashion, and inexhaustible inventor of practical jokes. Of the last, it may be sufficient to glance at that of the extempore surveyors, and the famous Berners-Street Hoax in 1809. But it was as an improvisatore that Hook shone in all his glory, and without fear of a rival. Mrs. Mathews has so graphically described his marvellous powers in this line, that we cannot do better than transcribe her account of a remarkable scene which took place on the occasion of a dinner given by the Drury Lane Company to their proprietor, the brilliant but improvident Sheridan:

"In the course of it many persons sung, and Mr. Hook, being in turn solicited, displayed to the delight and surprise of all present, his wondrous talent in extemporaneous singing. The company was numerous, and generally strangers to Mr. Hook; but, without a moment's premeditation, he composed a verse upon every person in the room, full of the most pointed wit, and with the truest rhymes unhesitatingly gathering into his subject, as he rapidly proceeded, in addition to what had passed during the dinner, every trivial incident of the moment. Every action was turned to account; every circumstance—the look, the gesture, or any other incidental effects—served as occasion for more wit, and even the singer's ignorance of the names and condition of many of the party seemed to give greater facility to his brilliant hits than even acquaintance with them might have furnished. Mr. Sheridan was astonished at his extraordinary faculty, and declared that he could not have imagined such power possible, had he not witnessed it. No description, he said, could have convinced him of so peculiar an instance of genius, and he protested he should not have believed it to be an unstudied effort had he not seen proof that no anticipation could have been formed of what might arise to furnish matter and opportunities for the exercise of this rare talent."—Life of Charles Mathews.

It is probable that it is to this occurrence that the author of the biography of Hook, in the Gentleman's Magazine, alludes, when he tells us

"We remember once to have heard Mr. Hook sing a song upon a company of sixty persons, each verse containing an epigram Sheridan was present, and expressed his opinion that it was one of the most extraordinary exertions of human intellect that he had ever witnessed."

Such brilliant powers of entertainment were quite as well calculated to win the substantial favour of "the first gentleman of his age" as more solid recommendations would have been; and we need not therefore be surprised that, through the patronage of the Regent, the sparkling wit and irresistible punster was in 1812 appointed to the dignified office of Accomptant General and Treasurer to the Colony of the Mauritius, worth some £2000 per annum. Hook seems to have passed his time for five years very pleasantly in his new home, "drinking his wine and munching his fruit" during the day, and passing every evening at the balls, in which the gay society of the place indulged to their hearts' content. But a melancholy page in his history was now close at hand. In 1818 his accounts were examined, and a defalcation discovered of (as was first alleged) about £20,000, but which was subsequently (in 1823) reported by the Audit Board to be £12,000. The unhappy treasurer was suddenly dragged from supper-table to prison, and shortly afterwards sent home—on account of "something wrong in the chest," he told an inquiring friend, ignorant of the true state of affairs—to London, under charge of a military guard. We have no time nor space to linger over the details of this unpleasant episode in Hook's life; but we suppose it to be now generally agreed that his only culpability—a serious one, to-be-sure—in this unfortunate affair was his lack of attention to his official duties. If, as we are assured, "during the five years that he remained on the island, Hook never visited his office, for the purpose of business, five times," we can readily believe that his subordinates paid more regard to the large cash receipts of the office; and the suicide of one of them—who, it is true, had first called attention to the deficiency in the fund—is calculated to relieve the character of the Ex-Treasurer from the serious charge of peculation. Hook reached home, after a tedious and uncomfortable passage of nearly nine months, in January, 1819, and immediately commenced that diligent use of his pen which enabled him to produce more new volumes than there remained years in the balance of his life. Indeed, from 1824 to 1841, the year of his death, a period of about seventeen years,—for about two of which he was imprisoned under Government arrest,—he wrote 38 vols., besides editing the John Bull, a weekly newspaper, and (for part of the time) The New Monthly Magazine. Of the John Bull, commenced Dec. 16, 1820, he was one of the principal founders; and his share in the stock in the palmy days of the paper brought him in no less than £2000 per annum, in addition to a liberal salary. His income for a number of years was probably not less than £3000 per annum. But his improvidence led him into continual embarrassments, which made him the prey of the most harassing anxieties. As the conductor of the John Bull, he distinguished himself by bitter invectives against Queen Caroline and her supporters, and by an enthusiastic advocacy of High-Tory principles. He was also a contributor, in early life, to the Satirist Magazine, and subsequently to Bentley's Miscellany; and, in addition to the many works which he actually produced, promised many more, and prepared materials for A History of the House of Hanover, which was also left unfinished. Shortly after his return from the Mauritius, he attempted to establish a minor magazine, called The Arcadian: but it only survived for a short time. He was the author of one article in the Quarterly Review,—that on Prince Puckler-Muskau's English Tour, in vol. xlvi.,—and probably contributed to other journals not here named. Hook was a mere butterfly of fashion, without high moral principle, and apparently without any appreciation of the duty devolving upon all to labour for the welfare and improvement of the race, and to cultivate the mind and discipline the heart for a higher sphere than that to be found in the frivolities of the ball-room or the enchantments of the stage. Hook was never married. He left six children, who, with their mother, were aided by a subscription of £3000 after their father's death. Of his remarkable literary industry for a period of almost forty years, the following list of his works affords the best illustration.

1. The Soldier's Return; a Comic Opera, 1805, 8vo. 2. Catch Him who Can, Musical Farce, 1806. 3. The Invisible Girl: Petite Piece, 1806. 4. Tekeli; Melo Drama, 1806. 5. The Fortress; Melo-Drama, 1807. 6. Music-Mad; Dram. Sketch. 7. Siege of St. Quintin; Drama, 1807. 8. Killing no Murder; Farce, 1809. 9. Safe and Sound; Opera, 1809. 10. The Man of Sorrow, 1809, 3 vols. This, his first novel, was a failure. See Lon. Month. Rev., lix. 320 321. 11. Ass-ass-ination; Serio-comic Entertainment, 1810. Not printed. 12. The Will, or The Widow; Dram. Trifle, 1810. Not printed. 13. Trial by Jury; Farce, 1811. 14. Darkness Visible; Farce, 1811. 15. Pigeons and Crows; Com., 1819. 16. Exchange no Robbery; Com., 1820. 17. Tentamen; or, an Essay towards the History of Whittington and his Cat, by Dr. Vicesimus Blenkinsop, 1820. This was a satire on Queen Caroline and Alderman Wood. 18. Peter and Paul; Drama, 1821. 19. Sayings and Doings. First Series, 1824, 3 vols. 20. Second Series, 1825, 3 vols. 21. Third Series, 1828, 3 vols. These 9 vols., originally pub. at £4 14s. 6d., have been reprinted in three vols. for 10s. 6d. See Blackw. Mag., xv. 334; xvii. 224. Hook's biographer in the Gent. Mag. says that Colburn agreed to pay £800 for the First Series, and voluntarily added 350 more, making £950 in all. But Mr. Lockhart says (in Lon. Quar. Rev., lxxii. 88) that Hook's diary represents his profits on the First Series at £2000. For the Second Series and Third Series Hook received from Colburn £1000 each. 22. Reminiscences of Michael Kelly, 1826, 2 vols. This was compiled by Hook from Kelly's "rough illiterate materials." It was reviewed by Sir Walter Scott in the Lon. Quar. Rev., xxxiv. 242–248. 23. Maxwell, 1830, 3 vols.; considered the best of Hook's novels. 24. The Life of Sir David Baird, 1832, 2 vols. This biography greatly pleased Lady Baird, who presented the author with a magnificent diamond snuff-box, presented by the Pacha of Egypt to Sir David. 25. The Parson's Daughter, 1833, 3 vols. 26. Jack Brag, 1837, 3 vols. 27. Births, Deaths, and Marriages, 1839, 3 vols. This work paid Hook about £600. 30. Love and Pride, 1833, 3 vols. 31. Gilbert Gurney, 1835. This autobiography—it almost deserves the name—was originally contributed—as was the sequel, which follows—to the New Monthly Magazine. 32. Gurney Married, 1839. This, and the preceding, (q. v.,) were collected into 3 vols. 33. Pascal Bruno; a Sicilian Story, 1837, 1 vol. 34. Cousin Geoffrey, the Old Bachelor, 1840, 3 vols. 35. Fathers and Sons, 1841, 3 vols. Originally contributed to the New Monthly Mag. 36. Precept and Practice, 1840, 3 vols. Originally contributed to the New Monthly Mag. 37. Adventures of an Actor; or, The French Stage and French People, from the Journal of M. Fleury; 2d ed., 1842, 2 vols: Edited by Hook. 38. Peregrine Bunce, 1842, 3 vols. Posthumous, and, as Mr. Lockhart insists, (Quar. Rev., lxxii. 53, 88,) not all written by Hook. Several of his novels have been repub. from time to time, and a new ed. of Maxwell—esteemed the best of all—has been issued within the last two weeks, (September, 1856.) "It would not be easy to find another artist with ability equal to Hook's for discussing the good and evil, the passions and affectations, the firs of generosity and settled systems of saving, the self-sufficiency and the deplorable weakness, the light and darkness, the virtue and the vice of this prodigious Babel. The stories which he tells might be invented with little outlay of fancy, for the best of them are far from being consistent, but the characters which live and breathe in them would make the narratives pleasing though they were as cracked as the walls of Troy."—ALLAN CUNNINGHAM: ubi supra.

"Doubtless, his wit and humour were apt to degenerate into buffoonery, his pathos into sentimentality, and his nature into conventionalism, but his knowledge of city life in its manners, habits, and language, seemed intuitive, and has been surpassed only by Fielding and Dickens. Many and multitudinous, however, as are his volumes, he has left behind him no great creation, nothing that can be pointed to as a triumphant index of the extraordinary powers which he undoubtedly possessed."—D. M. MOIR: ubi supra.

"TICKLER.—'Confound haste and hurry! What else can account for Theodore Hook's position?' Who that has read his Sayings and Doings, and, above all, his Maxwell, can doubt that had he given himself time for consideration and correction, we should have been hailing him are now, nose con., as another Smollett, if not another Le Sage? . . . .'

"NORTH.—'I agree with you: and I sincerely hope this novel-improvisatore will pause ere it is too late, and attempt something really worthy of his imagination. But as it is, such is the richness of the vis comica showered over these careless extravaganzas, that, unless he himself throws them into the shade by subsequent performances, I venture to say they have a better chance of being remembered a hundred years hence than any contemporary productions of their class—except only the best of the two great Rights of Scotland and Ireland—Jam dudum ad scriptos encænia.'—JOHN WILSON: Noctes Ambrosianæ, Sept. 1831.

"His name will be preserved. His political songs and jeux-d'esprit, when the hour comes for collecting them volume of sterling and lasting attraction; and other many lesser romances of this age shall have sufficiently enjoyed popular attention, and such, like hundreds of former generations into utter oblivion there are tales in his collected works which will be read with, we venture to think, even a greater relish than they commanded in their novelty. . . . We have already expressed our opinion, however, that Theodore Hook's abilities as a conversationist was above what he ever exemplified in his writings. We have seen him in company with very many of the most eminent men of his time, and we never, until he was near his end carried home the impression with us that he had been surpassed."—Id.: ubi supra.

Hook, Walter Farquhar, D.D., Vicar of Leeds, Preb. of Lincoln, and Chaplain-in-Ordinary to the Queen, is a son of Dr. James Hook, Dean of Worcester, and a nephew of Theodore Edward Hook, both of whom he is already come under our notice. Dr. Hook is noted for his untiring energy in the cause of church extension, and is the author of many theological publications, of which the Church Dictionary, (7th ed., 1854, 8vo.) Ecclesiastical Biography, (vols. i.–viii., 1845–52, 12mo.,) Hear the Church, (28th ed., 1858, 8vo.) a Call to Union, (4th ed. 1839, 8vo.) and the Sermons on the Miracles, (1847–48, 2 vols. fp. 8vo.) on various subjects, (2 ed., 1844, 8vo.) and those delivered before the Univ. of Oxford, (3d ed., 1847, 12mo.) are among the best known. Hooke, Nathaniel, d. 1763, a R. Catholic, of whose life few particulars are known, will always be remembered for his excellent Roman History, and as the friend of Alexander Pope, who brought the priest to his death-bed, to Bolingbroke's great disgust. 1. Trans. of the Life of Fenelon, 1723, 12mo. 2. Roman Hist., from the Building of Rome to the end of the Commonwealth, 4 vols. 4to: i. 1733; ii. 1745; iii. 1764; iv. 1771. Vols. i., ii., and iii. have been frequently reprinted in 4to; 1766, 9 vols. 8vo; 1806, 11 vols. 8vo; 1818, 11 vols. 8vo; 1830, 6 vols. 8vo. This work should be read as an introduction to Gibbon's History, which carries on the narrative.

"The Roman History of this judicious and masterly writer is a most valuable accession to the stock of historical learning. The execution is equal throughout. Mr. Hooke seems to have possessed in a very eminent degree the rare talent of separating the partisan from the historian, of which few writers are capable, and of comparing contradictory authorities with impartiality and penetration. He does not appear to have been a bigot to any principles or a slave to any authority."—Lon. Month. Rev.

"This occupies the whole ground that Livy had chosen. He was a laborious and faithful compiler. The Jesuits Catrou and Rouille far exceeded him, for they compiled a Roman History in 21 vols. 4to which is the most extensive Roman History extant."—CHANCELLOR KENT.

"It is more thorough than Ferguson's history, and far more faithful than that of Echard. Goldsmith's Rome is only a pleasant abridgment of it, while Arnold's learned and valuable work closes with the Punic wars."—Lawrence's Lives of the British Historians, 1850.

3. Trans. of Ramsay's Travels of Cyrus, 1739, 4to. 4. An Account of the Conduct of the Dowager Duchess of Marlborough, from her first coming to Court to the year 1710, 1742, 8vo. For this work the duchess rewarded the author with £1000, but soon quarrelled with him, on account, as she alleged, of his efforts to convert her to the Church of Rome. Hooke also pub. some works on the Roman Senate, on which subject he had a controversy with Dr Conyers Middleton. See Nichols's Lit. "Hooke was a virtuous man, as his history shows."—DR. JOHNSON: ubi supra.

Hooke, Robert. M.D., 1635–1702, an eminent experimental philosopher, a native of Freshwater, in the Isle of Wight, and son of the rector of that place, was educated at Christ Church, Oxford; elected in January, 1663, Curator of Experiments for the Royal Society for life, and in March of the same year succeeded Dr Ducres as Professor of Geometry in Gresham College. Hooke was unquestionably one of the most ingenious philosophers whom the world has ever seen, and perhaps no one man ever made so many discoveries,—amounting, with the corrections for illustrating them, to some hundreds. Among those which he claimed for with respect to some the priority of discovery is a matter of dispute—are: 1656 Barometer or Weather Glass; 1657. A escapement for maintaining the vibration of a pendulum; and subsequently the regulating or balance spring for watches; 1658. The Double barrelled air pump and the conical 1660. The [illegible] clock and watch-wheels; the chief phenomena of capillary attraction; the freezing of water a fixed temperature; 1664. The method of supplying air to a diving bell; the number of vibrations made by a musical chord; 1666. In this year his Micrographia was pub., in which will be found notices of many of his discoveries on respiration, the composition of the atmosphere, and the nature of light; 1666. A quadrant by reflection; 1667. The marine barometer, and the [illegible] for sounding unfathomable depths; 1674. Steam-engine on Newcomen's principle; 1679. In 1686, on the publication of Newton's Principia, Hooke (who had in 1671 attacked Newton's New Theory of Light and Colours) claimed the prior discovery of the principle of gravitation or, rather, the application of that principle. But Newton's letters to Halley settle the matter in favour of the writer. Yet great credit is undoubtedly due to Hooke. To borrow the language of Professor Playfair, when commenting on "the length to which Galileo advanced in this direction, and the point at which he stopped,"

"Hooke did not stop short in the same unaccountable manner, but made a nearer approach to the truth than any one had yet done."—Third Problem. Dissert to Encyc. Brit.

In the words of a learned lady of our day,

"The idea expressed by Kepler of the ebb and flow of the ocean being caused by the attractive influence of the moon, received in 1666 and 1674 a fresh impulse and a more extended application through the sagacity of the ingenious Robert Hooke, a noted experimental philosopher, who distinguished himself by numerous discoveries in science."—*Hannah M. "He always expressed veneration for the Deity, as may be seen in a great many passages of his writings, and seldom received any remarkable benefit from God, without thankfully acknowledging the mercy; he never made any considerable discovery in nature, invented any useful contrivance, or found out any difficult problem, without setting down his acknowledgment to God, as many places in his diary testified. Hooker, Richard, 1553?–1600, was a native of Heavy-Tree, near Exeter. His good conduct and quickness in learning whilst at the grammar-school of Exeter made him a great favourite with his tutor, at whose instance young Richard's uncle presented his nephew to Bishop Jewel, and besought him, for

"Charity's sake, to look favourably upon a poor nephew of his, whom nature had fitted for a scholar, but the estate of his parents was so narrow that they were unable to give him the advantage of learning."

He therefore expressed the hope that the bishop would "Become his patron, and prevent him from being a tradesman, for he was a boy of remarkable hopes."

The good bishop sent him to Oxford and placed him under charge of Dr. John Cole, President of Corpus Christi College, who appointed him a tutor and Bible-clerk of the college. He now enjoyed the advantage of the instructions of Dr. John Reynolds for four years. In 1577 he was chosen Fellow of his college. In 1579 he received the appointment of deputy-professor of Hebrew. In 1581 he was ordained; and, according to the college-statutes, he was immediately appointed to preach a sermon at St. Paul's Cross, London. He lodged at a dwelling appropriated to the preachers, which was called the Shunamite's house. Much indisposed by the fatigue of his journey to the city, he was so grateful for the kind attentions of Mrs. Churchman, who had charge of this "house of the prophets," that his complaisance got the better of his judgment. Walton tells the story so quaintly that, even at the risk of being charged with countenancing a slander against "provident" mothers, we must quote it:

"He thought himself bound in conscience to believe all that she said: so that the good man came to be persuaded by her, 'That he was a man of a tender constitution;' and 'that it was best for him to have a wife that might prove a nurse to him; such an one as might both prolong his life and make it more comfortable; and such an one she could and would provide for him if he thought fit to marry.' And he, not considering that the children of this world are wiser in their generation than the children of light, but, like a true Nathaniel, fearing no guile, because he meant none, did give her such a power as Eleazer was trusted with (you may read it in the book of Genesis) when he was sent to choose a wife for Isaac; for even so he trusted her to choose for him; promising upon a fair summons to return to London and accept of her choice. And he did so, in that or about the year following. Now, the wife provided for him was her daughter Joan, who brought him neither beauty nor portion: and for her conditions, they were too like that wife's which is by Solomon compared to a dripping house."

"Which A. Wood explains, by saying, that she was a silly, clownish woman, and withal a meer Xantippe."

What a proof of the kindness of heart of good Mrs. Churchman, to intrust the happiness of her daughter to the young divine! So anxious was she to promote his comfort and prolong what promised to be a valuable life, that she was willing to submit to the sacrifice, and deprive herself of the society of her dear Joan! But will it be believed that the magnanimity of this excellent woman has been questioned, and that she has even been blamed as a "managing mother," for thus converting Miss Joan Churchman into Mrs. Richard Hooker? So uncharitable is human nature! And, from some modern instances which occasionally occur of like censure of mothers whose disinterestedness is not appreciated, it would seem that detraction was not confined to the days of Mrs. Churchman. If his wife did not prove, as his mother in-law promised she should, a "comfort" to him, we have evidence that he bore his troubles with laudable equanimity. Two of his former pupils, Mr. Edwin Sandys and Mr. George Cranmer, paid him a visit at his parsonage at Drayton-Beauchamp, in Buckinghamshire, of which he became Rector in 1584; and we are told that "They found him with a book in his hand (it was the Odes of Horace,) he being then, like humble and innocent Abel, tending his small allotment of sheep in a common field; which he told these gentlemen he was forced to do then (or that his servant was gone home to dine and assist his wife to do some necessary household business. But when his servant returned and relieved him his two pupils attended him unto his house, where their best entertainment was his quiet company, which it was presently denied them; for Richard was called to rock the cradle; and the rest of their welcome was so like this, that they staid but till next morning, which was time enough to discover and pity their tutor's condition. . . . They were forced to leave him to the company of his wife Joan, and seek themselves a quieter lodging for the next night. But at their parting from him, Mr Cranmer said 'Good Tutor, I am sorry your lot is fallen in no better ground as to your parsonage; and more sorry your wife proves not a more comfortable companion, after you have wearied your thoughts in your restless studies.' To whom the good man replied, 'My dear George, it saints have usually a double share in the miseries of this life, I, that am none, ought not to repine at what my wise Creator hath appointed for me; but labour (as indeed I do daily) to submit to his will, and possess my soul in patience and peace.'" Walton's Life of Hooker.

Here was a model husband indeed.

To this visit of his former pupils are we indebted for that immortal production, The Laws of Ecclesiastical Polity. Edwin Sandys urged his father, then Bishop of London, to find a more comfortable post for his quondam tutor. This led to his appointment, in 1585, after the death of "Father Alvy," of Master of the Temple for life, being then in his 33d or 34th year. Hooker was the morning lecturer, and Mr. Travers held forth in the afternoon. The latter gentleman followed the views of Cartwright, the Puritan, and inclined to the Presbyterian side in discipline. This contrariety of sentiment led to an amicable controversy between the lecturers, who seem to have entertained for each other all due respect. Thus, it was observed, "the forenoon sermon spoke Canterbury, and the afternoon Geneva." Archbishop Whitgift prohibited the lectures of Mr. Travers. Travers appealed to the queen, but in vain; he then published his manuscript, which was answered by Hooker. This answer may be considered the germ of his great work, Of the Laws of Ecclesiastical Polity. He commenced his work in the Temple; but, finding less distraction requisite, he solicited the archbishop to permit him to retire to some more quiet post. Accordingly, that prelate presented him, in 1591, to the rectory of Boscombe, in Wiltshire, and to the prebend of Nether-Haven in the Cathedral of Salisbury, of which he was also made sub dean. Four books of his work were finished at Boscombe, and printed in 1593, fol.; again, 1594, fol. In 1595 Queen Elizabeth presented him to the rectory of Bishopsbourne, in Kent, where he lived the rest of his days. Whilst sailing between London and Gravesend, he caught a cold which carried him off at the early age of forty-seven. He died the death of the righteous, and to his triumphant soul "the doors of Heaven seemed to open so wide" that he was enabled to catch a view of that ineffable glory which surrounds the throne of "the High and Lofty One who inhabiteth Eternity." Happy are they who have the good report of the members of their own household and of their intimate associates; for they have the best opportunity of knowing our faults and detecting all of our infirmities. Our excellent author does not lack this weighty attestation.

"My master, Hooker, was a good man and a good scholar"

So testifies his parish clerk.

The 5th Book of his Ecclesiastical Polity was published in 1597, fol.; 1632, fol.; the 7th in 1617, (according to Biog. Brit.,) and the 8th and 8th (the conclusion) in 1648, 4to. The eight books, with a few sermons and tracts, published separately in 1612–13, and a Life of Hooker, were pub. in Dr. Gauden's edition of his works, Lon., 1662, fol.; 2d ed., 1666, fol., with Life, by Walton. It is contended, indeed, that "all the eight books, with certain tractates and sermons, together with the author's life, were published in two vols. in fol., 1617." See Bliss's Wood's Athen. Oxon., i. 697; Biog. Brit. Other edits. of Hooker's Works, including the Ecclesiastical Polity: Lon., 1676, '82, 1705, '19, '23, fol.; Dubl., 1721, fol. The Ecclesiastical Polity has been pub. separately,—sometimes with an Analysis, Digest, &c., and we have Abridgments of and Selections from the Works of this great man, for those who do not wish to purchase the whole. For titles of his separate publications, discussions relative to the authenticity of the 6th, 7th, and 8th books, as published, and for further information respecting the author, see his Life by Walton, Camden, &c.; Biog. In the Laws of Ecclesiastical Polity, Hooker presents an elaborate, dignified, and learned defence of the ministry, ritual, and ceremonies of the Church of England. Its polemical arguments have satisfied many; its literary merits have charmed all. Its fame having reached Rome, Cardinal Allen and Dr Stapleton recommended it so strongly to Clement VIII., that he wished to have it translated into Latin, in which language Stapleton read to him the 1st book, declaring that "There is no learning, that this man hath not searched into; nothing too hard for his understanding. This man indeed deserves the name of an author. His books will get reverence by age, for there is in them such seeds of eternity, that, if the rest be like them, they shall continue till the last fire shall devour all learning."

James I remarked to Archbishop Whitgift:

"I have received more satisfaction in reading a leaf or paragraph in Mr. Hooker, though it were but about the fashion of churches or church music, or the like, but especially of the sacraments, than I have had in reading large treatises written but of one of those subjects by others, though very learned men."

Charles I commended the five books then extant of the Polity to his dear children as an excellent means to satisfie private scruples and settle the publique peace of the Church and Kingdom."

Our learned author seems to have a right by long use to the title of "The Judicious Hooker."

"The admirable and unperishable work of Hooker is his Ecclesiastical Polity." Bishop Lowth in the preface to his English Grammar, has bestowed the highest praise upon the purity of Hooker's style. Bishop Warburton, in his book on the Alliance between the Church and State, often quotes him and calls him "the excellent, the admirable, the learned man of our order." — Dr Parr.

Of the Illustrious Hooker—whose memory is embalmed in the learned and biography of him by Isaac Walton—it is sufficient to say that his Ecclesiastical Polity is, of all works of that description extant, the most masterly and convincing. Never was logic more ably employed to combat error and establish truth; and the sum of common sense as well as of spiritual comfort, which pervades the pages of that work will render it, to the latest posterity a prize as well as instructive performance."—Ir. Brooks, Lit. Comp., vol 1825, '55, 56.

The following is no small eulogy:

"Should the English constitution in Church and State be unhappily subverted by some convulsion of extraordinary force, this book alone probably contains materials sufficient for repairing and rebuilding the shattered fabric."

"He was an able champion for the ecclesiastical hierarchy. His work displays immense learning, reflection, and eloquence, and is still referred to as a great authority upon the whole range of moral and political principles. . . . The Ecclesiastical Polity has furnished, for nearly 200 years, an invaluable defence of the clergy to studious men; but we want, says the Rev. E. Bickersteth a popular work of the like sound judgment, and evangelical character, for the establishment of the young, and laymen in general. . . . Keble's preface, like Walton's life, should precede every subsequent edition. Hooker is universally distinguished for long-drawn melody and mellifluence of language, and his works must find a place in every well chosen clerical library. His eloquence has been deservedly praised. But the justice of the epithet 'Judicious,' which his admirers have attached to his name, is rather more questionable. Certainly there never was a more thorough going advocate of things established than he has shown himself in the whole Fifth Book, forming more than a third part of the entire Ecclesiastical Polity."—Lowndes's Brit. Lib., 380, 599.

"Hooker was not permitted to occupy the field of controversy alone. Bilson, Bancroft, Bridges, Cosins, and Dr Adrian Saravia, a German benefited in England, appeared on the same side. Bradshaw defended the cause of the Puritans against Bilson, Fenner against Bridges, Morrice against Cosins, and Beza against Sarravia, although the press was shut against them by law, and their books could only be published by stealth."—BOGUE.

"The Ecclesiastical Polity of Hooker, who was superior to the pedantry of the times, is worthy of the present age for its liberal and manly sentiment."—Comparisons of the Lit. of the Present Age with that of the Reigns of Eliz. and Anne, by Rev. R. Polwhele. See Goodhugh's Lib. Man., 165.

"His works manifest great vigour of thought, eloquence of expression, soundness of judgment, and decidedly evangelical sentiment: his Ecclesiastical Polity is one of the bulwarks of the Established Church of England."—BICKERSTETH: Christian Student.

"For a defence of the Church of England against the Sectaries, it will suffice inter omnium, to study Hooker's Ecclesiastical Politie, a work bearing all the marks of immortality, as destined to excite the admiration of men while good letters remain amongst them."—Bishop Warburton's Directions to his Student.

"The Ecclesiastical Polity is the principal work of this able and venerable man and perhaps the best defence of the Church of England ever published. Those who dissent from his doctrine of church order may, nevertheless, read this remarkable production with great advantage, because of the dignity and force of the language in which it is written, the author's meekness in controversy, and the very just and impressive views of revealed truth which he has often introduced."—Dr E. Williams's Christian Preacher.

"Amply as Hooker enriched his native tongue, he frequently presents the cumbrous gait and the rough aspect of a pioneer. Taylor surpasses him in all the charms of imagination; Hall in the sweetness and colour of his thoughts; Barrow, in the illumination of his argument. But Hooker excelled them all in muscular vigour. . . . We turn to his works, as to some mighty bulwark against infidelity, impregnable to the assaults of successive generations."—WILLMOTT.

For other comparisons of Hooker to Taylor, Barrow, &c., see BARROW, ISAAC, D.D.; TAYLOR, JEREMY, D.D. Referring to Hooker's theological sentiments, Mr. Macaulay remarks:

"The school of divinity of which Hooker was the chief occupies a middle place between the school of Cranmer and the school of Laud: and Hooker has in modern times been claimed by the Arminians as an ally."—History of England, vol. i. 1849.

Dr. Drake remarks of Hooker's composition:

"Though the words for the most part, are well chosen and pure, the arrangement of the sentences is often harsh, and formed almost exclusively on the idiom and construction of the Latin. Much strength and vigour are derived from this adoption, but perspicuity, ease, and ease, are too generally sacrificed. There is, notwithstanding the general feature of his composition, an occasional simplicity in his pages, both of style and sentiment, which truly charms."—Essays Illustrative of the Tatler, &c., vol. i. 10.

Mr. Beloe complains that

"Neither Walton in his Life of Hooker, nor Bishop Gr[illegible]den, nor many others that give an account of Hooker and his [illegible] make mention of the particular books or [illegible]h gave occasion to his writing the Ecclesiastical Polity."

Mr. Beloe proceeds to supply this omission in Anecdotes of Literature and Scarce Books, vol. i. p. 21.

Mr. Hallam's authority is, in all cases, one of the most weighty which can be adduced:

"The finest as well as the most philosophical writer of the Elizabethan period is Hooker. The first book of the Ecclesiastical Polity is at this day one of the masterpieces of English eloquence. His periods indeed, are generally much too long; and too intricate, but portions of them are often beautifully rhythmical. His language is rich in English idiom without vulgarity, and in words of a Latin source without pedantry, he is more uniformly solemn than the usage of later times permits, or even than writers of that time, such as Bacon, conversant with mankind as well as books, would have reckoned necessary; but the example of ancient orators and philosophers, upon themes so grave as those which he discusses, may justify the serious dignity from which he does not depart. Hooker is perhaps the first of such in England who adorned his prose with the images of poetry, but this he has done more judiciously and with more moderation than others of great name; and we must be bigots in Attic severity before we can object to some of his grand figures of speech. We may praise him also for avoiding the superfluous luxury of quotations—a rock on which the writers of the succeeding age were so frequently wrecked."—Introduc. to Lit. of Europe; ed. 1854, vol. ii. 198.

"The Ecclesiastical Polity of Hooker is a monument of real learning, in profane as well as theological antiquity."—Ibid., vol. i. 518.

After such a cloud of witnesses to the merits of this eminent writer, we trust that it is unnecessary for us to urge our readers—young and old—to devote at least a portion of their days and nights to the pages of Hooker. And, that they may be persuaded so to do, we shall gratify them with a few more eloquent lines of glowing eulogy from the same distinguished scholar who has opened the paths of learning to so many of the past and present generation, and who still remains—now on the verge of fourscore years—to see the abundant fruits of his labours, and receive the grateful benedictions of many whom he has guided to intellectual elevation and stimulated to the acquisition of mental riches of priceless worth. Of the author of the Ecclesiastical Polity, Mr. Hallam does not scruple to declare:

"He not only opened the mine, but explored the depths, of our native eloquence. So stately and graceful is the march of his periods, so various the fall of his musical cadences upon the ear, so rich in images, so condensed in sentences, so grave and noble his diction, so little is there of vulgarity in his racy idiom, of pedantry in his learned phrase, that I know not whether any later writer has more admirably displayed the capacities of our language, or produced passages more worthy of comparison with the splendid monuments of antiquity. If we compare the first book of the Ecclesiastical Polity with what bears perhaps most resemblance to it of any thing extant, the treatise of Cicero de Legibus, it will appear somewhat perhaps inferior, through the imperfection of our language,—which, with all its force and dignity, does not equal the Latin in either of those qualities,—and certainly more tedious and diffuse in some of its reasonings; but [illegible]d in sentiment or less bright in fancy, [illegible]s more comprehensive and profound in the foundations of its philosophy.'—Const. Hist. of Eng., ed. 1854, i. 215.

Hooker, Richard. Weekly Miscellany, 1736–38, 2 vols. 8vo.

Hooker, Thomas, 1586–1647. "The Renowned Pastor of Hartford Church, and Pillar of Connecticut Colony," a native of Marfield, Leicestershire, educated at and Fellow of Emanuel College, Cambridge, took holy orders and preached for some time in London. In 1626 he became assistant to a clergyman at Chelmsford, and officiated with great reputation until silenced for Non-conformity by Laud, then Bishop of London. He subsequently went to Holland, where he preached for two or three years at Delft, Amsterdam, and Rotterdam, and in 1633 emigrated to Boston, New England, in company with John Cotton and Samuel Stone. In October of the same year he assumed the charge of the congregation at New-Town, now Cambridge, Mass., Mr. Stone acting as his assistant. In June, 1636, in company with Mr. Stone and about one hundred other persons, he removed to "a fertile spot on the banks of the Connecticut," which they called Hartford,—the name by which it is still known,—in honour of Mr. Stone, who was a native of Hartford, in England. In his new location, Hooker was distinguished by the same unquenchable zeal, untiring energy, and fiery eloquence, which were his characteristics from early youth, and no name had more influence in the churches of New England. He was carried off by an epidemical fever, July 7, 1647, aged 61. John Higginson transcribed from his MSS. about 200 sermons, and sent them to England, and about half of them were pub. A number of his theological treatises were pub. before his death, and some were posthumous. Among the best-known of his works are—A Survey of the Sum of Church Discipline, The Soul's Implantation, The Application of Redemption, and the Poor Doubting Christian drawn to Christ.

1. Tracts and Serms., Lon., 1638. 2. The Soul's Preparation for Christ; or, a Treatise of Contrition, on Acts ii. 37, 1637, 12mo; 1643. 3. The Soul's Vocation; or, Effectual Calling to Christ, 1637, '38, 4to. 4. The Soul's Implantation into Christ, 1637. 5. Four Treatises,—viz.: The Carnal Hypocrite; Churches Deliverance; Deceitfulness of Sin; and the Benefit of Afflictions, 1638, 8vo. 6. The Soul's Possession of Christ, with a Serm. on 2 Kings xi. 12, 1638, 8vo. 7. The Poore Doubting Christian drawne to Christ, 1638, 18mo. 8. Of Self-Denial and Self-Trial, on Matt. xvi. 24, 2 Cor. xiii. 5, and John i. 12, 13, 1640. 9. The Pattern of Perfection, 1640, 8vo. 10. The Soul's Humiliation, on Luke xiv. 15, &c., 1640. 11. Serm. on Deut. xxix. 24, 25, 1644, 4to. 12. Expos. of the Lord's Prayer, 1645, 4to. 13. The Saint's Guide; in three Treatises, 1645, 8vo. 14. A Survey of the Summe of Church Discipline, by Thomas Hooker and John Cotton, 1648, 4to. Pub. under the supervision of Dr. Thomas Goodwin, of London, and highly commended by him. See his Address prefixed. 15. The Covenant of Grace Opened; in several Serms., 1649, 4to. 16. The Saint's Dignity and Duty; in several Serms., 1651. 17. The Spiritual Rule of the Lord's Kingdom. 18. The Application of Redemption, 1656; 2d ed., 1659.

The death of the excellent Hooker was lamented as a public loss, and his virtues were celebrated—if not in as many languages as those which chanted the praises of Louis le Grand—in majestic Latin and pathetic Saxon. John Cotton, Elijah Corlet, Ezekiel Rogers, Peter Bulkley, and Edward Johnson, were among those who vied in epicedian strains over the lamented dead. The first-named honoured his departed friend both in prose and verse;—in be former telling us that Hooker "Agmen ducere et dominari in Concionibus, gratia Spiritus Sancti et virtute plenis:" and that he was "Vir Solertis et Acerrimi judicii;" and in the latter expressing himself in the following rather homely stanzas:

> "Twas of Geneva's heroes said with wonder,
> (Those worthies three,) Farel was wont to thunder,
> Viret like rain on tender grass to show'r,
> But Calvin lively oracles to pour.
> All these in HOOKER'S spirit did remain,
> A son of thunder and a show'r of rain;
> A pourer-forth of lively oracles,
> In saving souls, the sum of miracles"

"'Tis that Hooker, of whom I may venture to say that the famous Romanist who wrote a book, De Tribus Thomas; or Of Three Thomas's,—meaning Thomas the Apostle, Thomas Becket, and Sir Thomas More,—did not a thousandth part so well suit his Thomas's, as a New Englander might if he should write a book, De Duobus Thomas; or, Of Two Toomses and with Thomas the Apostle joyn our celebrious Thomas Hooker may one Thomas, even our apostolical Hooker, would in just balances weigh down

Hoole, John, 1727–1803, a native of Moorfields, London, was for nearly 40 years 1744–87 a clerk in the East India House. 1. Trans. of Dante's Tasso's Jerusalem Delivered, Lon., 1763, 2 vols. 8vo. We have already noticed this translation in our life of FAIRFAX, EDWARD, q.v.

"Among the valuable acquisitions I made about this time (of leaving the High School) was an acquaintance with Tasso's Jerusalem, through the flat medium of Mr Hoole's translation."—Sir Walter Scott's Autobiography

"The reader will observe in the foregoing specimens of Hoole how a bad translator takes refuge from the real feelings of his author in vague terms and cant phrases . . . When Mr Hoole takes leave of his author, it is for want of strength to accompany him; when Fairfax does it, it is to lead you into some beautiful corner of his fancy."—LEIGH HUNT: Critique on Fairfax's Tasso.

Critical Essays of John Scott, of Amwell; with his Life, by J. Hoole, 1785, 8vo. Dr. Johnson—with whom our author was intimate—valued Hoole's abilities much more highly than they deserved: see FAIRFAX, EDWARD. Modern critics, as we have seen, have deducted largely from the estimate of the great lexicographer:

"Mr. Hoole, the translator of Tasso and Ariosto and in that capacity a noble transmuter of gold into lead . . . He did exactly so many couplets day by day, neither more nor less, and habit had made it light to him, however heavy it might seem to the reader."—SIR WALTER SCOTT: Diary, June 4, 1826.

"Ben Jonson was a great man. Hoole a very small man. But Hoole, coming after Pope, had learned how to manufacture decasyllable verses, and poured them forth by thousands and tens of thousands, all as well-timed, as smooth, and as like each other, as the blocks which have passed through Mr. Brunel's mill in the dock-yard at Portsmouth. Ben's heroic couplets resemble blocks rudely hewn out by an unpractised hand with a blunt hatchet. Take as a specimen his translation of a celebrated passage in the Æneid:

"'This child our parent earth, stirred up with spite'

Compare with these jagged misshapen distichs the mechanical fabric which Hoole's machine produces in unlimited abundance. We take the first lines on which we open in his version of Tasso. They are neither better nor worse than the rest." T. B. MACAULAY: Edin. Rev., July, 1843; and his Collected Essays, Lon., 1854, iii. 350.

Hooper, John, the Reformer and Martyr, 1495–1554, a native of Somersetshire, educated at Merton College, Oxford, was for some time one of the Cistercians, or White Monks, but subsequently embraced the principles of the Reformation. In 1539 he fled to Zurich, and remained abroad until the accession of Edward VI. In 1550 he was consecrated Bishop of Gloucester, and about two years later he had the bishopric of Worcester given to him, in commendam. On the accession of Mary, July, 1553, he was a prominent mark for the persecutors; and, refusing to recant, he was burnt in the city of Gloucester, near his own cathedral, on the 9th of the February ensuing. He was the author of many theological treatises, expositions, and serms., for an account of which, see Fox's Martyrs; Burnet's Hist. of the Reformation; Strype's Cranmer; Fathers of the English Church, vol. v.; British Reformers, vol. iv.; Tracts of Ang. Fathers, vol. ii.; Watt's Bibl. Brit.; Wordsworth's Eccles. Biog. The reader must procure the following collections of the writings of this excellent man:

Early Writings, edited, with Biographical Notice, Index, &c., by S. Carr, Camb., (Univ. Press.) 1843, 8vo. Contents:—A Declaration of Christ and his Office; Answer to Bishop Gardiner; a Declaration of the X. Commandments; Sermons upon the Prophet Jonas; and Funeral Sermon on Rev. xiv. 13.

Later Writings, together with his Letters and other Pieces, edited, with Biographical Notice, Index, &c., by C. Nevinson, Camb., (Univ. Press,) 1852, 8vo. Contents:—A Lesson of the Incarnation of Christ; Confession of Faith; Annotations on Romans xiii.; Copy of Visitation Book; Expositions of Psalms xxiii., lxii., lxxiii., and lxxvii.; Treatise respecting Judge Hales; Epistola ad Episcopos, &c.; Appellatio ad Parliamentum; Hyperaspismus de vera Doctrina et Usa Cœnæ Domini, &c.

Hooper, Lucy, 1816–1841, a native of Newburyport, Massachusetts, removed in her 15th year to Brooklyn, Long Island, where she resided until her death. In early life she contributed many poetical essays to the Long Island Star, and the New Yorker, a daily paper; and in 1840 pub. a vol. of prose sketches, entitled Scenes from Real Life. She also gave to the world at the same time An Essay on Domestic Happiness. During her last illness she was preparing for publication a work entitled The Poetry of Flowers, which appeared shortly after her decease. In 1842 Mr. John Keese edited a collection of her Literary Remains, prefaced by a Memoir; and an enlarged edit. of her Poetical Works was pub. in 1848. Specimens of the poetry of this accomplished lady are given in Griswold's Female Poets of America, where the reader will find eloquent tributes to the memory of Miss Hooper from John G. Whittier, Henry T. Tuckerman, and Dr. John W. Francis. See also Democratic Review, xi. 90.

Notice of the 4th edit.

'The publisher has put, deservedly, upon the new edition the most unequivocal mark of its superiority, by increasing the price of the work. The value of the book is not to be estimated by the number of pages, but by the quantity of matter. Much of the matter which is now added to this edition, has been long before the public, in the pages of the Medical Gazette, and other periodicals, and has been read with avidity by all who are in pursuit of information on the diseases of the heart.'—Dublin Journal.

Hope, Sir Thomas, d. 1646, a Scotch lawyer, was the son of Henry Hope, a merchant of Edinburgh, and subsequently of Holland, where, as in England, the family have been distinguished for two centuries. 1. Hope, Thomas, M.D. 1. Operation on the Eye; Phil. Trans., 1744. 2. Daniel's Method of Couching, ibid., 1751.

Hope, Thomas, d. 1811, of the same family as Sir Thomas Hope (ante), was one of the three brothers of this name well known as wealthy merchants of Amsterdam. The subject of our notice devoted a considerable time, whilst still quite young, to extensive peregrinations in various parts of Europe, Asia and Africa, and, after returning from Eastern travels, purchased two spacious mansions, one in Duchess Street, London, and the other ('Deepdene') in the vicinity of Dorking. Thus permanently settled in England, Mr. Hope rendered his residences famous as choice collections of the finest specimens of art. The reader will be familiar with Mr. Hope's town mansion in Britton and Pugin's Public Buildings of London, and in Westmacott's Account of the British Galleries of Painting and Sculpture. For a description of 'Deepdene,' see Aubrey's Perambulation of the County of Surrey, Neale's Seats of Noblemen and Gentlemen, and Pyne's Views in Surrey. The wealth of all this magnificence died February 3, 1831, leaving a personal property of £150,000. To give some idea of the vast wealth of members of this family, we may note that Henry Philip Hope, brother of the subject of this notice, left at his death in 1810 a collection of diamonds and other precious stones valued at £120,000, and to each of his three nephews a legacy of £10,000. Each of his three nephews a younger member of the family has within the last few years bequeathed a hundred-and-sixty thousand pounds to various institutions in London at a cost of £1,000.

Mr. Hope's love of the fine arts, classical enthusiasm, and his exquisite perception of the beautiful in articles of use as well as the appliances of luxury, were developed in every part of the mansion which have deservedly given him a high rank in architecture. 1. Household Furniture and Internal Decorations, executed from Designs by the Author. Lon., 1807. 1 vol., £5 5s. Large paper, atlas, £10 10s. Pp. 175. This work was minutely handled by Lord Jeffrey in the Edin. Rev. vi. 1.

'It is upon Grecian principles that Mr. Hope subsequently, and with a correctness and animation of taste which, in the then state of learning, must have appeared wonderful, has delivered his opinions upon this subject in terms which, if not always free from obscurity, are at least full of interest and originality, and which have been studied with success and advantage by the most eminent artists of the present day.'—Edin. Rev.

'Mr. Hope's work is the first which has attempted to furnish a house with taste and propriety.'—Edin. Rev.

'Under the fostering hand of Mr. Hope, subsequently, it [the upholstery art] was treated with a correctness and animation of taste which, in the then state of learning, must have appeared wonderful. The opinions upon this subject in terms which, if not always free from obscurity, are at least full of interest and originality, and which have been studied with success and advantage by the most eminent artists of the present day readers. As the work appeared anonymously, the authorship was for some time a matter of doubt. A writer in Blackwood (x. 208–206, in Familiar Epistles to Christopher North, Letter 11) ridiculed the idea of Hope's producing such a work:

"Mr. Hope is a very respectable and decorous gentleman,—he can write, with some endeavour, passably about chests of drawers, paper hangings, and cushions as soft as his own or any other brains; but that he has either the courage or the power to compile such a work as Anastasius, I utterly and entirely deny. . . . I would call your attention to a few circumstances that, I conceive you will allow, constitute strong proofs that Anastasius is the production of Byron."

This Epistle elicited a letter from Hope, in the next number of the Magazine, (x. 312,) in which he claimed the sole authorship of ANASTASIUS. See also Blackwood's Mag., xv. 51. From the many reviews before us, by eminent critics, of this remarkable medley of Oriental romance and classic travel, we have space for but brief quotations:

"This is an extraordinary work in every sense of that word. . . . . It seems to be the object of the writer to unite the entertainment of a novel with the information of a book of travels. . . . Anastasius and the volumes which record his memoirs form a paradox of contradiction. The Greek adventurer is acute and dull, generous and niggardly, tender hearted and cruel, and the book, in harmony with its hero, is rational and absurd, profound and shallow, amusing and tiresome to a degree beyond what we should have thought it possible to achieve in the same performance. If we had not seen it exemplified in the author before us."—WILLIAM GIFFORD: Lon. Quar. Rev., xxiv. 511–529.

"Mr. Hope will excuse us—but we could not help exclaiming, in reading it, 'Is this Mr. Thomas Hope?—Is this the man of chairs and tables—the gentleman of sphinxes, the dolphins of coal-boxes—he who meditated on mufflineers and planned pokers?'—Whence has he hidden all this eloquence and poetry up to this hour?—How is it that he has, all of a sudden, burst out into descriptions which would not disgrace the pen of Tacitus—and displayed a depth of feeling, and a vigour of imagination, which Lord Byron could not excel?' We do not shrink from encountering the full odium of this eulogium. The work now before us places him at once in the highest list of eloquent writers and of sages. . . . The sum of our eulogium is that Mr. Hope, without being very successful in his story or remarkably successful in the delineation of character, has written a novel which all clever people of certain age should read, because it is full of marvellously fine things."—SYDNEY SMITH: Edin. Rev., xxxv. 92–102: Works, Lon. 1854, ii. 173–186.

That profound classical scholar and accomplished belles-lettres critic, Edward Everett, of Massachusetts,—still, fortunately for our national reputation, living amongst us in the maturity of his extraordinary powers, and hardly even yet become "the old man eloquent,"—wrote, nearly forty years ago, for the columns of the North American Review, an elaborate review of Anastasius, which choice piece of criticism we beg to commend to the perusal of our readers. As regards the work reviewed, we can hardly advise so general a perusal.

In the words of Mr. Everett:

"We are afraid to recommend the book itself to indiscriminate perusal. Some parts are dull and some offensive; and the whole of it requires more geographical knowledge, to be read understandingly, than can be supposed to be in the possession of general readers. For, notwithstanding what we have said of the elevated character of the novel writing of the present day, we presume no one reads a novel with a map. Without a very good map, Anastasius will be unintelligible. . . . The author has occasionally indulged in a licentiousness equally immoral and disgusting."—N. Amer. Rev. Oct. 1820, xi. 271–306. See also Lon. Month. Rev., xci. 1, 131; Edin. Month. Rev., iv. 433.

"Hope has a pure and a quick fancy, and maintains the spirit and manner of his characters with remarkable consistency and truth. . . . The faults of the work are twofold, the chief character is a cold-hearted scoundrel, whom we loathe from our soul; and the language is neither prose nor poetry, but a

"'Babylonish dialect
Which learned pedants most affect.'"

ALLAN CUNNINGHAM: Biog. and Crit. Hist. of the Lit. of the Last Fifty Years.

We have seen that Lord Byron generally obtained the credit of the authorship of Anastasius:

"When Anastasius first made its appearance, every body thought Lord Byron was taking to write prose; for there was no living author but Lord Byron supposed capable of having written such a book. When Byron denied the work, (and in fact, his lordship could not have written it,) people looked about again, and wondered who the author could be. . . . The book was absolutely crammed with bold incidents and brilliant descriptions, with historical details, given in a style which Hume or Gibbon could scarcely have surpassed, and with analysis of human character and impulse, such as even Mandeville might have been proud to acknowledge."—Blackwood's Mag., xv. 51.

Such being the character of the work, we need not be surprised that Lord Byron was not offended with the imputation of its authorship:

"Byron spoke to-day in terms of high commendation of Hope's Anastasius; said that he wept bitterly over many pages of it, and for two reasons:—first, that he had not written it, and secondly, that Hope had; for that it was necessary to like a man excessively to pardon his writing such a book.—a book, as he said, excelling all recent productions as much in wit and talent as in true pathos. He added that he would have given his two most approved poems to have been the author of Anastasius."—Countess of Blessington's Conversations with Lord Byron.

At the time of his death Mr. Hope left two works in MSS., which were subsequently given to the world, viz.:

6. An Essay on the Origin and Prospects of Man, 1831, 3 vols. 8vo. This work affords a striking illustration of the absurdities into which chimerical speculations and the vagaries of an unbalanced imagination will hurry men whose education and opportunities would have promised better things. Mr. Hope, whilst discarding the authority of the Holy Scriptures, offers us instead of them the unsupported excogitations of his own not very sober brain. He professes, indeed, to believe the Bible—just so far as he finds it to consist with his own notions of truth. But the folly and incongruity of the author's speculations have been so well exposed by Robert Southey, in his letter to Henry Taylor of July 15, 1851, (see Southey's Life and Correspondence,) that we may be excused from lingering on the subject. A review of the work—of about as little value as the book itself—will be found in the Lon. Month. Rev. for July, 1831, 390–405.

7. An Historical Essay on Architecture; illustrated by Drawings made by him in Italy and Germany. 1835, 2 vols. 8vo; 3d ed., 1840, 2 vols. r. 8vo, 99 Plates, £2: Analytical Index to, by Edward Cresy, r. 8vo, 6s. An elaborate review of this work will be found in Lon. Gent. Mag. for June, 1835. The critic styles Hope's Essay

Hopkins, Rev. Erastus, b. 1810, at Hadley, Mass., settled three years in South Carolina, and four years in Troy, New York, was for seven years President of the Connecticut River Railroad Company, and has represented the town of Northampton in the Massachusetts Legislature for seven years out of the last ten. He is the author of The Family a Religious Institution, Troy, 1840; a number of Political Speeches, Reports, &c.; and some articles in the political and religious periodicals of the day.

Hopkins, Ezekiel, 1633–1690, a native of Sandford, Devonshire, educated at Magdalen College, Oxford, became minister of St. Mary Woolnoth, London, and subsequently of St. Mary's, Exeter; Dean of Raphoe, 1669; Bishop of Raphoe, 1671; trans. to Londonderry, 1681. In 1688 he was driven from his diocese by the forces under the Earl of Tyrconnel; and, taking refuge in London, he was elected minister of Aldermanbury in September, 1689, and there remained until his death. Hopkins, John, the principal successor of Thomas Sternhold in versifying the Psalms of David, was admitted A.B at Oxford in 1544, and is supposed to have been subsequently a clergyman and schoolmaster in Suffolk. He versified fifty-eight of the Psalms, which bear his initials. The complete version was first printed (by John Day) in 1562, 4to, though portions had appeared before.

"Of his abilities as a teacher of the Graces he has left a specimen in some Latin stanzas prefixed to Foxe's Martyrology. He is rather a better English poet than Sternhold."—Warton's Hist. of Eng. Poet., q. v.

Hopkins, William, 1706–1786, an Arian writer, a clergyman of the Church of England, a native of Monmouth, was entered at All-Souls College, Oxf., 1724; Vicar of Bolney, Sussex, 1731; Master of the Grammar School of Cuckfield, 1756; Curate of Slaugham, 1766. He pub. several anonymous pamphlets against compulsory subscription to the XXXIX. Articles, &c., but is best known by the following work: Exodus: a corrected Translation, with Notes Critical and Explanatory, Lon., 1784, 4to.

"The chief value of this translation is, that it gives all the additions and variations of the Samaritan and Septuagint. The author's heterodoxy is offensively avowed, both in the preface and notes."—Orme's Bibl. Bib.

"The translator has, in general, executed his task with fidelity."—Horne's Bibl. Bib.

"In the notes we meet with little that can gratify the taste of critical and curious readers; and his severe reflections on the Articles and Liturgy of the Church of England might well have been spared in a work of this nature."—Lon. Month. Rev., O. S., lxxii 412.

Hopkinson, Francis, 1737–1791, a native of Philadelphia, the son of Thomas Hopkinson, an Englishman, was educated at the college (now the University of Pennsylvania) in Philadelphia, and subsequently studied law. In 1765 we find him in England, where he resided for two years, settling, on his return, at Bordentown, New Jersey, where he married Miss Ann Borden. In 1776 he represented New Jersey in the American Congress, and was one of the signers of the Declaration of Independence. He held for a number of years an appointment in the Loan-Office. In 1779 he was made Judge of the Admiralty in Pennsylvania, and in 1790 was appointed, by President Washington, Judge of the District Court of the United States. He died May 9, 1791, of an attack of apoplexy. He was the author of a number of poems, political pamphlets, essays, and many admirable jeux-d'esprit on the prominent topics of the day. Among the best-known of his poems are The Treaty, The Battle of the Kegs, A Morning Hymn, An Evening Hymn, Description of a Church, Science, A Camp Ballad, and The New Roof. Of his satirical pieces we may instance The Typographical Mode of Conducting a Quarrel, Thoughts on the Diseases of the Mind, Essay on White-Washing, and Modern Learning. Few pens of the day effected more than Hopkinson's in educating the American people for political independence. The brevity, wit, and vivacity of his pieces gave them portability, currency, and popular favour. Of this class the most important—of his writings we may specify The Pretty Story, 1774; The Prophecy, 1776; The Political Catechism, 1777. But the collector of American History (a large class these collectors have now become!) must secure for his shelves, if he can, (which is more than doubtful,) The Miscellaneous Essays and Occasional Writings of Francis Hopkinson, Phila., pub. by Dobson, 1792, 3 vols. 8vo. A number of papers by Hopkinson will be found in Aitkin's Pennsylvania Magazine, and in Trans. Amer. Soc., ii. 159; iii. 183, 185, 239, 331. See Allen's Amer. Biog. Dict.; Lives of the Signers; Massachusetts Mag., iii. 750–783; Amer. Mus., iii. 165; ix. 39; Duyckincks' Cyc. of Amer. Lit.; Notes on the Provincial Lit. of Penna., by Thomas I. Wharton, read at a Meeting of the Council of the Hist. Soc. of Penn., Sept. 21, 1826; Delaplaine's Repository; Works of John Adams; and other works of, and connected with, the Revolutionary times.

"A poet, a wit, a patriot, a chemist, a mathematician, and a judge of the admiralty, his character was composed of a happy union of qualities and endowments commonly supposed to be discordant; and, with the humour of Swift and Rabelais, he was always found on the side of virtue and social order."—THOMAS I. Hopkinson, Joseph, LL.D., 1770–1842, a native of Philadelphia, son of Francis Hopkinson, (ante,) was educated at the University of Pennsylvania, and subsequently practised law, first at Easton and then in Philadelphia. From 1815 to 1819 he was a member of the national House of Representatives, and in 1828 was appointed, by President Adams, Judge of the District Court of the United States,—an office which he retained until his death. Both his father and grandfather had preceded him on the bench. The subject of our notice was Vice-President of the American Philosophical Society, and President of the Philadelphia Academy of Fine Arts. He was the author of the patriotic song of "Hail Columbia," written under circumstances pleasantly recorded by the author in a letter which will be found in Griswold's Poets and Poetry of America. Horne, George, D.D., 1730–1792, an eminent divine of the Hutchinsonian school, was a native of Otham, near Maidstone, and educated at University College, Oxford; Fellow of Magdalene College, 1749, and President, 1768; Chaplain to the King, 1771; Vice-Chancellor of the Univ. of Oxford, 1776; Dean of Canterbury, 1781; Bishop of Norwich, 1790. He pub. a number of controversial treatises in favour of Hutchinson, and against Sir Isaac Newton, Adam Smith, Law, Hume, Shuckford, Kennicott, Halhed, and Priestley; a Commentary on the Book of Psalms; Sermons, &c. His Letters on Infidelity, in which Hume's arguments are discussed, were pub. in 1784, 12mo. A collective ed. of his Works, with a Life, was pub. by his friend and chaplain, Wm. Jones, of Nayland, in 1795–99, 6 vols. 8vo; 1809, 6 vols. 8vo; 1812, 6 vols. 8vo; 1818, 6 vols. 8vo; last ed., 1830, 4 vols. 8vo. Of his Discourses, a 4th ed. was pub. in 1803–04, 5 vols. 8vo; other eds., 1812, 3 vols. 8vo; 1824, 3 vols. 8vo; new ed., 1831, 2 vols. 8vo; last ed., 1845, 2 vols. 8vo. Of the Commentary on the Psalms (1st ed., 1771, 2 vols. 4to) there have been many edits. Among the last are the one pub.

by Virtue, in 3 vols. 12mo, in 1836; the one in 2 vols. 12mo, pub. by the Lon. Soc. P. C. K. in 1848; and Longman's ed. in 1848, 8vo. See also Nisbet's ed. of Horne's Arrangement of the Psalms, Notes, and Comments, Pt. I, 1850, p. 8vo. The Essay on Horne's Commentary, by James Montgomery, Esq., (prefixed to ed. in 2 vols., forming a portion of the Sacred Classics,) and the one by the Rev. Edward Irving, (prefixed to an ed. pub. in Glasgow in 3 vols. 12mo,) are doubtless well known to many of our readers. Irving's Essay has been highly commended. The Daily Communings, Spiritual and Devotional, on Select Portions of the Psalms, from Horne's Commentary, (2d ed., 64mo,) and the Selection by Lindley Murray, (1812, 8vo,) have met with warm approbation. The last-named comprises, says Dr. T. H. Horne, "the most striking, pathetic, and instructive parts of the Commentary." A vol. of Selections from the Commentary was pub. in 1832, 12mo. It is by his Discourses and Commentary on the Psalms that Bishop Horne will always be favourably known; and it will now be proper for us to adduce some opinions upon the merits and defects of these productions.

Opinions on the Discourses:

"Some of Bishop Horne's discourses are ingenious, but they contain more Hutchinsonianism and less of evangelical sentiment, than might have been expected."—Orme's Bibl. Bib.

"Bishop Horne's views of preaching, not always (alas! such is our common infirmity!) fully illustrated by his own sermons, are instructive. . . His sermons are polished, and have many beautiful and excellent thoughts, but they are wanting in the full declaration of justification by faith, and therefore meet not adequately the distresses of an awakened conscience . . His sermons are devotional and elegant. He and others of his school have brought some important truths before men who would not have listened to those writing more in the spirit of the Reformers."—Bickersteth's C. S.

"This writer seems to have had as much devotion and regard for the grand principles of Christianity as command respect, but few evangelical preachers, notwithstanding, would like to take him for a pattern."—Dr. E. Williams's C. P.

"The sacred discourses of the amiable Horne recommend the duties of that religion of which he was so bright an ornament, in a sweet and lively style."—Historical View of Eng. Lit.: Goadby's Eng. Gent.'s Lib. Man

"His style is lucid, and often terse; his reflections grow naturally out of the sentiments of the passage on which he comments, and there breathes through the whole so much sympathy with the Psalmist in his humble views of himself and his exalted conceptions of Jehovah—there is such a heavenly, sweet frame of mind exhibited, so much spirituality, and such love to the Redeemer, as to render this commentary one of peculiar fitness for family reading."

"They evince an uncommon warmth of piety, and are calculated to produce it."—British Critic

"Sensible, practical, and animated. He addresses himself more to the heart than is commonly done, and consequently his discourses are more calculated to answer the end of preaching. They are agreeably instructive and edifying, manifesting the pious and good heart of the writer."—Lon. Month. Rev.

Opinions on the Commentary on the Psalms:

"His Commentary on the Psalms is his capital performance, and the one by which he will be known so long as piety and elegant learning are loved in England. It is altogether a beautiful work. The preface is a master piece of composition and good sense. The exposition implies more learning and research than it displays; and the views of Christian doctrine contained in it are generally Perha[illegible]s to the Messiah and his church occasionally rather far; bu[illegible]s is less hurtful than the opposite extreme, which has generally been adopted."—Orme's Bibl. Bib.

"The variety and number of the editions of this learned and pious work sufficiently attest the very high estimation in which it is held. The critics of the day however, when it first appeared, were of opinion that Bishop Horne applied too many of the Psalms to the Messiah."—Horne's Bibl. Bib.

"Horne's Commentary on the Book of Psalms is of use chiefly for its devotional tendency."—Williams's C. P.

"His Commentary on the Psalms has long been a refreshing and delightful companion to the Christian's retirement."—Bickersteth's C. S.

"It is a truly evangelical and most valuable work, generally commended and admired for the vein of spirituality and devotion which runs through it as well as for the elegant taste displayed in the illustration of difficult passages. The author's design is to illustrate the historical sense of the Psalms as they relate to King David and the people of Israel; and to point out their application to the Messiah, to the Church, and to individuals as members of the Church."—Lowndes's Brit. Lib.

"A delightful amplification of the music of Zion, wherein every phrase is spiritualized, every prophetic and recondite meaning pointed out."—Grant's English Church.

Bishop Horne's description of a censurable style of preaching, too common even in our own days, has been already referred to in an extract from Bickersteth's Christian Student. The bishop's remarks are well worthy of quotation:

"To preach practical sermons, as they are called,—that is, sermons upon virtues and vices, without inculcating those great Scripture truths of redemption, grace, &c., which alone incite and enable us to forsake sin and to follow after righteousness,—what is it but to put together the wheels and set the hands of a watch, forgetting the spring which is to make them all go?"

For further information respecting this excellent man, see his Life, by Jones; Encyc. Brit.; Sir Wm. Forbes's Life of Dr. Beattie; Boswell's Life of Johnson; Lon. Gent. Mag., vols. lxii., lxiii., lxvi. He was a friend of Dr. Johnson's, and penned a tribute to his memory, (in the Olla Podrida;) and Johnson's biographer has left on record an honourable testimony to the character of the subject of our notice:

"We [Johnson and Boswell] drank tea with Dr. Horne, late President of Magdalen College and Bishop of Norwich, of whose abilities in different respects the public has had eminent proofs, and the esteem annexed to whose character was increased by knowing him personally."—Ubi supra.

Horne, Richard Henry, b. in London, 1803, was educated at Sandhurst College, in expectation of a military appointment in the East India Company's service. Disappointed in this hope, he entered the Mexican navy as a midshipman, and served in the war against Spain until the restoration of peace. He then returned to England by the way of the United States, and settled down as a London man of letters. In 1852 he emigrated to the gold fields of Australia, and, after serving some time as Chief of the Mounted Police, now holds the office of Gold Commissioner,—an auriferous proximity seldom enjoyed by poets; though we fear the author of the Exposition of the "False Medium" has had but little opportunity as yet of testing the value of the true "medium." Mr. Horne was married in 1847 to Miss Foggo, the daughter of the artist, and for some time afterwards enjoyed an enviable seclusion in a cottage near Findley. 1. Several edits., the first of which was pub. at a farthing,—a "price placed upon it as a sarcasm upon the low estimation into which epic poetry has fallen."

Three large editions were sold at a farthing per copy, the 4th ed. was raised to a shilling per copy, and the 5th to half a crown.

"It is said that one day, when the author was sitting in Mr Miller's the publisher's shop, a boy came in, and shouted out, in a nonchalant voice, 'A penn'orth of epics,' throwing a penny down on the counter."

Now, this anecdote may be true: therefore, it does not become us to deny it. We may be allowed, however, to remark, in passing, that it fits in as well as if it had been "made on purpose." A very elaborate and most eulogistic review of Orion will be found in Poe's Literati. We hope the reader has time to peruse it; certain it is that we have no space to quote it.

Mr. Horne is also the author of an Introduction to Schlegel's Lectures on Dramatic Literature and Art, was the associate of Wordsworth, Leigh Hunt, Miss Barrett, and others, in the production of Chaucer Modernized, was for some time editor of the Monthly Repository, and has been a contributor to the Church of England Quarterly Review, the New Quarterly Review, and other periodicals. Among his essays in the Church of England Quarterly, we may instance those on Poetical Contrasts, and on Albertus Magnus, and, of those in the New Quarterly, it may be sufficient to name those entitled on Chinese Characteristics, and that on The Dramatic Mind of Europe.

Christ. Remembrancer.*

Horne, Thomas Hartwell, D.D., b. Oct. 20, 1780, received the rudiments of a classical education between the years 1789 and '95 in the royal and ancient foundation of Christ's Hospital, where, for two years, he was contemporary with Samuel Taylor Coleridge. Having attained the rank of Deputy-Grecian, (the second highest in the upper grammar-school,) he quitted Christ's Hospital at the age of fifteen years, having no opportunity of proceeding to the university. The eldest of six orphans, small of stature, and not robust, he was unfitted for any employment requiring physical strength; and eight years of his life were spent in the humble situation of a clerk to barristers. As he had a good deal of time at his command during the first five years of his career, he diligently improved himself by solitary study, and acquired an insight into the law of England, which he was afterwards enabled to turn to account in editing various law-books. The very narrow income which he received as a barrister's clerk early led Mr. Horne to direct his attention to literature as a means of support. His first publication was A Brief View of the Necessity and Truth of the Christian Revelation, written when he was only eighteen, and published in 1800, in his nineteenth year. The publication of this little manual led him to the diligent and prayerful study of the Scriptures, and eventually induced him to undertake the work by which he is best known in this country as well as in England, and, indeed, wherever the English language is spoken or read. We mean the Introduction to the Critical Study and Knowledge of the Holy Scriptures. In the preface to this work, Mr. Horne states that it

"originated in his own wants at an early period of life, when he stood in need of a guide to the reading of the Holy Scriptures, which would not only furnish him with a general introduction to them but would also enable him to solve apparent contradictions, and to study the Bible with that attention which its importance demands."

At that time he "had no friend to assist his studies or remove his doubts, nor any means of procuring critical works. At length a list of the most eminent foreign Biblical critics fell into his hands, and directed him to some of those sources of information which he was seeking. He then resolved to procure such of them as his very limited means would permit, with the design, in the first instance, of satisfying his own mind on those topics which had perplexed him; and, ultimately of laying before the public the result of his inquiries, should no treatise appear that might supersede such a publication."—Vol. I Pref., pp. ix. x.

The idea thus conceived fifty-eight years ago has been steadily kept in view to the present time. The foundation and much of the subsequent composition of this work were laid, for the most part, in solitary midnight study. However much and variously he was engaged in literary toil for his daily bread, (as the subjoined list of his publications will attest,) the Introduction to the Study of the Scriptures was the first and chief object of his thoughts. The 1st edition of it appeared in 1818 in 3 vols. 8vo, which in subsequent editions were enlarged into five thick octavo volumes. It immediately took its station in literature as the Class Book for the study of the Scriptures in all the colleges and universities in the British dominions. The author has been spared to see the publication of the 10th edition in 1856,—thirty eight years after the publication of the 1st edition,—and to receive increasing testimonies of its utility to all classes of readers, but especially to ministers and students for the ministry. From the very numerous critical testimonies in favour of this invaluable work, we select the following:

The first edition:

"Of all the works which of late years have been presented to the notice of the Biblical student, this is one of the most correct and useful. It is an encyclopedia of theological knowledge. It is a complete abridgment of many extensive treatises of the most celebrated divines both of our own and foreign countries, and it entitles its author to the gratitude and approbation of every lover of the sacred volume."—Clerical Journal, Sept. 1819.

"This elaborate work reflects great credit on the learning and industry of its author and is, upon the whole well calculated to answer the purpose for which it was designed."—British Critic, June. 1819

"It is saying much—yet as far as our knowledge of Biblical works extends, not too much—to assert of these volumes, that they constitute the most important theological publication of their kind which has appeared in this or any other country for some years. . . . No well-assorted theological library can be long without it; and even those students in divinity whose pecuniary resources are too limited to admit of wanton expenditure would do well, on the score of economy, to include these volumes in their library."—Christian Observer, November, 1819

"This work contains every information which the general reader of Scripture can possibly require, but to clergymen, and to those who are preparing for the sacred office, it is an invaluable manual; and what is no mean consideration, it is also a cheap one."—Literary Panorama, September, 1819

"It is all it pretends to be, and even more, being written with a judicious perspicuity, and executed with a degree of correctness that we do not often witness."—Evangelical Magazine, Oct. 1818.

The second, third, fourth, fifth, and sixth editions:

"Upon the whole, it is a very useful publication, and does great credit to the industry and researches of the indefatigable author."—Bishop Marsh's Lectures on the Criticism and Interpretation of the Bible, pp. 52, 53, ed. of 1828.

"I would advise the younger clergy, and candidates for Holy Orders, to acquaint themselves, in an early stage of their critical researches, with Horne's Introduction to the Study of the Scripture; a work which in itself comprises a body of critical theology, and which introduces the reader to the best sources of information."—Bishop Jebb's Primary Charge to the Clergy of the Diocese of Limerick, in 1823, p. 10, (Dublin, 1823.)

"T. Hartwell Horne has not only analyzed with extraordinary diligence all the principal writers on the Evidences of Christianity, but has supplied the defects of many of them, by enforcing those moral and religious considerations arising from the intrinsic excellency of Christianity and the responsibility of man, which, in the author's judgment, are so unspeakably important."—Bishop Wilson's (of Calcutta) Lectures on the Evidences of Christianity, vol Prel., p. xiv.

"Such a monument of successful industry and laudable arrangement as the present age has seldom seen; a copious illustration for every young theologian and an ample treasure of reference to the unpublished."—Archdeacon Nares's Visitation Sermon before the Archdeacon and Clergy of the City of London, 1823, p. 24.

"So comprehensive and complete as quite to supersede many works that would otherwise have been necessary."—Butler's Christian Student, p. 454. (London, 1829.)

"Great advantages may be derived from the repeated perusal of Horne's Introduction to the Critical Study of the Scriptures, in 4 vols. 8vo. . . . It contains much invaluable information respecting the ancient manuscripts and versions of the sacred books, the care with which they were preserved before the invention of printing, the manner in which they have been transmitted to our own times, together with a full view of Jewish Antiquities, and a suitable introduction to prepare the reader for entering on the study of each inspired book."—Gibbs's Directions for Searching the Scriptures, p. 88. (Edinburgh, 1828.)

"Read Hartwell Horne. This is an invaluable book for a young man: and you must not lay him aside till you have fully digested his admirable compilations, to guide you in more discursive reading hereafter."—Letter to a Young Man matriculating at the University: Domestic Portraiture, &c., p. 128. (London, 8vo. 1833.)

"Every Biblical student may be congratulated on the opportunity which he possesses of acquiring, in these approved volumes, the most comprehensive digest of Biblical erudition extant in English Literature."—Lon. Eclectic Review, January, 1832

"One of the most valuable works that exist, in this or any other language."—Edinburgh Christian Instructor, May 1833

"Ouvrage important qui réunit de nombreux renseignemens géographiques, historiques, bibliographiques, et critiques, relatifs à la littérature biblique."—BRUNET: Supplément au Manuel du Libraire, tom. II. p. 200. (Paris, 1834, 8vo.)

The seventh edition:

"It augurs well for the cause of Biblical Literature in this country, that edition after edition of this important and increasingly-valuable work should so rapidly issue from the press. When the laborious and learned author entered the field it was comparatively unoccupied; and now, after the lapse of fifteen years notwithstanding all that has been done for promoting the critical study and knowledge of the Bible among us, he may still be said to occupy it unrivalled and alone. During the whole of that period he has evidently availed himself of every new source that has been opened, from which to derive improvements; diligently canvassed the pages both of domestic and foreign literature, re-examined authorities and quotations; and left no measure unemployed by which his work might receive the highest degree of perfection of which, from the nature of the circumstance, it is susceptible."—Congregational Magazine, September, 1834.

"A work which is beyond all contradiction the most valuable introduction to the Sacred Writings which has been yet published. It is a storehouse of Biblical learning, and we commend it the more cordially to our readers as it may be put into the hands of students with the most perfect safety."—Christian Remembrancer, October, 1834.

The eighth edition:

"It is needless that we should say any thing to commend such a publication. It is one of the first books which should be secured by the young minister; and the intelligent and reading of every class, ministers and laymen, will find ample reward in the perusal of its richly-stored pages."—Lon. Eclectic Review, April, 1830

"These admirable volumes are too well known to require either description or recommendation: their character is established, both as a standard work and as a complete encyclopedia of Biblical knowledge. . . . The publication of this new and improved edition will afford the opportunity to a number of persons, candidates for the ministry or otherwise, to become purchasers. Young ministers and students ought to possess it. Instead of that desultory and superficial reading, which imparts much less information than it seems to do, and leaves the mind undisciplined, they ought to lay before them (in connexion with suitable works in doctrinal theology) Mr. Horne's text-book of a vast subject and diligently and patiently pursue the subject for two or three years. But we see no necessity for confining the work to ministers and ministerial students. . . . We recommend Mr. Horne's work as a family work, to which the youthful members may have access, and with which they may become thoroughly acquainted."—Wesleyan-Methodist Magazine, March, 1839.

"In every theological library this work is indispensable. It contains a singular display of good sense and persevering industry, and is by far the most complete publication of the kind that ever issued from the British press, or perhaps in any language. There is scarcely a question relating to the study of the Holy Scriptures, which is not here discussed in an able and satisfactory manner. As long as a taste for sound Biblical Literature shall be cherished, this work will secure for its author the highest esteem and grateful respect."—Second Appendix to Dr. Williams's Christian Preacher, 5th edition, p. 358, (London, 1843.)

Ninth edition:

"Mr. Horne's great work has been too long before the public to need a formal introduction to the notice of either lay or clerical readers. The appearance of a ninth edition sufficiently attests the estimation in which it is deservedly held: nor do we hazard too much when we assert that it has undoubtedly raised the character of theological and Biblical literature throughout Christendom. There is, in fact, scarcely a single question relating to the study of the Scriptures, which Mr. Horne has not ably discussed and satisfactorily settled. His Introduction is one of those works with which Biblical students and candidates for Holy Orders cannot too soon make themselves thoroughly acquainted, and the acquisition of which they will never regret."—Church and State Gazette, 1846.

The 10th edition passed through the press in the same month as that in which this article was written, (Nov. 1856.) Our own obligations to this work in the preparation of this Dictionary will be best understood by the many references to the INTRODUCTION scattered through our pages; though these extracts, valuable as they are, do not fully express the amount of our indebtedness to this admirable repository of Biblical literature. The tone of Christian charity and gentlemanly courtesy, united with a zealous defence of what he believes to be sound doctrine, which distinguishes the criticisms of Dr. Horne, cannot escape the notice of the readers of the INTRODUCTION.

Besides the ten editions printed in England, Mr. Horne's work has been repeatedly reprinted in the United States, but without any pecuniary advantage to the author, in 2 vols. imp. 8vo, and also in 4 vols. 8vo, to the amount of many thousand copies; which, added to the aggregate number of 15,000 copies of the first nine London editions, exhibits an unprecedented sale for a work of this character; especially when the bulk and price are considered. This extensive circulation may be ascribed, in part at least, to the facts that the Introduction has throughout been the joint result of prayer and indefatigable study, regardless of expense in procuring the requisite critical aids, and that it is not a sectarian work. Christians of every denomination have studied it to their great advantage; and Mr. Horne, in the course of his long life (he is now in the 78th year of his age) has been permitted to receive not a few testimonies from persons who have been preserved or rescued from infidelity by his labours. Mr. Kennedy, the biographer of our distinguished countryman, William Wirt, states that

"To Horne's Introduction, particularly, he was accustomed to express his obligations for the conviction of his own mind; and he never lost an opportunity of commending it to a friend."

In his letters to his children, among other books on the subject of religion, he "Urged them to the careful perusal of Horne's Introduction to the Critical Study of the Scriptures."—Kennedy's Memoirs of W. Wirt, vol ii p 388.

It has, in fact, conduced more than any other modern work to the enlarged study of sacred literature; and eventually it led to the realization of Mr. Horne's long-cherished wish of devoting himself to the ministry in the Church of England. The death of his parents having prevented him from prosecuting his studies at either of the English universities, Dr. Howley, at that time Bishop of London, disregarded his want of an English academical degree, and, considering his Introduction as an appropriate and honourable passport to Holy Orders, ordained him in 1819. In the preceding year the University of King's College, Aberdeen, conferred on Mr. Horne the degree of M.A. In 1829 Mr. Horne performed the academical exercises required by the University Statutes, and proceeded to the degree of B.D. in the University of Cambridge; and in 1841 the University of Pennsylvania conferred upon Mr. H. the degree of D.D. In 1833 Dr. Howley (then Archbishop of Canterbury) presented him to the rectory of St. Edmund-the-King with St. Nicholas Acons, in the city of London, as a small token of his esteem for Mr. Horne's personal worth, and his sense of the services which Mr. H. had rendered by his works to the theological and Biblical student. Dr. Blomfield, Bishop of London, had previously collated him to the prebend of Sneating, in the Cathedral of St. Paul, as a mark of the esteem which the bishop entertained of the value of those services which Mr. Horne had rendered to the cause of Christianity by his different publications, especially his Introduction to the Study of the Scriptures. As the population of the United Parishes (of which Mr. H. is rector) is small, he has found time to produce many valuable publications, and also to keep up an extensive correspondence with literary men, and especially with those who are engaged in controversy with the advocates of the modern Church of Rome. Several of his publications were written primarily for the edification of his parishioners and their families, by whom they were gratefully received and acknowledged. It only remains to state, in concluding this notice of Mr. Horne's literary career, that in 1809 he was elected Sub-Librarian of the Surrey Institution, which office he held until the institution was dissolved for want of the requisite funds, in 1823. In 1824 he was applied to, and eventually engaged, by the then Trustees of the British Museum, to undertake a classed catalogue of that library. For their consideration, and by their desire, he drew up the Outlines for the Classification of a Library, which were printed in 1825. After very considerable progress had been made in that classed catalogue, it was suspended for a new General Alphabetical Catalogue, which is now in progress, and on which Mr. Horne is still employed as an Assistant Librarian. If that classed catalogue had been completed, it would, on a large scale, have been what Mr. Horne's valuable classed catalogue of Queen's College Library, Cambridge, is on a smaller scale. The following is a correct list of Mr. Horne's publications:

1. A Brief View of the Necessity and Truth of the Christian Revelation, Lon., 1800; 2d ed., 1802, 8vo.

2. A View of the Commerce of Greece, by Felix Beaujour; translated from the French, 1800, 8vo.

3. An Essay on Privateers, Captures, and Recaptures, according to the Laws, Treaties, and Usages of the Maritime Powers of Europe, by M. de Martens. To which is subjoined a Discourse, in which the Rights and Duties of Neutral Powers are briefly stated; translated from the French, 1801.

4. A Compendium of the Statute Laws and Regulations of the Court of Admiralty relative to Ships of War, Privateers, Prizes, Recaptures, and Prize-Money; with an Appendix of Precedents, 1803, 12mo.

5. Wallis's Pocket Itinerary; being a New and Accurate Guide to all the Principal, Direct, and Cross Roads throughout England, Wales, and Scotland, 1803, 18mo. Anon

6. A Treatise on Captures in War, by Richard Lee, Esq.; 2d ed., corrected, with additional Notes by Mr. Horne, 1803, 8vo.

7. Hints on the Formation and Management of Sunday-Schools, 1807, 12mo. Anon.

8. A Reading upon the Statute of Sewers, by Robert Callis, Sergeant-at-Law; 4th ed., corrected and enlarged by Mr. Horne, 1810, r. 8vo.

9. Bibliotheca Legum; or, a Complete Catalogue of the Common and Statute Law Books of the United Kingdom, arranged in a new manner, by John Clarke. The materials were collected by the publisher, Mr. Clarke, but the whole were arranged, corrected, and edited by Mr. Horne, 1810, 8vo. See CLARKE, JOHN.

10. A Catalogue of the Library of the Surrey Institution, methodically arranged, 1811; 2d ed., 1812, 8vo. Anon

11. A Catalogue of the Harleian Manuscripts in the British Museum, classed according to their Subject Matter, forming the 4th vol. of the Catalogue of the Harleian Manuscripts, 1812, 8vo.

12. An Introduction to the Study of Bibliography; to which is prefixed a Memoir on the Public Libraries of the Antients, 1814, 2 vols. 8vo.

13. A Compendious Law Dictionary, by Thomas Potts; a new ed., carefully revised, corrected, and enlarged, by Mr. Horne, 1815, 8vo and 12mo.

14. An Illustrated Record of Important Events in the Annals of Europe during the years 1812, '13, '14, and '15. fol. Anon.

15. The Lakes of Lancashire, Westmoreland, and Cumberland, delineated in 43 Engravings after the Drawings of Joseph Farington, R.A.; with Descriptions, Historical, Topographical, and Picturesque, the result of a Tour made by T. H. Horne in the year 1816, 1816, fol.

16. The History of the Mohammedan Empire in Spain; designed as an Introduction to the Arabian Antiquities of Spain, by James Cavanagh Murphy, 1816, 4to. This volume was written in conjunction with John Gilbee, LL.B., and Mr. Professor John Shakespear, of the East India College. One-half of this volume was contributed by Mr. Horne; who also edited Mr. Murphy's Arabian Antiquities of Spain, 1816, fol., Mr. M. having died without leaving any materials for the descriptions of the engravings.

17. An Analysis of the Picture of the Transfiguration, by Raffaello Sanzio d'Urbino; translated from the French of S. C. Croze-Maignan, by Mr. Horne, with the Remarks and Observations of Vasari, Mengs, Reynolds, Fuseli, and other distinguished artists, 1817, fol.

18. An Introduction to the Critical Study and Knowledge of the Holy Scriptures, with Maps and Fac-Similes of Biblical Manuscripts, 1818, 3 vols. 8vo; 9th ed., revised, corrected, and enlarged, by Mr. Horne, 1846, 5 large vols. 8vo; 10th ed., by Mr. Horne, with the assistance of Samuel Davidson, D.D., LL.D., and of Samuel Prideaux Tregelles, LL.D., 1856, 4 vols. in 5, 8vo, (vide ante.) In the 10th ed., the valuable bibliographical volume of Mr. Horne has been necessarily (though on his part most reluctantly) omitted in order to make room for much new critical matter. Part of Mr. Horne's first volume, on the Internal Evidences of the Inspiration of the Scriptures, was translated into Romaic, or modern Greek, by Professor Nicholas Bambas, (afterwards of the University of Athens,) and published in 1834, at Hermopolis, in the island of Syra, and was largely circulated in Greece. The translation is entitled, Πραγματεία περὶ ἐμπνεύσεως τῶν γραφῶν. Ὑπὸ Θ. Χόρνε, μετάφρασις νέα ἐκ τῆς Ἀγγλικῆς μετὰ προσθηκῶν ὑπὸ Ν. Βαμβᾶ. Ἐν Ἑρμουπόλει, 1834.

19. Deism Refuted; or, Plain Reasons for being a Christian, Lon., 1819, 12mo Reprinted at Philadelphia, 1820, 12mo., 6th ed., Lon., 1826, 12mo. This little volume, with Mr. Horne's permission, contributed five tracts to the series published by the London Religious Tract Society, viz.: Nos. 316, 318, 319, 321, and 701.

20. The Scripture Doctrine of the Trinity briefly stated and defended, and the Church of England vindicated from the charge of Uncharitableness in retaining the Athanasian Creed, 1820; 2d ed., corrected, 1826, 12mo.

21. Commentarius on the Roman-Dutch Law, by Simon van Leeuwen, LL.D; translated from the Dutch by a Cingalese Modeliar, or Native Magistrate: collated throughout with Van Leeuwen's Censura Forensis, and edited, with numerous additional references to the Text Books on the Roman Civil Law, by Mr Horne, 1820, r. 8vo. Nearly the whole edition of this work was sent to the island of Ceylon, where it is of the highest authority.

22 The Works of William Hogarth, (including the Analysis of Beauty,) elucidated by Descriptions, critical, moral, and historical: to which is prefixed Some Account of his Life, by Mr Horne. The engravings were executed by Thomas Clerk, an engraver at Edinburgh, 1821, 2 vols. 8vo

23 Outlines for the Classification of a Library, respectfully submitted to the consideration of the Trustees of the British Museum, by Mr. Horne, 1825, 4to

24. A Catalogue of the Library of the College of St. Bernard and St Margaret, commonly called Queen's College, in the University of Cambridge; methodically arranged, 1827, 2 vols r. 8vo. This catalogue is classified according to the principles and order developed in the preceding Outlines for the Classification of a Library.

25 Romanism contradictory to the Bible; or, the Peculiar Tenets of the Church of Rome, as exhibited in her accredited Formularies, contrasted with the Holy Scriptures, Lon., 1827, 8vo. Translated into Spanish by the Rev W. H. Rule, and printed at Gibraltar in 1840.

26. A Compendious Introduction to the Study of the Bible; being an Analysis of the Introduction to the Critical Study and Knowledge of the Holy Scriptures, Lon., 1827, 12mo. Reprinted at Boston, Mass., 1827, 12mo; 5th ed., 1852, 12mo. This is an abridgment of Mr. Horne's larger Introduction

27 A Manual of Parochial Psalmody, adapted to the service of the Church for every Sunday, &c. throughout the Year, Lon., 1829, 40th ed., 1856, 18mo; also eds. in 12mo and 32mo.

28. A Selection (by Mr. Horne) of Psalm and Hymn-Tunes, by the Best Composers, antient and modern, the whole harmonized and arranged for the Manual of Parochial Psalmody, by Thomas Henshaw, 1829. New ed., 1852, ob. 8vo.

29. The Conversion of St. Paul a Proof of the Truth of the Christian Revelation, 1831, 8vo. An anonymous Tract, written for the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge.

30 A Manual for the Afflicted; comprising a Practical Essay on Afflictions, and a Series of Meditations and Prayers for those who are in sorrow, trouble, need, sickness, or any other adversity, 1832; 3d ed., 1842, 18mo. Reprinted at Boston, Mass., 1833, 18mo.

31. Bibliographical Notes on the Book of Jasher, Lon., 1853, 8vo. This detection of a gross literary forgery was subsequently incorporated in the fifth or bibliographical volume of the Introduction to the Critical Study of the Scriptures.

32 A Concise History and Analysis of the Athanasian Creed, with Select Scripture Proofs, and answers to some common objections, 1834; 2d ed., 1837, 18mo.

33. A Protestant Memorial; comprising—I. A Concise Historical Sketch of the Reformation; II. The Antiquity of the Religion of Protestants Demonstrated; III. The Safety of adhering to the Protestant Church, and the Dan ger of continuing in the Church of Rome; IV. Romanism, or the System of Doctrine and Precepts maintained and inculcated by the Church of Rome, contradictory to the Bible, 1835; 10th ed., enlarged, 1850, 12mo.

34. Landscape Illustrations of the Bible; from Original Sketches taken on the Spot and engraved by W. and E. Finden, with Descriptions by Mr. Horne, 1836, 2 vols. 8vo, and fol. The Biblical Keepsake; a new ed. of the preceding work, with additions and corrections, 1835–37, 3 vols. 8vo.

35. A Manual of Biblical Bibliography, 1839, 8vo. This is a separate edition of the fifth or bibliographical volume of the eighth edition of Mr. Horne's Introduction to the Study of the Scriptures: it was published by request, for the accommodation of bookbuyers and booksellers.

36. The Principles of Popery Developed, in a juridical and historical investigation of the Gunpowder Conspiracy; reprinted from the Church of England Quarterly Review, 1840, 8vo. Anon.

37. Mariolatry; or, Facts and Evidences demonstrating the Worship of the Virgin Mary by the Church of Rome, 1840, 8vo. Anon. Reprinted, with additions and corrections furnished by Mr. Horne to the American editor, the Rev. S. F. Jarvis, D.D., Hartford, Conn., 1841, 8vo.

38. A new edition, with corrections and additions, of Dr. J. Williams's (Bishop of Chichester) Brief Exposition of the Church Catechism, with Scripture-Proofs, Lon., 1841, 12mo.

39. Popery the Enemy and Falsifier of Scripture; or, Facts and Evidences illustrative of the conduct of the Modern Church of Rome, in prohibiting the Reading and Circulation of the Holy Scriptures in the Vulgar Tongue, and also of the Falsification of the Sacred Text in Translations executed by Romanists, 1841, 8vo. Anon. 2d ed., corrected and enlarged, 1845, 18mo.

40. Popery Delineated; or, a Brief Examination and Confutation of the Unscriptural and Anti Scriptural Doctrines and Practices maintained and inculcated by the Modern Church of Rome, 1848, 8vo. Anon.

41. The Communicant's Companion, comprising an Historical Essay on the Lord's Supper, with Meditations and Prayers for the use of Communicants, 1855, 32mo.

Besides numerous sermons communicated to different journals, Mr. Horne has also published the following single sermons on various public occasions:

42. The Conformity of the Church of England, in her Ministry, Doctrine, and Liturgy, to the Apostolic Precept and Pattern; to which is added an Address on the Origin and Use of Confessions of Faith generally, and of the Confession of Faith of the United Church of England and Ireland in particular, 1834; 3d ed., corrected and enlarged, 1835, 8vo.

43. Jewish and Christian Privileges Compared; Christian Diligence; Patriotism a Religious Duty: Three Sermons preached before the Lord Mayor, Judges, and Members of the Corporation of the City of London, in the year 1837, 1837, 4to.

44. The Sovereign's Prayer and the People's Duty: a Sermon on occasion of the Coronation of Queen Victoria, 1838, 8vo.

45. National Piety and National Prosperity inseparably connected; a Fast-Day Sermon, delivered April 26, 1854, 1854, 8vo.

Dr. Horne has further contributed numerous Historico-Ecclesiastical and Literary Articles to the Encyclopædia Metropolitana: and also many articles to critical journals, exposing the Principles, Doctrines, and Practices of the Modern Church of Rome.

When the character, the number, and the extensive circulation of Dr. Horne's works are duly considered, we shall hardly be accused of exaggeration when we express our conviction that a more useful uninspired writer has seldom appeared among men. The influence of his excellent Introduction to the Study and Knowledge of the Holy Scriptures (to instance only the most important of his works) has now for a period of nearly forty years directed the instructions and moulded the lives of thousands of the clergy and hundreds of thousands of the laity of two hemispheres. He has now attained the ripe age of seventy-eight. May he live to see the publication of this Dictionary, in the progress of which kindred pursuits and an expansive benevolence of heart have led him to take a lively interest. He was one of our earliest guides in Bibliography: we very naturally wish him to behold the matured fruits of our anxious toils.

Horneck, Anthony, D.D., 1641–1696, a native of Bacharach, in the Lower Palatinate, studied at Heidelberg, and was entered at Queen's Coll., Oxf., 1663; Vicar of All-Saints, Oxf., 1663; became Preb. of Exeter, and subsequently of Westminster and Wells: Preacher in the Savoy, 1671. He was a man of great piety and profound learning. He was the author of a number of serms. and theolog. treatises, of which the following are the best-known: 1. The Great Law of Consideration, Lon., 1677, 8vo; 11th ed., 1729, 8vo. New ed., 1840, 8vo.

"Devout and edifying."—Bickersteth's C. S.

2. The Happy Ascetick, Lon., 1681, 8vo; 3d ed., 1693, 8vo. New ed., 1721, 8vo. 3. The Fire of the Altar, 1683, 12mo. 4. The Exercise of Prayer, 1685, 8vo; 13th ed., 1718, 12mo. New ed., 1815, 18mo. This is a Supp. to No. 2. 5. The Crucified Jesus; or, an Acct. of the Nature, Design, &c. of the Lord's Supper, 1686, 8vo; 6th ed., 1716, 8vo. New ed., 1839, 12mo.

"Devotional."—Bickersteth's C. S.

"His best pieces are those upon Consideration and the Crucified Jesus."—Dr Doddridge.

6 Several Serms. on Matt. v., 1706, 2 vols. 8vo; 3d ed., 1717, 2 vols. 8vo. Pub. by Bishop Kidder, (of Bath and Wells,) who has prefixed a Memoir. The bishop remarks, referring to the works of Horneck which were pub. by the author:

"There is a great vein of piety and devotion which runs through them; they savour of the primitive simplicity and zeal, and are well fitted to make men better."

Dr. T. H. Horne tells us that

"The bishop's character of the writings published by himself [Horneck] is equally applicable to his Sermons on Matt. v."—Bibl. Bib.

Horneck's Works are also commended by another eminent authority as "Exceedingly pathetic and elegant; chiefly fit for devotional subjects: his words are often much greater than his thoughts."—Dr Doddridge.

Horneck, Wm. Modern Fortification, Lon., 1738, 4to.

Horner, Francis, M.P., 1778–1817, a native of Edinburgh, educated at the High School, and at the University of that city, subsequently studied law, and became a member of Parliament, where he distinguished himself by his knowledge of political economy and finance. Having injured his constitution by excessive labour in the discharge of his duties as a member of the Bullion Committee, and in other capacities, he was obliged to travel on the Continent for the benefit of his health; but his unfavourable symptoms increased, and he died at Pisa, Feb. 8, 1817, in the 38th year of his age. A statue has been erected to his memory in Westminster Abbey. As the author of the first part of the Bullion Report of 1810, (the second part was penned by Mr. Huskisson and the third by Henry Thornton,) Mr. Horner is entitled to a high rank as a political economist. But he was more than this; he was a diligent student of intellectual philosophy, a man of great elevation of character, and unblemished purity in private life. His views on the Currency, which he subsequently embodied in the Report of the Bullion Committee, will be found in the first number of the Edinburgh Review, in his Review of Thornton on the Paper Credit of Great Britain. Of this periodical he was one of the originators. His Memoirs and Correspondence were pub. by his brother, Leonard Horner, in 1843, Lon., 2 vols. 8vo; 2d ed., with addits., 1853, 2 vols. 8vo; Boston, by Little, Brown & Co., 1853, 2 vols. 8vo. We could quote many pages of commendation from high authorities of Mr. Horner's character as a man and statesman, but must be satisfied with referring the reader to the Memoirs of Sir Samuel Romilly, 1840, 3 vols.; Sir Archibald Alison's Hist. of Europe, 1789–1815; Lord Brougham's Statesmen temp. Geo. III., Lon., 1856, ii. 155–166; Works of Sir James Mackintosh, 1854, i. 214–215, n.; Works of the Rev. Sydney Smith, 1854, iii. 473–477, (Letter to Leonard Horner;) Lord Cockburn's Memorial of his Own Time, 1856; Dugald Stewart's Prelim. Dissert. to Encyc. Brit.; Chambers and Thomson's Dict. of Eminent Scotsmen, 1855, iii. 88–90; McCulloch's Lit. of Polit. Econ., 1845, 173, 297; Edin. Rev., lxxviii. 261; Lon. Quar Rev., June, 1827, lxxii. 108; Eclec. Rev., 4th Ser., xiii. 606; Blackw. Mag., i. 3; xvii. 515; xl. 114; Lon. Gent. Mag., 1825, Pt. i, 503; 1843, 3; N. York Eclec. Mus., iii. 536. But we feel unwilling to conclude without quoting some testimonies to the eminent merits of Francis Horner:

"I remember the death of many eminent Englishmen; but I can safely say I never remember an impression so general as that excited by the death of Francis Horner."—Rev. Sydney Smith, ubi supra.

"The tears of those to whom he was unknown were shed over him. . . . He raised himself, at the early age of thirty six, to a moral authority which, without those qualities, no brilliancy of talents or power of reasoning could have acquired. No eminent speaker of Parliament owed so much of his success to his moral character. His high place was therefore honourable to his audience and to his country."—Sir James Mackintosh ubi supra.

"He died at the age of thirty-eight possessed of greater public influence than any other private man, and admired, beloved, trusted, and deplored, by all except the lawless or the base. No greater homage was ever paid in Parliament to any deceased member."—Lord Cockburn, ubi supra.

"Considering his knowledge, his talents, his excellent judgment, and the prospect of years which he had before him, I consider his death as a great public calamity."—Sir Samuel Romilly: ubi supra.

"Mr. Horner, whose premature and lamented death alone prevented him from rising to the highest eminence on the opposition side."—Sir Archibald Alison: ubi supra.

"Never certainly was more completely realized the ideal portrait so nobly imagined by the Roman poet: a calm devotion to reason and justice, the sanctuary of the heart undefiled, and a breast glowing with inborn honour

'Compositum jus fasque animo, sanctosque recessus
Mentis, et incoctum generoso pectus honesto.'"

Dugald Stewart, ubi supra.

"But this able, accomplished, and excellent person was now approaching the term assigned to his useful and honourable course by the mysterious dispensations under which the world is ruled. A complication of extraordinary maladies soon afterwards, after the Parliamentary session of 1816 precluded all further exertion, and, first confining his attention to the care of his health for a year was over from the date of his last brilliant display, bore him, deeply and universally lamented, to an untimely grave.

'Ostendit terris hunc tantum fata, neque ultra
Esse sinent. Nimium vobis Romana propago
Visa potens. Superi propria hæc si dona fuissent.'"

Horrox, Jeremiah, 1619-1641, an eminent English astronomer, a native of Toxteth, near Liverpool, was educated at Emanuel College, and subsequently (as Mr. Rigaud has recently discovered) took holy orders and became a curate at Hoole, near Preston.

"He was the first who saw Venus in the body of the sun. (Nov. 24, 1639.) and he was the first who remarked that the lunar motions might be represented by supposing an elliptic orbit provided that the eccentricity of the ellipse were made to vary, and an oscillatory motion given to the line of apsides. Newton afterwards showed that both suppositions were consequences of the theory of gravitation, and attributes to Halley part of what is really due to Horrox, as explained by Hansteen."

Horrox's investigations—remarks the reviewer of Rigaud's Historical Essay on the First Publication of Sir Isaac Newton's Principia, 1838, 8vo—

"Are all stamped with the clear indications of a genius of the first order; and he doubtless would have achieved far greater discoveries had not his privations and successes, his toils and triumphs, been together cut short by his premature death in 1641."—Edin. Rev., lxxviii. 402–438: Sir Isaac Newton and his Contemporaries.

"There is reason to ascribe an invention of great importance, though not perhaps of extreme difficulty, that of the micrometer, to Horrox."—Hallam's Lit. Hist. of Europe, ed 1854, ii 195

Ranking among the first who rightly appreciated the discoveries of the astronomer just named, Kepler.

—Professor Playfair, 3d Prelim. Dissert to Encyc. Brit.

It is not a little to Horrox's credit, that, whilst the astronomical tables of the day—even his master Kepler's (founded on the observations of Tycho Brahe)—were incorrect in their calculations respecting the time of the transit of Venus, the young astronomer himself foretold the time very accurately. 1. Horsley, John, 1685–1731, an eminent antiquary, a native of Mid-Lothian, of a Northumberland family, was pastor of a dissenting congregation at Morpeth. Britannia Romana; or, the Roman Antiquities of Britain in three Books, Lon., 1732, fol. An analysis of this truly valuable work will be found in Savage's Librarian. Sir P. Thompson's copy was sold for £13 3s., and Willett's for £14; Heath's, large paper, for £28 17s. 6d., and Constable's, large paper, for £35 10s. These are the highest prices with which we are acquainted. Horsley left a number of unfinished works in MS.; some letters of his, addressed to Roger Gale, dated 1729, will be found in Hutchinson's View of Northumberland. See Life of Horsley, by Rev. John Hodgson; Chambers and Thomson's Biog. Dict. of Eminent Scotsmen; Nichols's Lit. Anec.

Horsley, John. Longitude at Sea; Phil. Trans., 1764.

Horsley, Samuel, LL.D., 1733–1806, a native of London, was educated at Trinity Hall, Cambridge; Curate to his father, who was Rector of Newington Butts, 1758; Rector of Newington Butts, 1759; Secretary of the Royal Society, 1773; Rector of Aldbury, Surrey, 1774, Preb. of St. Paul's, 1777; Archdeacon of St. Alban's, 1780; Rector of Southwould, Essex, 1782; Preb. of Gloucester, 1787; Bishop of St. David's, 1788; trans. to Rochester, with the Deanery of Westminster, 1793, trans. to St. Asaph, resigning the Deanery of Westminster, 1802. He was a man of profound learning and strong intellectual powers, dictatorial in controversy, but most benevolent in heart. He was a useful member of the Royal Society, and made considerable attainments in mathematics, the classics, natural philosophy, and astronomy. A number of his astronomical, mathematical, and other papers will be found in Phil. Trans., 1767–76. His name is best known in connexion with his controversy with Dr. Priestley respecting the faith of the Primitive Christians concerning the nature of Christ. In his (1.) History of the Corruptions of Christianity, pub. in 1782, 2 vols. 8vo, the former placed at the head of those both Trinitarianism and Arianism; contending that the Socinian doctrine of the mere humanity of Christ was the unanimous faith of the first believers. This position was combated by Horsley, in his Charge of May 22, 1783, pub. 1783, 4to. Priestley replied in his Letters to Dr. Horsley, 1783, 8vo; and thus the war was fairly commenced. For further information on this head, the reader is referred to the authorities cited below: Horsley's Tracts in Controversy with Dr. Priestley, 3d ed., with Notes and Appendix by Rev. Heneage Horsley, Dundee, 1812, 8vo; and to Priestley's Tracts in Controversy with Bishop Horsley, with Notes by the Editor, and an Appendix, containing a Review of the Controversy, Lon., 1815, 8vo.

"The tracts which he published in controversy with Dr. Priestley are written with consummate ability, and demonstrate the literary deficiencies of his bold antagonist."—Dr E. Williams's C. P.

"In his controversy with Dr Priestley, Bishop Horsley had a manifest advantage (as is now pretty generally acknowledged) both in learning and argument.'—Edin. Rev., xvii 467, q. v.

"The severest castigation which a rash and arrogant invader of another's province ever received."

"Horsley's productions in this controversy will be read as standard works, and admired as models of clear and powerful reasoning. They show a strong and energetic mind, rich in various learning, trained in logical precision, quick in perceiving the fallacies of his opponent and skilful in refuting them.'—Lon. Quar. Rev., iii. 399–400, q. v.

"Horsley was the militant of the last generation, Herbert Marsh of the present."—Southey's Life and Corresp.

Apollonii Pergæi Inclinationum, libri duo Restituti, Oxf., 1770, 4to.

"In this, though it required more than the usual exertions of a commentator, no very great difficulty presented itself, and Dr. Horsley acquitted himself very much to the satisfaction of geometers."—Professor Playfair: Edin. Rev., iv. 258.

See No. 11.

4. Remarks on the Observations made in a late Voyage to the North Pole, [by Hon. Capt. C. J. Phipps, in 1773,] for determining the Acceleration of the Pendulum in latitude 79° 51′, Lon., 1774, 4to.

"Dr. H. here detects some errors of calculation."—Watt's Bibl. Brit.

"This pamphlet ought to be annexed to every copy of Captain Phipps's book [1774, 4to] and bound up with it." See Rich's Bibl. Amer. Nova, i. 195.

5. Complete Edition of the Works of Sir Isaac Newton, under the title of Isaaci Newtoni Opera quæ extant omnia Commentariis, illustrabat Samuel Horsley, LL.D., 1779–85, 5 vols. 4to.

"A work requiring the exertion of uncommon talents, and accompanied with difficulties which Dr. Horsley was by no means prepared to overcome. Indeed, we know of no literary project, even in this day of literary adventure, of which the failure has been more complete."—Professor Playfair: Edin. Rev., iv. 258–259.

6. On the Prosodies of the Greek and Latin Languages, 1796, 8vo. Anon. A work of great merit.

"A work full of erudition, and much esteemed."—Watt's Bibl. Brit.

"In classical acquirements, and in a critical knowledge of the languages in which the sacred books were originally written, he stood in the very first rank of excellence."—Edin. Rev., xvii. 466.

7. Critical Disquisitions on the 18th Chapter of Isaiah; in a Letter to Edward King, Esq., 1796, 1801, 4to. Also in Biblical Criticism, i. 229. 8. Hosea; trans. from the Hebrew, with Notes, Explan. and Crit., 1801, 4to; 1804, 4to. Also in Biblical Criticism, with the exception of the serm. on 1 Pet. iii., which is in the ed. of 1804.

"This is one of the ablest pieces of criticism on a portion of Scripture in the English language. The preface is admirably written, and contains the soundest principles of Biblical interpretation, as well as excellent views of the particular book to which it is prefixed. The version is nervous, and often characteristic of the translator's mind, as well as of the prophet's style. The critical notes display great knowledge of Hebrew, though occasionally they discover that Horsley was partial to novelty and paradox, and in some degree influenced by his Hutchinsonian predilections. Few books are more worthy of the attention of the Biblical scholar."—Orme's Bibl. Bib.

"The preface contains a treasure of Biblical criticism."—Horne's Bibl. Bib.

"Critical and Illustrative."—Bickersteth's C. S.

"This translation, with its notes, forms a most valuable accession to sound learning; and evinces at once the best qualities of the scholar and the divine, supported by sagacity and a powerful judgment."—British Critic, O. S., xix. 176.

9. Elementary Treatises on the Fundamental Principles of Practical Mathematics; for the use of Students, Oxf., 1801, 8vo. 10. Euclidis Elementorum Libri Priores XII., &c., 1802, 8vo. 11. Euclidis Datorum Liber, cum additamentis, &c., 1803, 8vo.

"He certainly possessed competent information and respectable acquirements in mathematics. . . . His edition of Euclid's Elements and Data and his treatise on the elementary parts of plain mathematics are prepared with perspicuity and neatness."—Lon. Quar. Rev., iii. 399.

"In the mathematical and physical sciences, if he stood not in the first rank, he held at least a very respectable station."—Edin. Rev., xvii 466.

But Nos. 10 and 11 are reviewed with considerable severity by Professor Playfair, in Edin. Rev., iv. 257–272. In fact, the ostentatious preface of the bishop aroused vigilance and sharpened criticism. 12. A Critical Essay on Virgil's Two Seasons of Honey, and his Seasons of Sowing Wheat, &c., Lon., 1805, 4to. See No. 6. 13. Serms., Dundee, 3 vols. 8vo; i. and ii., 1810; iii., 1812; vol. ii., 3d ed., 1812; iii., 2d ed., 1813. To these is to be added a 4th vol., Lon., 1815, 8vo, containing 9 Serms. on our Lord's Resurrection, and a Dissert. on the Prophecies of the Messiah, &c. The above vols. were repub. in 2 vols. in 1824, and again in 1829, (including the nine serms. on the Resurrection, and the Dissert. on the Prophecies of the Messiah, &c.; 3d ed., Lon., 1822, 8vo;) in all, 4 vols. in 2. This last ed., 1829, 2 vols. 8vo, is the first complete ed. of Horsley's Sermons; again, 1843, 8vo; 1847, 8vo; and in collective ed. of his Theolog. Works, 1846, (vide post.)

"His sermons are fine specimens of commanding eloquence, and contain many deep and original views of Scripture facts and prophecies."—Dr. E. Williams's C. P.

"Much original, deep, devout, and evangelical matter, with much that is bold, hazardous, speculative, and rash. . . . Bishop Horsley's powers of mind were of a high order; and his sermons and his other works will render assistance to the student chiefly in the way of criticism. He had the integrity and candour to speak decidedly against the ignorance of many who opposed what they called Calvinistic views."—Bickersteth's C. S.

"Ordinary readers, moderately conversant with the Bible, and with the theory and practice of their religion, may derive more advantage from these discourses than from any volumes of sermons which have issued from the press for the last fifty years."—Edin. Rev.

"With very few exceptions, of the critical and explanatory cast, consisting of disquisitions on points of abstruse and difficult investigation. They are not suited to the taste of general readers, but adapted almost exclusively to those 'whose stomachs,' to use the author's own expression, 'are qualified for the digestion of strong meats,' and whose turn of mind has habituated them to critical discussion and inquiry. We perceive, in almost every part, the mind of Horsley at work."—Lon. Quar. Rev., (on vols. i. and ii., 1810.) iii. 398–407, q. v.

"They are compositions sui generis. Never perhaps did philosophy, certainly never did the philosophy of physics, lend more powerful aid to the cause of revelation."—Ibid., (on vols. i.–iii., 1810–12.) ix. 30–39. q. v.

"In the sense in which we have now explained that term, every discourse in the volumes before us [i. and ii., 1810] may justly be denominated a gospel sermon."—Edin. Rev., xvii. 465–466, q. v.

"We have indeed no hesitation whatever to say, that no such sermons have issued from the British press since the commencement of our critical labours."—British Critic.

"This is a posthumous work, and far inferior in merit and importance to the former. (Hosea see No 8.) Not above half the Psalms are translated. On the greater number there are no notes, and these for the most part are short and imperfect. Most of the Psalms the bishop applies to the Messiah to which he mostly follows the doctrines of Hutchinson. As Horsley never wrote what did not deserve to be read, even his fragments and hints are calculated to be of service to the student of the bible, though such a work as this on the Psalms would never have been published by the learned prelate himself."—*Orme's Bibl. "The remarks made on the Psalms (see No 16) are quite as applicable to all that is in these volumes. As a critic Horsley was learned, but dogmatic. Christian Beneficence, 1855, 18mo.

Hosmer, William Henry Cuyerl, b. 1814, at Avon, Western New York, was educated at the Temple Hill Academy at Geneseo, and at Geneva College. He was engaged in the practice of the law at Avon until 1851, when he removed to the city of New York, where he holds an office in the Custom-House.

Mr. Hosmer became an author at a very early age,—his muse finding congenial themes in the legends, customs, and superstitions of the North American Indians, with which he was familiar from his childhood. The following chronological list of his productions is extracted from a work to which (as to the other vols. by the same author) the student of American Letters must have frequent reference,—Griswold's Poets and Poetry of America:

"In 1830 he composed a drama entitled 'The Hall of Tecumseh.' His first publication, except contributions to the journals and magazines was 'The Themes of Song,' containing about six hundred and fifty lines; this appeared in 1834, and was followed by 'The Pioneers of Western New York,' in 1838; 'The Prospects of the Age,' in 1841; 'Yonnondio, or The Warriors of the Genesee,' in 1844; 'The Months,' in 1847; 'Bird Notes,' 'Legends of the Senecas, and 'Indian Traditions and Songs' in 1850; and a complete edition of his 'Poetical Works,' in two volumes, in 1853."

Dr. Griswold commends Mr. Hosmer's poetry in very high terms. After some eulogistic comments upon "the longest, if not the most important, of his productions," the critic continues:

"To such poems, however, [those relating to the Indians,] most readers will be apt to prefer the simpler effusions in which he has echoed the Notes of the Birds, or painted the varying phenomena of The Months. In these, too, he has faithfully subjected his muse to the requirements of truth. He accomplishes his task of description by fidelities in selection and combination from nature. An AUDUBON or a MICHAUX would search in vain for an error in his plumage or foliage, and a COLE might give the finishing touches to the lights and shadows of his landscapes, from the poet's observation of atmospheric effects or the changing influences of the seasons." This is an authentic and a most valuable work. In the Appendix will be found The Acts and Decrees of the Synod of Diamper, &c.

Hough, John, D.D., 1651–1743, a native of Middlesex, educated at, and Fellow of, Magdalene College, Oxford, was elected President of his college in 1687, in contempt of the arbitrary mandamus of James II., who illegally attempted to force the Fellows to elect Anthony Farmer head of the college. The king hereupon sent a mandate to the Fellows to elect Dr Samuel Parker, Bishop of Oxford, a Roman Catholic, President of the college. Upon the refusal of the Fellows, Lords Commissioners were to Magdalene, who were stoutly confronted by H— and twenty- of the twenty eight Fellows of the Colle— and the ke— turned by the former, who boldly protested against the illegal proceedings. The Commissioners then forced open the door of the President's lodgings, and placed Dr. Parker in Hough's place.

"The nation, as well as the university, looked on all this proceeding with a just indignation. It was thought an open piece of robbery and burglary, when men authorized by no legal commission came forcibly and turned men out of their possession and freeholds."—Bishop Burnet

"Hough maintained his own rights and those of his college with equal decorum and firmness."—Sir James Mackintosh's Review of the Causes of the Revolution of 1688, Black, 12mo, Lon., 1854.

"The protest of Hough was everywhere applauded. The form of his door was everywhere mentioned with admiration."—T. B. Macaulay's Hist of Eng., vol. ii., 1849.

This occurred in October, 1687, and in the end of September of the following year, James II.—now alarmed for the safety of his crown—took measures by which Hough and his expelled Fellows and Demies were restored. After the Revolution, Hough was, in April, 1690, made Bishop of Oxford; in 1699 he succeeded Dr. William Lloyd in the see of Lichfield and Coventry; in 1715, on the death of Tenison, he declined the Archbishopric of Canterbury, but in 1717 he became Bishop of Worcester. For further information respecting this excellent man, the reader is referred to the histories of England; John E. Walker's Life and Correspondence of Bishop Hough, Lon., 1812, 8vo, and to the Life prefixed to Bishop Hough's Sermons and Charges, by Wm. Russell, Oxford, 1821, 8vo. During the bishop's life he pub. eight occasional sermons, 1701, '02, '04, '05, '09, '12, '15, all in 4to. Mr. Russell's collection contains four charges and nine sermons, but neither of the above sermons, at which we somewhat marvel. Hough left strict orders that none of his MS. sermons should be pub. after his death.

"He is furnished with a large stock of learning and piety. He has turned over the Fathers with great curiosity and pains and paid a venerable respect to their ashes; and as he is a Prelate of remarkable piety and learning, so he is a Hero of great temper and courage. This was seen in his resolute defending the rights of Magdalen College: for this noble service he is justly rewarded with the See of Lichfield and Coventry. Those whose actions are eminently pious and brave will, like this worthy champion, be eminent in place and person."—John Dunton: Life and Errors.

Hoveden, Roger De, an English historian, lawyer, and divine, temp. Henry II., flourished about the end of the 12th and beginning of the 13th centuries. He was for some time a Professor of History at Oxford; but a portion of his life was spent at court, and in confidential services intrusted to him by the king. He composed Annales in Latin, commencing at the year 731, where Bede left off, and continued to the third year of King John, 1202. The Annales were first pub. by Sir Henry Savile, in the Scriptores post Bedam, Lon., 1595, fol., and reprinted at Frankfort, in two books, 1601, fol. A new ed., by T. Riley, pub. in Bohn's Antiq. Lib., vols. xx., xxiii., 1853. Vossius says that he wrote also a history of the Northumbrian kings, and a life of Thomas à Becket.

"If we consider his diligence, his knowledge of antiquity, and his religious strictness of veracity, he may be considered as having surpassed not only the rude historians of the preceding ages, but even what could have been expected of himself. If to that fidelity, which is the first quality of a historian, he had joined a little more elegance of Latin style, he might have stood the first among the authors of that class."—Lelano.

Howard, Henry, Earl of Surrey, 1518?–1547, one of the most eminent of English poets, was the third son of Thomas, Earl of Surrey, and third Duke of Norfolk, by his second duchess, Elizabeth, daughter of Edward Stafford, Duke of Buckingham. In his early youth he was a companion at Windsor Castle to Henry Fitzroy, Duke of Richmond, Henry VIII.'s natural son; and he subsequently accompanied his friend to Cardinal College, now Christ Church, Oxford. In 1535 he was married to the Lady Frances Vere, in 1542 served in the army under his father in Scotland, and in 1544 was appointed Field-Marshal of the English army on the Continent. He did good service at the sieges of Landrecy and Boulogne, and, by his valour, skill, and accomplishments, secured a degree of popular favour which excited the jealousy of the king and the Earl of Hertford, the king's brother, and thus proved his ruin. In 1546 he was ordered to return from the Continent, made a prisoner on his arrival in England, convicted of high treason on the most absurd pretences, and beheaded on Tower Hill, January 19, 1547. He left two sons and three daughters to mourn his untimely and melancholy end. Much obscurity rests upon his adventures as a romantic traveller and poetical lover, and until recently but little was known of the far-famed lady to whom he indited the most celebrated of his effusions; but "it seems to be now ascertained, after sweeping away a host of foolish legends and traditionary prejudices, that the Geraldine of Surrey, Lady Elizabeth Fitzgerald, was a child of thirteen, for whom his passion, if such it is to be called, began several years after his own marriage. But, in fact, there is more of the conventional tone of amorous song than of real emotion in Surrey's poetry. The are not like the deep sorrows of Petrarch or the fiery transports of the Castilians."—Hallam's Lit. Hist. of Europe, ed. 1854, i. 420.

The passion, if such we are to call it, for "The Fair Geraldine" commenced in 1541, or six years after his marriage to Lady Frances Vere. Geraldine, the daughter of Gerald Fitzgerald, Earl of Kildare, (most probably the Lady Elizabeth,) was born in 1528. She became the third wife of Edward Clinton, Earl of Lincoln. Those who desire to enter more deeply into this subject and the details of our noble author's life, and the characteristics of his poetry, will find ample materials for their investigations in the authorities cited in the course of this article. 1. Some of Surrey's Poems, omitte d by Tottel, will be found at the end of Harrington's Nugæ Antiquæ. His Poems have been reprinted in Johnson's and Chalmers's English Poets. 14. The Fourth Boke of Virgill, intreating of the Love betwene Æneas and Dido; translated into Englishe and drawn into a straunge Metre by Henry, Earle of Surrey, sine anno, 4to. With the Second Book, 1557, sm. 8vo. A copy is in the Dulwich College Library, one in the Library of Wadham College, Oxford, and another in the Bodleian Museum. Reprinted by Baron Bolland, for the Roxburghe Club, 1814, 4to. The "straunge metre" is nothing else than blank verse.

"This is the first composition in blank verse extant in the English language. Nor has it merely the relative and accidental merit of being a curiosity. It is executed with great fidelity, yet not with a pedantic servility. The diction is often poetical, and the versification varied with proper pauses. . . . It seems probable that his active situations of life prevented him from completing a design of translating the whole Æneid."—Warton's Hist. of Eng. Poetry, ed. 1840, iii. 36.

"Surrey is the first who introduced blank verse into our English poetry. . . . The translation by Surrey of the second book of the Æneid, in blank verse, is among the chief of his productions. No one had, before his time, known how to translate or imitate with appropriate expression. But the structure of his verse is not very harmonious, and the sense is rarely carried beyond the line. If we could rely on a theory advanced and ably supported by his editor, [Dr. Nott,] Surrey deserves the still more conspicuous praise of having brought about a great revolution in our poetical numbers."—Hallam's Lit. Hist. of Europe, ed. 1854, i. 427, q. v.

And see our life of NICHOLAS GRIMBOLD, in this Dictionary, p. 743; and authorities cited in the course of this article. To refer to these authorities is the more necessary from the fact that our narrow limits warn us that we must not linger on so tempting a theme. But a few lines of quotation of opinions respecting the illustrious subject of our notice we are not willing to dispense with.

We should not omit to record the fact that Surrey's translations of some of the Psalms and of Ecclesiastes into English verse, and a few additional original poems, were printed by Dr. Percy, but destroyed in the fire at Nichols's office, Feb. 1808. Surrey was the author of many other English poetical compositions, never pub., several of which are now lost.

"John Clerc has mentioned, with the highest commendations, many translations done by Surrey from the Latin, Italian, French, and Spanish languages. But these, it is probable, were nothing more than juvenile exercises." See Warton's Hist. of Eng Poetry, ed. 1840.

"We now emerge from the twilight of learning to an almost classic author, that ornament of a boisterous yet not unpolished court, the Earl of Surrey, celebrated by Drayton, Dryden, Fenton, and Pope, illustrated by his own muse, and lamented for his unhappy and unmerited death; 'a man,' as Sir Walter Raleigh says 'no less valiant than learned, and of excellent hopes.' – HORACE WALPOLE: Park's ed., 1806, i. 255.

To the eulogists of Surrey, Park adds the names of Leland, Ascham, Tuberville, Churchyard, Sir Philip Sidney, Webbe, Puttenham, Meres, Harvey, Whitney, Drayton, Bolton, Peacham, Dryden, Lodge, Brydges, Ellis, Anderson, Warton, and Henry. The list could be enlarged if it were requisite.

"The character of Henry, Earl of Surrey, reflects splendour even upon the name of Howard . . He received in an age too rude to enjoy fully those beauties which more nature could not but in some degree relish, the force of expression, the polished style and the passionate sentiments, of the best poets of antiquity." – LORD: Biog Accounts of the Holkam Patriots.

"Surrey, for his justness of thought, correctness of style and purity of expression, may justly be pronounced the first English classical poet. He unquestionably is the first polite writer of love-verses in our language. It must, however, be allowed that there is a striking native beauty in some of our love-verses written much earlier than Surrey's. But in the most savage age and country rude nature has taught elegance to the lover . . Surrey's talents, which are commonly supposed to have been confined to sentiment and amorous lamentation, were adapted to descriptive poetry and the representation of rural imagery . . . Surrey is said, by the ingenious author (editor) of the Musæ' Lachrymæ to have been the first who broke through the fashion of stanzas and wrote in the heroic couplet. But all Surrey's poems are in the alternate rhyme, nor, had this been true, is the other position to be granted. Chaucer's Prologues and most of the Canterbury Tales are written in long verse: nor was the use of the couplet resumed till late in the reign of Elizabeth . . In the sonnets of Surrey we are surprised to find nothing of that metaphysical cast which marks the Italian poets, his supposed masters, especially Petrarch. Surrey's sentiments are for the most part natural and unaffected, arising from his own feelings, and dictated by the present circumstances. His poetry is alike unembarrassed by learned allusions or elaborate conceits. If our author copies Petrarch, it is Petrarch's better manner: when he descends from his Platonic abstractions, his refinements of passion, his exaggerated compliments, and his play upon opposite sentiments, into a track of tenderness, simplicity, and nature. Petrarch would have been a better poet had he been a worse scholar. Our author's mind was not too much overlaid by learning."—Warton's Hist. of Eng Poetry, ed. 1840, iii. 29, 30, 33, 41.

Dr. Nott's comparison between Wyatt and Surrey, in the Dissertation prefixed to the 2d vol. of his ed. of Wyatt and Surrey, (vide ante.) is well worth perusal, but the work of which it forms a portion can rarely be had. The reader, however, will find an extract from this Dissertation in Hallam's Lit. Hist. of Europe, ed. 1854, i. 423–426. The last-named eminent authority remarks of Surrey:

"The taste of this accomplished man is more striking than his poetical genius. He did much for his own country and his native language. The versification of Surrey differs very considerably from that of his predecessors. He introduced, as Dr Nott says, a sort of involution into his style, which gives an air of dignity and remoteness from common life. It was, in fact, borrowed from the license of Italian poetry, which our own idiom has rejected. He avoids pedantic words forcibly obtruded from the Latin, of which our earlier poets, both English and Scots, had been ridiculously fond. The absurd epithets of Hoccleve, Lydgate, Dunbar, and Douglas, are applic. equally to the most trifling things, so as to show that they annexed no meaning to them. Surrey rarely lays an unnatural stress on final syllables, merely augmented, which they would not receive in ordinary pronunciation; another usual trick of the school of Chaucer. His words are well chosen and well arranged."—Ubi supra, i. 426–427.

The influence of Surrey and Wyatt's poetry upon the taste of his age was by no means so extensive as we might reasonably imagine it would have been:

"The graces of the Italian muse, which had been taught by Surrey and Wyatt, were confined to a few. . . . Although Lord Surrey and some others had so far deviated from the dulness of the times as to copy the Italian poets, the same taste does not seem to have uniformly influenced all the nobility of the court of King Henry the Eighth who were fond of writing verses."—Warton's Hist. of Eng Poetry, ed. 1840, iii. 72, 83–84, q. v., with the authors referred to in the text and notes.

Howard, Henry, Earl of Northampton, 1539?–1614, second son of the preceding, was most unworthy of his illustrious parentage; in proof of which it is enough to mention his complicity with the infamous match of his great-niece, the Countess of Essex, with Carr, Viscount Rochester, and his share in the murder of Sir Thomas Overbury. He was educated at King's College and at Trinity Hall, Cambridge, where, says Bishop Godwin, he was esteemed "the learnedest amongst the nobility, and the most noble amongst the learned." Of his "learning" there seems to be but little doubt: his "nobility," however, cannot be so readily allowed. He left in MS., An Apology for the Government of Woman, Forms of Prayer, &c., and pub. the following very curious work:—A Defensative against the Poyson of supposed Prophecies, Lon., 1583, 4to; 1620, fol. Of this vol., dedicated to Sir Francis Walsingham, which principally relates to expositions of Judicial Astrology, Dreams, Oracles, Conferences with Familiars or Damned Spirits, &c., a copious analysis will be found in Oldys's British Librarian, 331–343. Howard, John, Rector of Marston Trussel, Northampton, &c., pub. a number of sermons, 1693–1728

Howard, John, 1726–1790, the eminent philanthropist, whose name will in all ages be held in reverent esteem, was a native of Hackney, London, the son of a wealthy tradesman, and the inheritor of a large fortune. In 1777 he visited every prison in the United Kingdom, and pub. the results of his investigations in the same year, in a vol. entitled The State of the Prisons in England and Wales, &c., Warrington, 4to. Appendix, 1780, 4to; 2d ed. of the whole, 1780, 8vo; 3d ed., 1784, 4to; 4th ed., 1786, 4to, Lon., 1792, 4to. In 1780 he pub a trans. of a French Account of the Bastile; and in 1789 the Duke of Tuscany's New Code of Civil Law, with an English trans. The deplorable condition of the prisons at home excited a determination to visit those of foreign countries, with the hope of benefit to the miserable inmates; and faithfully did this good man carry out his praiseworthy enterprise. A detail of his labours does not, of course, enter into the plan of a work of this character; but it is only proper that we should direct the reader to the best sources of information respecting a philanthropist whose praise was in every one's mouth, from the rough benediction of the illiterate convict to the splendid eulogy of the greatest orator of modern Europe. He died at Kherson, South Russia, January 20, 1790, of a malignant fever, caught during a visit to a young lady for whom the benefit of his counsel had been invoked. He was buried with distinguished honours by the Russian authorities, and his death excited a profound sensation throughout the civilized world. A monumental statue to his memory, by Bacon, adorns St. Paul's Cathedral.

Howard pub. in 1789, 4to, (2d ed., 1791, 4to,) An Account of the principal Lazarettos in Europe, with various Papers relative to the Plague, &c.; and contributed a paper on the Heat of the Waters at Bath to Phil. Trans., 1777, and another on the Heat of the Ground on Mt. Vesuvius, to Phil. Trans., 1771. See A View of the Character, &c. of Howard, by John Aikin, M.D., 1792, 8vo; Howard and the Prison-World of Europe, by Wm. (from Fraser's Mag., xxv. 369; New Haven Chris. Quar. Spec., by R. Robbins,) iii. 393; Amer. Month. Rev., iv. 253; New Eng. Mag., v. 332. We need hardly remark, in conclusion, that the influence of Christianity was the great moving-power which sent John Howard from the pleasant home and lovely scenery in which he so greatly delighted to visit the cheerless cells of the miserable, the neglected, and the forsaken of earth. The barren creed of infidelity enforces no such duties, seeks no such honours, and submits to no such sacrifices. Yet this Apostle of Humanity understood too well the spirit of the Gospel of Christ to suppose that even his labours—abundant and self-sacrificing as they were—could do aught to procure remission of sin or purchase acceptance with his Maker:

"My immortal spirit," says he "I cast on the sovereign mercy of God, through Jesus Christ, who is the Lord, my strength and my song, and, I trust, has become my salvation. My desire is to be washed and cleansed, and justified in the blood of Christ and to dedicate myself to that Saviour who has bought us with a price."

We have had occasion to record in this volume memorials of many of the mighty, many of the noble, of the illustrious name of HOWARD; but this one "excelleth them all."

Howe, John, 1630–1705, an eminent Non-conformist divine, son of the minister of Loughborough, Leicestershire, was educated at Christ Coll., Cambridge, became Fellow of Magdalene Coll., Oxf., subsequently minister of Great Torrington, Devonshire, and domestic chaplain to Oliver Cromwell, and afterwards to Richard Cromwell; ejected for Non-conformity, 1662; chaplain to Lord Massereene, in Ireland, where he was permitted to preach, 1671 to 1675; chosen minister of the late Dr. Lazarus Seaman's congregation in London, 1675; visited the Continent with Lord Wharton in 1685; returned to London in 1687; and continued to labour among his old congregation until his death, which occurred April 2, 1705. He was a man of profound learning, eminent piety, and unwearied zeal. He was the author of many sermons and theological treatises, which have always been held in the highest estimation. A collective edit. of the works which he pub. in his lifetime, accompanied by a Life of the author by Dr. Edmund Calamy, appeared in 1724, 2 vols. fol.; repub. in 1848, 3 vols. 8vo, £1 7s., edited by Rev. J. P. Hewlett. Two vols. of Serms. were pub. in 1744, 2 vols. 8vo. Howe's Whole Works, edited by Rev. John Hunt, of Chichester, were pub. in 1810–22, 8 vols. r. 8vo. This ed. contains—I. vols. i.–iv., the contents of the 2 fol. vols. of 1724; II. vols. v.–vi., his Posthumous Works, being 78 Serms. and a portion of Pt. 1 of the Principles of the Oracles of God; III. vols. vii.–viii., new matter never before pub. This ed. was pub. at £3 3s.; large paper, r 8vo, £4 4s. Contents, with the Life by Calamy, repub., 1832, imp. 8vo, pp. 1278, £2 2s.; again in 1838, imp. 8vo, £1 10s. A new ed., to be comprised in 9 vols 8vo, has been recently (in May, 1856) announced as in preparation by Messrs. Johnstone and Hunter, of Edinburgh. There have also been new edits. of separate treatises of this author, edited by Noel Gordon, &c.; a Selection from his Works and Sketch of his Life, by Rev. W. Wilson, D.D., 1827, 2 vols. 18mo; Select Treatises, with a Memoir by Thos. Taylor, 1835, 12mo; a selection entitled Christian Theology, by John Howe, selected and systematically arranged, with a Life, by Samuel Dunn, 1836, 12mo; and a Life and Character of Howe, by H. Rogers. Howe's best known works are The Living Temple; The Blessedness of the Righteous; Of Delighting in God; The Redeemer's Tears; Enmity and Reconciliation; The Redeemer's Dominion over the Invisible World; The Office and Work of the Holy Spirit; God's Prescience; The Vanity of this Mortal Life. There are but few theological authors recorded in our Dictionary whose writings have been so enthusiastically commended as those of John Howe.

"He seems to have understood the gospel as well as any uninspired writer, and to have imbibed as much of its spirit. There is the truest sublime to be found in his writings, and some of the strongest pathos; yet, often obscure, generally harsh, he has imitated the worst parts of Boyle's style. He has a vast number and variety of uncommon thoughts, and is, on the whole, one of the most valuable writers in our language, or, I believe, in the world."—Dr. Doddridge.

"Possessed of the learning of Cudworth, the evangelical piety of Owen, and the fervour of Baxter, with a mind of larger dimensions than what belonged to any of these distinguished individuals, every thing which fell from his pen is worthy of immortality. He delights while he instructs, and impresses while he enlightens. His Living Temple, The Blessedness of the Righteous, Of Delighting in God, The Redeemer's Tears are among the finest productions of uninspired genius, and must be read with high gratification by every Christian. His style is occasionally rugged and inharmonious; but the sentiment will richly repay the trifling annoyance of its harsh and involved structure."—Orme's Bibl. Bib.

"For depth and originality of thought, John Howe has never been surpassed by any theological writer whatever. His principles were strictly evangelical and his spirit eminently catholic and devout. His Living Temple especially, is a masterpiece of profound argumentation . . His best pieces are The Blessedness of the Righteous, Delighting in God, Enmity and Reconciliation, Redeemer's Tears, and Dominion. Some Funeral Sermons, and part of his Living Temple, are most excellent."—Dr. E. Williams's C. P.

"Mr. Howe, nervous and majestic, with all the powers of imagery at his command."—James Hervey.

"A very extraordinary, original, sublime, and splendid writer, but sometimes obscure and heavy. Few writers will more strengthen and enlarge the reader's mind: but he is deficient in evangelical statement and simplicity."—Bickersteth's C. S.

"Perhaps it may be considered as no unfair test of intellectual and spiritual excellence that a person can relish the writings of John Howe: if he does not, he may have reason to suspect that something in the head or heart is wrong. A young minister who wishes to attain eminence in his profession, if he has not the works of John Howe, and can procure them in no other way, should sell his coat and buy them; and, if that will not suffice, let him sell his bed and lie on the floor; and if he spend his days in reading them he will not complain that he lies hard at night. . . . . The Blessedness of the Righteous is a first-rate performance, and contains a vast extent of thought, of learning, but especially of piety. . . . A Treatise of Delighting in God is one of the finest pieces of practical theology to be found in the English language."—Bogue and Bennett's Hist. of Dissenters.

"One of the most learned and polite writers among the dissenters. His reading in divinity was very extensive: he was a good Orientalist, and understood several of the modern languages. . . . . His Blessedness of the Righteous was the most generally-esteemed of his performances. He was an admired preacher, but was sometimes too profound for ordinary capacities. There is an uncommon depth of thought in several of his works."—Granger's Biog. Hist. of Eng.

"None can peruse his writings without feeling that his mind was habitually filled with the contemplation of that peculiar but truly divine character, that comprehensiveness and all-pervading excellence, the ultimate development of which, in those who embrace Christianity, is the design of the mysteries it reveals, and of all the powerful motives by which it prompts to action."—Rogers's Life of Howe.

"Nothing in the language can equal, as a whole, Howe's Living Temple: but his Blessedness of the Righteous is one of my favourite pieces. I read it again and again with renewed interest and delight."—William Jay.

The critical opinion of Robert Hall is always too valuable to be omitted where it can at all be crowded in; and, though want of room prevents us from citing other comments before us, the verdict of so eminent an authority must not be denied. It occurs in the memoranda of a conversation between Mr. Hall and the Rev. Robert Balmer, of Berwick-upon-Tweed:

"B. 'May I ask, sir, what writers you would most recommend to a young minister?' H. 'Why, sir, I feel very incompetent to give directions on that head: I can only say that I have learned far more from John Howe than from any other author I ever read. There is an astonishing magnificence in his conceptions. He had not the same perception of the beautiful as of the sublime; and hence his endless subdivisions.' B. 'That was the fault of his age.' H. 'In part, sir; but he has more of it than men of the writers of that period, than Barrow, for example who was somewhat earlier. There was, I think, an innate ineptitude in Howe's mind for discerning minute graces and proprieties and hence his sentences are often long and cumbersome. Still, he was unquestionably the greatest of the Puritan divines.'

"After adverting to several of Howe's works, Mr H. said, in reference to his Blessedness of the Righteous, 'Perhaps Baxter's Saint's Rest is fitted to make a deeper impression on the majority of readers. Baxter enforces a particular idea with extraordinary clearness, force, and earnestness. His appeals to the conscience are irresistible. Howe, again, is distinguished by calmness, self possession, majesty, and comprehensiveness, and for my own part, I decidedly prefer him to Baxter. I admire, exceedingly, his Living Temple, his sermon on the Redeemer's Tears &c., but, in my opinion, the best thing he ever wrote is his defence of the sincerity of the Gospel offer. I refer to the treatise called the Reconcilableness of God's Prescience of the Sins of Men with the Wisdom and Sincerity of his Counsels, Exhortations and whatever other whatsoever Means he uses to prevent them. This I regard as the most profound, the most philosophical, and the most valuable of all Howe's writings.'"—Hall's Works, ed. Lon., 1833. Memoir, i. 120.

Howell, Elizabeth, widow of Robert Howell, of Philadelphia and a native and resident of that city, better known by her maiden name, Miss Lloyd,—has gained considerable reputation by her poem entitled Milton's Prayer of Patience. These verses, originally pub. anonymously in The Friends' Review for January, 1848, were subsequently pub. as Milton's in an English edit. of his works. They have frequently appeared in periodicals under the title of Milton on his Loss of Sight. It is hardly necessary to state that they possess an uncommon degree of merit. They will be found in T. Buchanan Read's Female Poets of America, 6th ed., Phila., 1855. Mrs. Howell also contributed several poems to The Wheat Sheaf, a collection of Prose and Poetry, Phila., 1852; 3d ed., 1857.

Howell, George. Med. con., Phil. Trans., 1746.

Howell, James, 1594–1666, educated at, and Fellow of, Jesus College, Oxford, was the son of Thomas Hall, minister of Abernant, in Caermarthenshire. From 1619 he travelled in Holland, Flanders, Spain, France, and Italy, as steward to a glass ware manufactory, and was subsequently employed abroad and at home on public business, and in 1640 made Clerk of the Council. In 1643 he was committed to the Fleet Prison by order of Parliament, and remained there, writing and translating books, until some time after the murder of Charles I. At the Restoration his sufferings in the cause of loyalty were rewarded by the post of Historiographer-Royal of England, which place was created for his benefit and retained by him until his death. He was a man of learning and humour, and versed in the modern languages. "Thank God," he says, "I have this fruit of my foreign travels that I can pray unto Him every day of the week in a separate language, and upon Sunday in seven." As a writer, although he was the author of forty one original works,—historical, political, poetical, and philological,—and the translator of four from the Italian, one from the French, and one from the Spanish, all but his Familiar Letters may be said to be unknown to ordinary readers. We notice a few of his publications:—1. Dendrologia; or, the Vocall Forest, Lon., 1640, fol.; 2d ed., 1644, 4to; Camb., 1645, 12mo; 3d ed., pub. under the title of ΔΕΝΔΡΟΔΟΓΙΑ—Dodona's Grove; or, the Vocall Forest. Pub. with two other tracts, viz.: Parables reflecting upon the Times, and England's Teares for the Present Wars, 1645; 2d Part of Dodona's Grove, 1650, 8vo. In French, 1st Part, Paris, 1641, 4to; 2d Part, Paris, 1652, 4to. In Latin, 1st Part, Lon., 1646, 8vo.

"This is a strange allegory, without any ingenuity in maintaining the analogy between the outer and the inner story, which alone can give a reader any pleasure in allegorical writing. The subject is the state of Europe, especially of England, about 1640, under the guise of animated trees in a forest. . . The contrivance is all along so clumsy and unintelligible, the invention so poor and absurd, the story—if story there be—so dull an echo of well-known events, that it is impossible to reckon Dodona's Grove any thing but an entire failure. Howell has no wit but he has abundance of conceits, flat and commonplace enough. With all this, he was a man of some sense and observation."—Hallam's Lit. Hist. of Europe, ed. 1854; iii. 169.

Mr. Hallam suggests with much plausibility that Harrington's Oceana, pub. in 1656, was "Partly suggested, perhaps, by the Dodona's Grove of Howell, or by Barclay's Argenis, and a few other bottoms of the preceding age."—Ubi supra, p 438 See Censura Literaria

"Something is to be had from Howell still. It is agreeable, if not useful, to know what a traveller was in the days of James and Charles."—Lon. Retrosp. Rev., xiii 18-30, 1826 This review contains copious quotations.

3. Epistolæ Ho-Elianæ; or, Familiar Letters, Domestic and Foreign: divided into sundry Sections, partly Historical, partly Political, partly Philosophical, upon emergent Occasions, 1645, 4to. Another vol. in 1647; both those, with the addit. of a third, in 1650, 3 vols. 8vo; 4th vol., 1655, 8vo; 11th ed., 1754, 8vo. Since several times reprinted. These Letters, addressed to James I., to several Lords and Bishops, Sir Kenelm Digby, Sir Rob. Napier, Ben Jonson, and others, contain many curious particulars relating to the reigns of James I. and Charles I.

"Many of the said letters were never written before the author of them was in the Fleet, as he pretended they were, only feigned, (no time being kept with their dates) and purposely published to gain time to relieve his necessities, yet give a tolerable history of those times."—Athen. Oxon., Bliss's ed., iii 746-747.

Dr. Bliss gives a table of the edits. of Howell's Letters, and announces his intention of publishing a new and corrected edit., with notes and an appendix, for which he had long been making the necessary collections. It is to be greatly regretted that it was never given to the world. The table of edits. is as follows:—1. 1647; 2. 1647; 3. 1650; 4. 1655; 5. 1673; 6. 1688; 7. 1708; 9. 1726; 10. 1737; 11. 1754. The ed. of 1737 has the reputation of being the best.

"I believe the second published correspondence of this kind, and, in our own language at least, of any importance after Hall, [see HALL, JOSEPH, D.D.] will be found to be Epistolæ Ho-Elianæ, or the Letters of James Howell, a great traveller, an intimate friend of Jonson, and the first who bore the office of the royal historiographer, which discovers a variety of literature, and abound with much entertaining and useful information."—Warton's Hist of Eng. Poet., ed. 1840, iii. 440-441.

"Howell is a wit who, in writing his own history, has written that of his own times: he is one of the few whose genius, striking in the heat of the moment only current coin, produces finished metal for the cabinet. His letters are still published."—Disraeli's Literary Miscellanies, ed. 1840. p. 45.

"These letters were written in England, but are not the coinage of British mill. They are amusing and instructive and have deservedly gone through half a score of editions. The account in them of the assassination of Henry IV. of France is minutely curious."—Dibdin's Lib. Comp.

"His letters are entertaining."—HALLAM: ubi supra.

"If there be any exception to the general rule that letters prepared for the press are the most sickening and tiresome of all compositions, it will certainly be found in the familiar letters of James Howell, commonly called Epistolæ Ho-Elianæ, which compose one of the most curious volumes in English literature."—*Lon. The reader who desires to know more of Howell and his publications must refer, in addition to authorities already cited, to Biog. Brit., Lloyd's Memoirs, and Lowndes's Bibl. Man., 974-975. We marvel that some of the enterprising British publishers—the Nicholses, Bohns, or Parkers, who have done so much for the revival of ancient English lore—have not presented us with a new edit. of Epistolæ Ho-Elianæ; for, in the words of an eminent authority,

"It is refreshing to turn from the cobweb compositions of the present day, in which there is no strength of material, to the sterling sense and lively wit of these familiar letters."—Lon. Retrosp. Rev., vol. iv. p. 200, 1821.

The new editor of the Letters, if such an individual should make his appearance, must endeavour to procure the late Henry Fauntleroy's illustrated copy, bound in three imperial folios.

Hargrave disclaimed the editorial responsibility connected with the collection of State Trials which goes under his name. See a valuable article on the State Trials, in Wallace's Reporters, 3d ed., 1855, 54-59. To the works recommended in these articles to the legal student, we must add one of recent date, viz.: Modern State Trials Reviewed and Illustrated, 1850, 2 vols. 8vo, by Wm. Chas. Townsend, Recorder of Macclesfield, and author of several valuable half-legal, half-historical works. A review of Howell's State Trials will be found in Edin. Rev., xxxi. 235-246. Miss Mitford hung over the State Trials with delight:

"Of all collected works, those I liked best—better than the poets from Chaucer to Tennyson, better than the dramatists from Shakspeare to Talfourd—were those most real and exciting of all dramas called trials."—Recollec. of a Literary Life.

We avow the same taste, though not quite to the same extent, and are now in anxious quest of a copy of the State Trials, and trust that before the reader sees this article we shall see the thirty-four goodly octavos adorning our library-shelves.

Howitt, Mary, a daughter of Mr. Botham, of Uttoxeter, a member of the Society of Friends, was married to William Howitt, a congenial spirit, in 1821. The lives of both have been so well told in a publication just issued, and accessible to all, 'Men of the Time, Lon., 1856,' that it will be unnecessary to repeat what we should be unable to improve. Moreover, the plan of our work is better answered by a list of their publications, with some critical notices of their characteristics as writers,—which citations of opinions we are obliged to restrict within very narrow limits.

In 1823 Mr. and Mrs. Howitt gave to the world their first publication,—The Forest Minstrel, which was succeeded in 1827 by The Desolation of Eyam, and other Poems. To these joint productions may be added, The Book of the Seasons, first pub. in 1831, and The Literature and Romance of Northern Europe, issued in 1852, and Stories of English Life, in Bohn's Illustrated Library, 1853. The following alphabetical catalogue—compiled with considerable labour, and, we trust, nearly if not quite complete—of Mary Howitt's separate publications evinces no ordinary amount of literary industry. 1. Alice Franklin, 1843, 18mo. 2. Ballads and other Poems, 1847, p. 8vo. 3. Birds and Flowers, and other Country Things, 1848, 12mo. 4. Do., Second Series, 1855, sq. 5. Children's Year, 1847, 18mo. 6. "Of this production, which makes itself an epoch in the world of children, it is superfluous to speak The Fable Book is throughout all Germany in the hands of parents and children, and will always be new, because every year fresh children are born."

The above register affords a tolerable proof that Mary Howitt has not "eaten the bread of idleness;" but, if to these volumes—many of them exhibiting evidences of no little toil—we add her contributions for the last thirty years to the periodicals of the day,—to The Amulet, The Literary Souvenir, The Drawing Room Scrap Book, (of which she was for three years the editor,) The People's Journal, &c., —we shall have an aggregate of printed matter which few authors of the day can equal. But unfortunately the mere fact of voluminousness does not always imply either merit on the part of the author or advantage on that of the public. The great question is not as to quantity, but as to quality. By many writers we should have been benefited more had they written less, and of many it is to be regretted that they ever wrote at all. But if of any we can justly say,—This pen has ever been employed in the advocacy of the true, the beautiful, and the good; the alleviation of human suffering, and the cure of social disorders; the education of the mind, and the improvement of the heart; the cultivation of home-duties and home-affections, and the development of fraternal unity in the great brotherhood of man;—surely of such it shall be said, Here is one worthy of honour, of love, and of praise;—and such is Mary Howitt! When we return from the pleasing contemplation of the moralist, to consider the literary merits of an instrumentality which has been so widely productive of beneficial results, we are conscious that the theme has been anticipated—not to say exhausted. Mrs. Howitt's position, whether we consider her as a poetess, a novelist, an essayist, or as an instructor of the youthful mind, is too well determined, too generally acknowledged, to require any championship at our hands. Yet we are not willing to conclude this article without the adduction of at least a few tributes to the merits of one whose happiness it is to number as many friends as she has readers, and to have as few enemies as she has written worthless books.

"There can be no surer proof of the genuineness of the poetical power possessed by Mary Howitt, than the fact that her finer pieces ever recur again and again to the memories of all imaginative readers. This can be only owing to their feminine tenderness, their earnest tone, their gentle music, and their simple but genuine nature."—Mrs's Sketches of the Poet. Lit. of the Past Half-Century.

"Mary Howitt has shown herself mistress of every string of the minstrel lyre, save that which sounds of broil and bloodshed. There is more of the old ballad simplicity in her compositions than can be found in the strains of any living poet besides; her language is vigorous, but not swelling; and always subordinate to the sentiments, whether of tenderness or of love."—Allan Cunningham's Biog. and Crit. Hist of the Lit. of the Last Fifty Years.

"Her poems are always graceful and beautiful, and often vigorous, but they are essentially feminine: they afford evidences of a kindly and generous nature, as well as of a fertile imagination and a safely-cultivated mind."—Mrs Hall.

"Her language is chaste and simple, her feelings tender and pure, and her observation of nature accurate and intense."—Christopher North: Noctes Ambrosianæ: Blackw. Mag., xxiv. 675.

"Sweet Mary Howitt! her name brings a magic with it, let us see it when and where we will! It is one crowded with pleasant associations, telling of wisdom learned by the wayside and under the hedgerows; breathing perfumes—not the perfumes of balls and routs, but—of violets and wild flowers; leading the mind to pure and pleasant thoughtfulness."—New Monthly Magazine.

"Mary Howitt, the poetess alike of the Fireside and of the Field, and perhaps the most popular of all our female writers, takes a rank second to none among the fair poets of our country. . . . Not content with showing that she possesses noble powers, Mrs. Howitt exhibits the rare ambition of using her gifts nobly; and with an earnest eloquence, which often reaches sublimity, she proclaims herself the poet of the Young, and the Humble, and the Poor Her sympathies with all classes are strong:

'All tears
Which human sorrow sheds are dear to her:'

but with these classes they are overpowering . . . In summing up my imperfect estimate of Mary Howitt I would say that no Female Poet in our literature surpasses her, and that but few equal her. As a versifier, as a moralist, and as a philosopher, she may safely challenge comparison with any writer of her own sex, and with most of the writers of the other sex; whilst as regards grace, pathos, womanly sentiment, and Christian sympathy, she has scarcely a 'rival near her throne' I believe that her writings have done more to elevate our ideas of woman's intellectual character than all the treatises on that subject in our language."—Rowton's Female Poets of Great Britain.

Howitt, Richard, brother of William and Mary Howitt, settled for four years as a physician at Melbourne, Australia, has given us the results of his observations in his work entitled (1.) Impressions of Australia Felix, during Four Years' Residence in that Colony: Australian Poems, &c., Lon., 1845, 12mo; 1847, 12mo.

"The Impressions make up an amusing volume: one, too, which, taken cum grano, may be useful."—Lon. Athenæum.

Mr. Howitt has also given to the world (2.) Antediluvian Sketches, and other Poems, 1830, 12mo, pp. 148.

"Richard, too, has a true poetical feeling, and no small poetical power. His unpretending volume of verses well deserves a place in the library along with those of his enlightened relatives; for he loves nature truly as they do, and nature has returned his affection."—Christopher North: Noctes Ambrosianæ; Blackwood's Magazine, xxix 700.

"It is one of the few books of this sort that fully answers the title of Poems:—IT IS POETRY."—Friends' Magazine. Oct. 1830.

"There is a great deal of poetical and also of good kindly feeling in this little volume. . . . It is a rare thing to see a whole family so gifted as the family of Howitt: truly their union must be a 'musical meeting.'"—Lon. Lit. Gazette, Sept. 11, 1830.

Howitt, William, b. 1795, at Heanor, in Derbyshire, the husband and literary associate of Mary Howitt, has been already briefly noticed in our article devoted to the latter, in which the reader is referred for further information to the life of Mr. Howitt in Men of the Time, Lon., 1856. Such is their own words, is said to be their aim.' SHEPHERD: 'And nae insignificant aim either, sir. Has they hit it?' NORTH: 'They have.'"—Noctes Ambrosianæ Blackw. Mag., xxix. 780.

12. History of England. This work is at the present time (1856) in course of publication It is pub. in numbers to the amount of 100,000 weekly. It will probably employ Mr. Howitt for several years to come 13 History of Priestcraft, 1834, 12mo; 7th ed., 1845, 12mo 8th ed., 1846, 12mo. More than 20,000 copies sold to 1852. 14. The author is at the present moment (Nov. 1856) preparing a new and still more complete edit. of this work, which will be enriched with much new matter.

"Every reader turns with pleasure to those passages of Horace, Pope, and Boileau, which describe how they lived and where they dwelt."—SAMUEL ROGERS.

Mr. Howitt's motto on the title-page of this work is very happily selected:

"An indissoluble sign of their existence has stamped itself on the abodes of all distinguished men, a sign which places all kindred spirits in communion with them."—The Citizen of Prague.

This work was commended by The Examiner, The Atlas, &c., and received very faint commendation from the Literary Gazette; but the Athenæum was much less lenient, —styling the work

"Two gossiping volumes, not very subtle or sound in their criticisms, nor very novel in design and treatment. They are extremely inaccurate in parts: with very little in them derived from books, and that little of the commonest kind. There is a fair sprinkling of conceit throughout, and there are some good passages derived from personal observation," &c.—1847, 35–41; 55–66.

At this critique Mr. Howitt felt himself greatly aggrieved, and so expressed himself, whereupon the reviewer returned to the attack with renewed ardour, (see Athenæum, 1847, 149.) Other notices of the work will be found on pp. 96, (a melancholy instance of bad temper and injustice by a correspondent of the journal,) 125, 151, 173, 200, 201, 1175.

Mr Howitt has indeed done something to mark localities and houses, but for the full knowledge and intelligent criticism that would surround these landmarks with clusters of associations, making bare walls eloquent and giving speech to all the neighbouring objects, we look in vain. The Homes and Haunts, instead of being original essays, are, in fact, nothing more than a collection of brief and prosaic biographies, made up in general from well-known sources, and tediously full of anecdotes."—The Britannia.

"When our author is content with description, we follow his lead with pleasure, when he generalizes, we lose our confidence, if not our pleasure. His strength lies in a fresh and hearty appreciation of nature, of costume and of character. 17 Literature and Romance of Northern Europe, 1852, 2 vols. p. 8vo: in conjunction with Mary Howitt. This erudite work, the only complete one of the kind in the English language, will be more and more prized in proportion as the taste for Scandinavian literature becomes generally diffused among scholars in Great Britain and the United States It is an excellent guide to the literature of Sweden, Denmark, Norway, and Iceland, with copious specimens of the historics, romances, legends, dramas, ballads, &c. of those countries. With above 50 illustrations This vol. is commended, on the whole, by the Athenæum, but it is objected that

"Mr Howitt is too fond of stating impressions as general truths. Neither can we recommend the reader to place much reliance on his judgment in art, or his sweeping sketches of literature and opinion." 1842, 1029–1033, 1060 1062

"A volume which will add to William Howitt's literary reputation, and be read with delight by thousands of his countrymen, as being the first faithful and comprehensive account of a people to whom they are allied by a kindred language and kindred dispositions. The engraved illustrations are perfect gems of art."—Lon. Atlas.

"We think this work the most interesting of any thing William Howitt has done. It possesses all his well-known excellencies, and derives from its subject the attraction of both novelty and knowledge."—Lon. Spectator.

Some brief extracts from German opinions of this work will not be out of place:

"The author, who has become so celebrated and appreciated from many of his works, has given us, in the above volume, an extremely interesting and characteristic description of Life in Germany as well as an accurate account of the manners and customs of this country."—Hügel's Universal Magazine

"How ... a man of mature years, with all the youthful fire of poetry and humanity,—every inch an Englishman,—gives us here a most original work on Germany. He treats us and our affairs with such an earnestness of conviction, such a love of impartiality, such an amiable candour, that we cannot censure him, but must respect what he says."—Allgemeine Zeitung, Feb. 5, 1845

"We return our hearty thanks to Howitt, whose work we have so often quoted, for the extraordinary accuracy, freedom, and nobility of spirit with which he has set himself to describe the life, characters, and circumstances of our country."—Königsberg Zeitung, March, 1843.

"Admirable, and to English readers indispensable, volumes; not merely a charming, but an ennobling work."—Lon. Atlas.

"There is much that is pleasant and interesting in these volumes; but, as a whole, they have been over-elaborated."—Lon. Athenæum, 1838, 63–64.

"I should have been glad to have taken further note of the landscape of Theocritus, on which Mr. Howitt dwells with just delight. Other parts of the book will be found very suggestive and helpful to the reader who cares to pursue the subject."—RUSKIN: Mod. Painters, vol. iii. App., p. 347.

TRANSLATIONS FROM THE GERMAN. 25. Peter Schlemihl; from Aldelbert Von Chamisso; German and English, 1843, 16mo. 26. The Student Life of Germany; from the unpublished MSS. of Dr Cornelius, 1841, med. 8vo. This work was written for and at the solicitation of Mr. Howitt. It contains nearly forty of the most famous songs of the German students, in German and English, with the original music, adapted to the pianoforte by Herr Winkelmeyer. This work was sharply criticized in England, but in Germany it has been highly commended. Some of the habits of some of the German students are not the most refined in the world; but that is not Mr. Howitt's fault. See Eclec. Rev., 4th Ser., 327; Athenæum, 1841, 807; Atlas; Examiner; N. 28. Universal Hist. of Magic; from the German of Dr. Joseph Ennemoser. To which is added an appendix of apparitions, dreams, second-sight, somnambulism, &c., selected by Mary Howitt. Bohn's Scientific Library, vols. xiii., xiv., p. 8vo, 1854. In this translation, made whilst on his voyage to Australia, Mr. Howitt was assisted by his eldest son. The character of Ennemoser's work is well known to the German scholar. Mr. Howitt has long contemplated the publication of a history of the Life and Times of George Fox; but whether it will ever see the light is perhaps doubtful. In addition to the works above noticed, he is the author of the article "Quakers" in the 7th edit. of the Encyclopedia Britannica, many pieces in The Literary Souvenir, The Amulet, &c., and, in conjunction with Mary Howitt, edited, for the three years of its continuance, (1847–49, 3 vols. r. 8vo,) Howitt's Journal, a periodical which started with a circulation of 30,000 copies. It was purchased by the owner of the People's Journal, (of which Mr. Howitt had been a co-proprietor and manager,) in consequence of some pecuniary difficulties. Both journals are now extinct, to the great loss of the intelligent portion of the middle classes of Great Britain.

We have quoted many opinions respecting Mr. Howitt's merits and demerits as a writer, but are obliged to withhold many more from want of space. Whilst we are far from deeming him infallible, and consider that in his earnestness to enlighten (as he supposes) the public mind he has at times treated some most important themes with censurable levity and culpable irreverence, yet we cannot coincide with the reproof that the Reformer should not expose evils without at the same time providing for their extirpation. I might as well blame a neighbour for apprizing me that my house was on fire, because he failed to inform me immediately of a certain mode of extinguishing the flames; or forbid my physician to announce the presence of disease, unless he undertook at the same moment to arrest its course. With the exception, therefore, hinted at above, many of our countrymen and countrywomen will unite with the commendation of our highest literary authority:

"We rejoice to see the works of the Howitts, whatever they may be, republished amongst us. Their names have a pleasant sound; their writings are sure to be animated by a kindly, humane spirit; and no one can leave them without feeling that he has been in delightful company."—N. Amer. Rev.

In the last quarter of a century (few authors have been able so long to command the undiminished interest of a novelty-loving public) many kind things have been said of William and Mary Howitt; but we doubt if any tribute is more highly prized than that of Christopher North, recorded in the 56th Number of Noctes Ambrosianæ, April, 1831: see Blackwood's Magazine, xxix. 699–700. For the preparation of this history the State paid him £50. For much of the most important portion of the earlier annals he was indebted to Winthrop's MS. Journal; and Hubbard's MS., in turn, was of great service to Mather, Prince, Hutchinson, Holmes, &c.:

"To style, indeed, Hubbard has in this work afforded little attention, or rather has employed several modes of composition in his different chapters, here dilating in a careful examination of events and discussion of principles, there confining himself to the most meagre manner of the humblest diary. But his skill may be ascertained from his election sermon, [1676] which no work of the two next generations surpassed . . . Hubbard's claims as the historian of the great war of 1675–76 are universally acknowledged for these editions have made his Indian Wars well known."—James Savage, Head of the Mass. Hist. Soc.; N. Amer. Rev., ii. 221–230.

"In a word he is learned without ostentation and vanity, and gives all his productions such a delicate turn and grace, (as is seen in his printed Sermons and History of the Indian Wars,) that the textures and lineaments of the Child make a clear discovery and distinction of the Father: yet is he a man of singular modesty of strict morals and has done as much for the conversion of the Indians as most men in England."—John Dunton's Life and Errors ed. 1818, i. 155–234, q. v. for a tavernable account of the worthy divine's love of hospitality and good books.

The Works of William Shakspeare: The Text carefully restored according to the First Editions; with Introductions, Notes, Original and Selected, and a Life of the Poet, Munroe & Co., Bost., 1851–56, 11 vols. 16mo. As regards size and print, this edition is modelled upon the favourite one in England known as the Chiswick Edition. It contains all the Plays, Poems, and Sonnets of Shakspeare. We have several commendations before us of Mr. Hudson's editorial labours, but have space for the following only:

"There is every probability that as soon as Mr. Hudson's Shakspeare becomes known, as it well deserves to be, in this country, it will meet with no inconsiderable amount of patronage here."—New (London) Quarterly Review.

"Mr. Verplanck has brought the treasures of a various and recondite learning, with no common share of critical sagacity, to the illustration of Shakspeare. Following in the same direction, but striking out a new path, Mr. Hudson has enriched the literature of our language with the fruits of his studies, mastering the difficulties of the poet with wonderful ingenuity, seizing the spirit of his characterization with kindred subtlety, and in a singularly nervous and racy style, presenting some of the finest specimens of critical analysis of which any modern writer can boast."

Mr. Hudson has been a contributor to the Church Review, the American Whig Review, and the Democratic Review, and in 1850 pub. a Serm. entitled Old Wine in Old Bottles. In 1857 he originated and edited the American Church Monthly, pub. in N. York.

Hughes, John, 1677–1720, a native of Marlborough, a contributor to The Tatler, Spectator, and Guardian, and the author of the whole or the principal part of the Essays, Discourses, &c. of the Lay Monk, (2d ed., 1714, 12mo,) a sequel to the Spectator, has lost the poetical reputation which he enjoyed. He was educated at a Dissenters' Academy in London, and subsequently held a place in the Office of Ordnance, and was Secretary to the Commissioners for the purchasing of lands for the royal dockyards. Later in life he was Secretary to the Commission[illegible] of the Peace. 1. Poem on the Peace of Ryswick, 1697. 2. The Court of Neptune, 1699. 3. Ode on the Death of K. William, 1702. 4. Ode in Praise of Music, 1703, 4to. 5. Spenser's Works, with Life, &c., 1715, 6 vols. 12mo. 6. The Siege of Damascus; a Tragedy, 1720, 8vo. The author died on the same night that this piece was first performed with great applause. 7. Poems and Prose Essays, 1735, 2 vols 12mo; Poets. He trans. Fontenelle's Dialogues of the Dead, and Discourse concerning the Ancients and Moderns, the Abbé Vertot's Hist. of the Revolutions in Portugal, Letters of Abelard and Heloisa, and wrote the preface to the Complete Hist. of England, 1706, 3 vols fol. His Correspondence was pub. by the Rev. J. Duncombe, with Notes, 1772, 3 vols. 12mo; 2d ed., 1773, 3 vols. p. 8vo. As a translator, Hughes is entitled to considerable credit: of his original efforts The Siege of Damascus is the only piece by which he is now known to the reading public. Addison thought so highly of Hughes's dramatic abilities that he begged him to write the fifth Act of Cato:

"Hughes was very capable of writing this fifth Act. The Siege of Damascus is a better tragedy than Cato, though Pope affected to speak slightingly of its author."—Dr. Joseph Warton: Note to Pope's Prologue to C

"He Ru[illegible] grave a poet for me, and, I think, among the Moderns [illegible] as well as terse."—Swift to Pope.

"What h[illegible] genius he made up as an honest man; but he was a th[illegible] you think him."—Pope to Swift.

Dr Joh[illegible] in his life of Hughes quotes the above, (and more of the same correspondence,) avoids giving any opinion re[illegible] poeting the literary merits of his author; but it is easy to perceive that he agrees with the estimate he cites. An eminent critic, in his comments upon the merits of our author, remarks:

"[illegible] place however, which can with any propriety claim Hughes the appellation of a poet, is The Siege of Damascus. Of this Dr. [illegible] which is still occasionally acted, the sentiments [illegible] pure and correct, the imagery frequently beautiful, [illegible] arrangement for the most part clear and [illegible] It is defective notwithstanding, in the most essential [illegible] of dramatic composition, the power of affecting the passions; [illegible] more likely to afford pleasure in the closet than [illegible] Hughes, he has more merit as a translator of [illegible] original; [illegible] On the prose of Hughes I am [illegible] more [illegible] than on his poetry. . . . All the [illegible] of Hughes are written in a style which is, in fact, decent; they occasionally exhibit wit [illegible] humour, and thus well and truly tend to inculcate the best precepts prudential and religious."—Drake's Essays Illustrative of the Tatler, Spectator, and Guardian, (vol. iii. 29–30;) q. v. for [illegible] of Hughes's share in these periodicals, and see the Pre[illegible] to the various edits. of those works.

Hughes, John. Serm., &c., 1803, '04, both 8vo.

Hughes, John, the "Buller of Braxenmose," (though really of Oriel,) celebrated in Wilson's Christopher in the Tent, was the author of an Itinerary of Provence and the Rhone during 1819, (1822, 8vo, 1829, 8vo,) and poetical and other compositions. The literary merits of Hughes are depicted in glowing terms by Miss Mitford in her Recollections, and a still greater authority has lavished his encomiums upon the Itinerary.

"A poet, a draughtsman, and a scholar, who gives such an animated description of Chateau Grignan, the dwelling of Madame de Sevigné's beloved daughter, that no one who has ever read the book would be within forty miles of the same without going a pilgrimage to the spot."—Sir Walter Scott.

This work contains thirteen good etchings by the author; and a set of Views in Provence and on the Rhone, r. 4to, illustrative of the Itinerary, was engraved by W. B. Cooke.

"Was not his Provence and the Rhone almost the only book ever praised in the Waverley Novels? [in Quentin Durward.] Does not he contrive in his journals to make his pen do double duty as sketcher and writer?"—Miss Mitford: ubi supra.

Hughes, the Most Rev. John, D.D., Archbishop of the Roman Catholic Church in New York, b. in the North of Ireland, 1798, came to America in 1817, was educated at the College of Mount St. Mary, Emmetsburg, Maryland, ordained in 1825, and shortly afterwards appointed pastor of a church in Philadelphia; Bishop-administrator of the Diocese of New York, 1838; Archbishop of the R. The censures of the Athenæum—a portion of which only we have above quoted—elicited some comments from Dr. Hume, for which see same periodical, 1847, p. 795. The Lon. Medical Gazette and the Lon. Spectator commend the work in high terms.

Hume, Alexander, 1560?-1609, minister of Logie, grandson of Patrick Hume, fifth Baron of Polworth, pub. in 1599, Edin., 4to, a book entitled Hymnes, or Sacred Songs, portions of which have been several times reprinted, and the whole was repub. lately by the Bannatyne Club. Of these pieces, the Day Estival is considered the most beautiful, and was highly commended by Dr. Leyden and others. An account of this author and three other Alexanders Hume will be found in Chambers and Thomson's Biog. Dict. of Eminent Scotsmen, 1855, 92-96. Hume, David, April 26, 1711-August 25, 1776, a native of Edinburgh, was the second son of Joseph Hume, or rather Home, of Ninewells, near Dunse, Scotland, a descendant of the Earl of Home. The subject of our notice, after an unsatisfactory attempt to master the study of the law, and a like unsuccessful essay (in 1731) as a merchant's clerk in Bristol, went to France, with the design of pursuing there, in an economical manner, those literary pursuits in which alone he took any interest. In 1737 he came to London, and in the year following gave to the world his Treatise of Human Nature. This, his first publication, was not successful; but it is difficult to discourage a young author who has once seen his compositions in print, and in 1741 appeared his Essays, Moral and Political. This work met with more favour, and he was induced to follow it up in 1748 with Philosophical Essays concerning Human Understanding, (in fact, a new edit. of the first part of his Treatise of Human Nature;) in 1751 with An Enquiry concerning the Principles of Morals; in 1752 with Political Discourses; and in 1755 with The Natural Hist. of Religion, &c. It was between the dates of the two last-named publications that Hume put forth the first vol. of the work by which his name will be transmitted to the latest posterity. The publication of the History of England—1st ed. in 6 vols. 4to, Lon.—was as follows:—Vol. I. The Reigns of James I. and Charles I., 1754. II. The Commonwealth, and the Reigns of Charles II. and James II., 1756. III., IV. The Reigns of Henry VII., Henry VIII., Edward VI., Queen Mary, and Queen Elizabeth, 1759. V., VI. In vol. i. will be found Hume's Autobiography, his Will, a notice of his last illness, by Adam Smith, and a documentary account of the controversy—if so it may be called—between Hume and Rousseau.

It is now time to return to the personal history of the author, preparatory to a brief examination of his characteristics as a man of letters. Although the first vol. of the History was at first severely censured, and then almost entirely neglected by the public, yet the appearance of his Dissertation on the Natural History of Religion before the publication of the second stimulated the languishing curiosity of the reading world, and Hume found himself at last in possession of that literary distinction for which he had long pined in secret. The demand for the succeeding vols. was so great, that fortune was added to fame; and the former was subsequently augmented by several diplomatic and other political appointment; among which was the Secretaryship of the French Embassy, 1763-65, and the post of Under-Secretary of State under General Conway, 1767-68. In 1769 he bade adieu to public life and the literary circles of London, and returned to the city of his birth, doubtless with much of that yearning for old scenes and old friends so beautifully described by the author of The Deserted Village. He returned home, he tells us, "very opulent," for he "possessed a revenue of £1000 a year, healthy, and, though somewhat stricken in years, with the prospect of enjoying long his ease." But, notwithstanding the natural desire of the philosopher his days had now approached their termination. In the spring of 1775 he was attacked with a disorder of the bowels, which gradually sapped his strength, and resulted fatally on the 25th of August, 1776. After his death appeared, in 1779, 8vo, his Dialogues concerning Natural Religion; and in 1783, 12mo, were pub. his disgraceful Essays upon Suicide. The mischievous effects of these unphilosophical speculations, therefore, were thus extended, to the injury of others, after the author had gone to his account. The excellence of Hume's character as a man has been so well described by Mr. Mackenzie, in the story of La Roche, (see The Mirror, Nos. 42, 43, 44,) and so unequivocally attested by Adam Smith and other contemporaries, that it is quite unnecessary to enlarge upon this head. In the autobiography from which we have quoted above, the reader will be often reminded—notwithstanding the more ambitious style of the Historian of Rome—of the charming narration of Gibbon of the incidents of his own life.

"To husband out life's taper at the close,
And keep the flame from wasting, by repose,"

We have now to consider the subject of our notice, first, in the character of a Mental and Moral Philosopher; secondly, in that of a Political Philosopher and Political Economist; and, thirdly, in that of a Historian. It is hardly necessary to remind the reader that all that can justly be expected of us, in the limits to which we are necessarily circumscribed, is an indication of the best sources of knowledge respecting the authors of whom we treat, and brief citations of the recorded opinions of eminent authorities in the same departments of learning which the former have cultivated.

Hume as a Mental and Moral Philosopher.

Of Hume's Essays, Moral and Metaphysical, Lord Brougham remarks:

"To refuse these well-known Essays the praise of great subtlety, much clever argument, some successful sarcasm, and very considerable originality, is impossible; but a love of singularity, an aversion to agree with other men and particularly with the bulk of the people, prevails very manifestly throughout the work; and we may recollect that it is the author's earliest production, the Treatise on Human Nature, which formed the basis of the whole, having been written before his twenty-second year, at an age when the distinction of differing with the world, the boldness of attacking opinions held sacred by mankind at large, is apt to have most charms for vain and ambitious minds.

"Accordingly, he finds all wrong in the opinions which have generally entertain, whether upon moral, metaphysical, or theological subjects, and he pushes his theories to an extreme point in almost every instance. . . . As for his Inquiry concerning the Principles of Morals, of which he had himself formed so high an estimate, this is indeed a very excellent work, and appears well to deserve the opinion pronounced upon it by the author although his Political Discourses may be superior in the originality and importance of their views . . . There is in this treatise a promptness and felicity of illustration rarely anywhere else to be found, and it is full of learned allusions and references, showing the various [illegible] It the least remarkable feature of the work, that, though preferred by him before all the other productions of his genius, it contains nothing at all even bordering upon sceptical opinions."—Life of Hume, in Lives of Men of Letters of the Time of George III., Lon. and Glas., 1856.

"It was in his twenty-seventh year that Mr Hume published at London the Treatise of Human Nature, the first systematic attack on all the principles of knowledge and belief and the most formidable, if universal scepticism could ever be more than a mere exercise of ingenuity. . . . The great speculator did not in this work amuse himself like Bayle, with dry dialectical exercises which only inspire a disposition towards general incredulity by showing in detail the uncertainty of most opinions. He aimed at proving, not that nothing was known, but that nothing could be known from the structure of the Understanding, to demonstrate that we are doomed forever to dwell in absolute and universal ignorance. The [illegible] perhaps the best specimen of his style. . . . Its substance of chief merit is the proof from an abundant enumeration of particulars, that all the qualities and [illegible] of the kind which are generally approved by mankind agree [illegible] useful to society. . . . On points of [illegible] that Mr. Hume, though he continued [illegible] with to [illegible] ch indulg [illegible] Mc Rhetorical Philos., prefixed to Encyc. Brit., and in his Miscel. Works Lon., 1846, vol. i.

"From what has been already said, it may be seen that we are not to look in Mr Hume's Treatise of Human Nature for any particular [illegible] lism nor a scheme of spiritualism; for he [illegible] equally at the root of both these theories. He [illegible] is to establish a universal scepticism, and to produce in the [illegible] a complete distrust in his own faculties. . . . With the [illegible] ption of Bayle, he has carried this sceptical method to a greater extent, [illegible] any other modern philosopher."—Dugald Stewart, Prel. Diss. to Encyc. Brit., and in his Works

"The centre of Hume's philosophizing is his criticism of the conception of cause. Locke had already expressed the thought that we attain the conception of substance only by the habit of always seeing certain modes together. Hume takes up this thought with earnestness. Where do we know, he asks, that two things stand to each other in the relation of cause and effect? [illegible] these chief thoughts of Hume, [illegible] [illegible] is a logical carrying out of Locke [illegible] tion of universality and necessity [illegible] our knowledge only from perceptions through the senses, these determinations cannot be comprised in [illegible]."—Dr Albert Schwegler's Hist. of Philos.; trans. by J. H. Seelye. New York, 1850.

"Dr. Reid rendered good service to the cause of truth, in opposition to the sceptical philosophy of Hume, who deservedly availed himself of the authority of Locke in the support of his own mischievous dogmas."—Dr. E. Williams's Christian Preacher, Lon., 1843.

"That scepticism is the real result of the theory we have now described [Locke's Ideal System] is seen from the use that has been actually made of it. Berkeley drew from it his arguments against the existence of the material world, and Hume based upon the same the principles by which he sought to involve the whole superstructure of human knowledge, from its very foundations, in one sense of doubt and confusion. . . . Reid, in his early life, had been a complete believer in this representative theory, and had leaned strongly to Berkleianism, as the natural result; but when Mr. Hume's Treatise on Human Nature came forth to the world, and he saw the consequences to which the whole theory must ultimately tend, he began to inquire within himself whether that theory were really a true one. This inquiry, according to his own account, he carried on perpetually for above forty years, and never could gain any affirmative evidence on the question except the mere dictum of philosophers. . . . The philosophy of Hume, as a whole, originated and fell with himself. A more partial and less daring scepticism might probably have gained many followers; but it is the inevitable result of every system professing universal unbelief, to destroy itself. The man who by any process of reasoning involves every portion of human knowledge in doubt, instead of persuading any one to follow his conclusions, does little more than controvert his own principles by a reductio ad absurdum."—*Morell's Hist. of Mod. In our life of Jeremy Bentham, in this Dictionary, we have briefly noticed the famous doctrine of Utility, of which Hume was one of the first and most distinguished teachers.

Before leaving this branch of our subject, it may be expected that we should make some comments on that unfortunate production of our author's,—the Essay on Miracles; but a natural reluctance to dwell on the follies to which even great minds are but too prone, would indispose us to linger upon the recollection of this melancholy example of intellectual sophistry and literary dishonesty, had we not already treated the subject at sufficient length in the previous pages of this work. The reader is referred to the article on Adams, Wm., D.D., (the friend of Johnson.) Campbell, George, D.D.; Douglas, John; Leland's Deistical Writers; Works of Wm. Ellery Channing; Works of Mr. Paley; Lowndes's Brit. Lib., 933, 982-984, 991-1001; Remarks upon the Nat. Hist. of Religion, by Mr Hume, &c., by S. T., Lon., 1758, 8vo; and many of the authorities cited above and below. The matter may be very well dismissed with the sensible reflections of Sir Walter Scott, in his account of the Life and Writings of the historian's friend, John Home.

"The celebrated David Hume, the philosopher and historian, was certainly the most distinguished person in the circle [the literary society of Scotland]. That he was most unhappy in permitting the sceptical cast of his talents, and the pride arising from the consciousness of possessing them, to involve him in a maze of sceptical illusions, is most undeniable, as well as that he was highly culpable in giving to the world the miserable re[illegible]

Hume as a Political Philosopher and Political Economist.

His [illegible] relations must necessarily be very brief; but they [illegible] found to be of the most unequivocal character.

Of the Political Discourses it would be difficult to speak in terms of too great commendation. They contain almost every excellence which can belong to such a performance. . . . The great merit, in several of these discourses, is their originality, and the new system of politics and political economy which they unfold. Mr Hume is, beyond all doubt, the author of the modern doctrines which now raise the world of science which are to a great extent the guide to practical statesmen, and are only prevented from being applied in their fullest extent to the affairs of nations by the clashing interests and the ignorant prejudices of certain powerful classes, for no one deserving the name of legislator pretends to dispute the soundness of the theory, although many hold that the errors of our predecessors require a slow recourse to right principle in conducting the practical business of the world. It is certain that Dr Smith's celebrated work, with all its great merits is less of a regular system than the detached essays of Mr Hume. The originality of the latter's opinions is wholly undeniable, they were published full fourteen years before the Wealth of Nations."—Leslie Ironman ubi supra.

One of the most eminent of modern Political Economists remarks that Hume's

"Essays on Commerce, Interest, Balance of Trade, Money, Jealousy of Trade, and Public Credit, display the same felicity of style and illustration that distinguish the other works of their celebrated author. His views of the commercial intercourse that should subsist among nations are alike enlightened and liberal; and he has admirably exposed the groundlessness of the prejudices then entertained against a free intercourse with France, and the loss of being deprived, were commercial restraints abolished, of a sufficient supply of bullion. The masterly essay on the Population of Ancient Nations will be noticed in another part of this work. . . . Hume and Smith saw and pointed out the injurious operation of the Methuen treaty, and exposed the absurdity of our sacrificing the trade with France to that of so beggarly a country as Portugal."—McCulloch's Lit. of Polit. Econ., Lon., 1845.

"The political discourses of Hume are the best models we have of the reasoning that belongs to subjects of this nature. They best admonish us of the slow step with which we should advance, and the wary distrust with which we should look around, before we think that we have reached a maxim in politics.—that is, a general principle on the steady efficiency of which, in real practice, we may always depend. . . . And here I would recommend to my readers one of the essays of Mr. Hume,—that on the Populousness of Ancient Nations. . . . The laws of Henry the Seventh merit the consideration of the student. It was the intention of these laws to advance the husbandry, manufactures, and general commerce of the country. The observations of Lord Bacon, and the subsequent criticisms of Hume, will afford the student a lesson in that most difficult and important of all practical sciences, the science of political economy. . . . A great part of Smith's reasonings [in the 3d Book of the Wealth of Nations] had appeared in the History of Hume. These two eminent philosophers —for on the subjects of political economy and morals they deserve the name—had, no doubt, in their mutual intercourse enlightened and confirmed the inquiries and conclusions of each other."—Prof. Smyth's Lects on Mod. Hist.

"Hume was gifted with admirable sagacity in political economy; and it is the good sense and depth of his views on that important subject, then for the first time, in his History of England, brought to bear on the annals of man, that has chiefly gained for him, and with justice, the character of a philosophic historian."—SIR ARCHIBALD ALISON: Essays, Polit., Histor., and Morell., Edin. and Lon., 1850, iii. 78.

HUME AS A HISTORIAN.

We have already noticed the severe censure elicited by the publication of the first vol. of the History of England, and the still more provoking neglect by which this censure was succeeded. The expressed opinions of the few who ventured to read the book were certainly ill calculated to encourage the ambition of the aspiring author. But no one can tell the story so well as the historian himself:

"In 1752 the Faculty of Advocates chose me their librarian, an office for which I received little or no emolument, but which gave me the command of a large library. I then formed the plan of writing the History of England, but, being frightened with the notion of continuing a narrative through a period of seventeen hundred years, I commenced with the accession of the House of Stuart, an epoch when I thought the misrepresentations of faction began chiefly to take place. I was, I own, sanguine in my expectations of the success of this work. I thought that I was the only historian that had at once neglected present power, interest, and authority, and the cry of popular prejudices, and, as the subject was suited to every capacity, I expected proportional applause. But miserable was my disappointment: I was assailed by one cry of reproach, disapprobation, and even detestation; English, Scotch, and Irish, whig and tory, churchman and sectary, freethinker and religionist, patriot and courtier, united in their rage against a man who had presumed to shed a generous tear for the fate of Charles I. and the Earl of Strafford; and after the first ebullitions of their fury were over, what was still more mortifying, the book seemed to sink into oblivion. Mr Millar told me, that in a twelvemonth he sold only forty five copies of it. I scarcely, indeed, heard of one man in the three kingdoms considerable for rank or letters, that could endure the book. I must only except the primate of England, Dr. Herring, and the primate of Ireland, Dr. Stone, which seem two odd exceptions. These dignified prelates separately sent me messages not to be discouraged."—Hume's Autobiography, pub. in 1777, by Mr Strahan, and since prefixed to the Hist. of Eng., his Philosophical Works, &c.

Mr. Ritchie (in his Life of Hume) tells us that, after a diligent search into the literary history of the period, he has been unable to discover any trace of that universal outcry which Hume complains of. But doubtless the author heard more than any one else did; much that was said was never recorded; and of the last a large portion may be presumed to have perished or to be buried in forgotten archives. With the reception of the second vol. of his History the author had greater reason to be satisfied:

"This performance," he tells us, "happened to give less displeasure to the Whigs, and was better received. It not only rose itself, but helped to buoy up its unfortunate brother." As his reputation as a literary man was now well established, the remaining vols. were received with avidity, and those already pub. brought prominently into notice: the sale was sufficiently large, he informs us, to render him not only "independent, but opulent." "Notwithstanding the variety of winds and seasons to which my writings have been exposed, they have still been making such advances, that the copy-money given me by the booksellers much exceeded any thing formerly known in England."

It is now time to examine into the merits and demerits of a work which has so long held, and which promises ever to hold, a prominent place in the front rank of English literature. If we were obliged to compress into the limits of a single sentence the characteristics of Hume's History of England, we suppose that the following would be considered an impartial statement —Beauty of style, carelessness of facts, and intolerance of spirit. Hume was too fastidious to be inelegant, too indolent to be accurate, too bigoted to be impartial. His chagrin when obliged to stop the press to make important corrections on the appearance of Murdin's State Papers, and his mortification at being obliged to write to Robertson respecting the same affair, "we are all in the wrong," were necessary consequences of that haste which would not examine, and that ignorance which would not learn. It is declared that certain manuscripts had been spread out for his inspection at the State-Paper Office for a whole fortnight, but he never mustered sufficient courage to undertake the dreaded investigations.

"Satisfied with the common accounts, and the most obvious sources of history, when librarian at the Advocates' Library, where yet may be examined the books he used, marked by his hand, he spread the volumes about the sofa, from which he rarely rose to pursue obscure inquiries or delay by fresh difficulties the page which every day was growing under his charming pen. A striking proof of his careless happiness I discovered in his never referring to the perfect edition of Whitelocke's Memorials of 1742, but to the old truncated and faithless one of 1682."—True Sources of Secret History; in Disraeli's Curiosities of Literature, ed. Lon., 1851, p. 514.

"Hume often puts the names of the monkish writers in his margin; but I fear all he knew of them was through the media of other writers. He has some mistakes which could not have occurred had he really consulted the originals. . . . Hume is certainly an admirable writer; his style bold, and his reflections shrewd and uncommon; but his religious and political notions have too often warped his judgment."—Dr. Richard Farmer's Letter to a Friend on the Study of English History, in Goodhugh's Lib. Man, 43.

"Hume was far too careless a writer, even if the taste of the public in his time had required it, to trouble himself with the minute labour necessary for this kind of investigation. Accordingly, the reader finds little in his pages to bring him acquainted with the antiquarian details of history."—Edin. Rev., lxxiv. 332.

"Hume was not, indeed, learned and well-grounded enough for those writers and investigators of history who judged his works from the usual point of view, because he was not only negligent in the use of the sources of history, but also superficial."—Schlosser's Hist. of the 18th Cent., Davison's trans., Lon., 1844, ii. 78.

"In his treatment of the elder periods of the English history, he is quite unsatisfactory and meagre: he had no love for its antiquities, and could not transport himself back into the spirit of remote ages."—Schlegel's Lects. on the Hist. of Lit.; English trans., Philа., 1864, 331.

"The author, indeed, wanted that resolute spirit of industry and research which alone can lead an historian to become thoroughly acquainted with the valuable writers of the Middle Ages."—Dibdin's Lib. Comp., Lon., 1825, 244.

"He was far too indolent to acquire the vast store of facts indispensable for correct generalisation on the varied theatre of human affairs, and often drew hasty and incorrect conclusions from the

ARCHIBALD ALISON: Essays Polit., Histor., and Miscell., 1850, iii 78.

Sir Archibald proceeds to adduce an example of the errors to which he refers, which example we shall presently quote from the History of Europe, 1789–1815.

The remarks which we have just quoted are preceded by some observations which we feel unwilling to omit. Sir Archibald gives his predecessor full credit for his sagacity as a political economist, (quoted above,) his ability as a political commentator and as a delineator of manners, his eloquence as an orator, (in his glowing pages,) and his skill as a debater, but continues:

"But, notwithstanding all this, Hume is far from being gifted with the philosophy of history. He has collected or prepared many of the facts necessary for the science, but he has made little progress in it himself. He was essentially a sceptic. He aimed rather at spreading doubts than shedding light. Like Voltaire and Gibbon, he was scandalously prejudiced and unjust on the subject of religion; and to write modern history without correct views on that subject is like playing Hamlet without the character of the Prince of Denmark."

These comments were originally published in Blackwood's Magazine, (in an article on Guizot,) in Dec. 1844, and the reader will perhaps be surprised to find the following reflections from the same critic, published in The Foreign and Colonial Review, (in an article on Michelet's France,) in April of the same year:

"Considered as calm and philosophic narratives, the histories of Hume and Robertson will remain as standard models for every future age. The just and profound reflections of the former, the inimitable clearness and impartibility with which he has summed up the arguments on both sides, on the most momentous questions which have agitated England, as well as the general simplicity, uniform clearness, and occasional pathos, of his story, must forever command the admiration of mankind. In vain we are told that he is often inaccurate, sometimes partial; in vain are successive attacks published on detached parts of his narrative, by party zeal or antiquarian research: his reputation is undiminished: successive editions issuing from the press attest the continued sale of his work; and it continues its majestic course through the sea of time, like a mighty three-decker, which never even condescends to notice the javelins darted at its sides from the hostile canoes which from time to time seek to impede its progress."—Reprinted in Essays, Edin. and Lon., 1850, iii. 419–420.

We could not in fairness omit the above eulogy, as we profess to give both sides of a question, even when both are ably represented by the same impartial champion.

"I have already adverted to Gardiner's resolute assertion of the law against the prince's single will, as a proof that, in spite of Hume's preposterous insinuations to the contrary, the English monarchy was known and acknowledged to be limited. . . . The misrepresentations of Hume as to the English constitution r—

Elizabeth, and the general administration of her reign, have been exposed, since the present chapter was written, by Mr. Brodie, in his History of the British Empire from the Accession of Charles I. to the Restoration, vol. i. c. 3. In some respects, Mr. B. seems to have gone too far in an opposite system, and to represent the practical course of government as less arbitrary than I can admit it to have been."—Hallam's Constit. Hist. of Eng., ed. Lon., 1854, vol. i. chap. v. p. 270, n.; 284, n.

"Since I drew up this lecture, a work has been published by Mr. Brodie of Edinburgh. It is not well written in point of style, and the author must be considered as a writer on the popular side, but he is a man of research and independence of mind. It is a work of weight and learning and it appears to me forever to have damaged, and most materially damaged, the character of Mr. Hume as an accurate historian."—Prof. Smyth's Lects. on Mod. Hist.; Lect. V.

See an elaborate review of Brodie's History (Edin., 1822, 4 vols. 8vo) in the Edin. Rev., xl. 92-146.

"Hume is convicted by Mr Brodie of so many inaccuracies and partial statements, that we really think he will stand among historians for correctness of assertion will soon be nearly as low as it has long been with theologians for orthodoxy."—Edin. Rev., ubi supra.

It is alleged that Hume, merging the character of the historian into that of the apologist, was resolved at all events to make out a fair case for the Stuarts:

"It is a piece of whining cant and nothing better for Hume to represent all parties of his day as being 'led to madness against him for presuming to shed a generous tear for the fate of Charles I. and the Earl of Strafford.' No one ever found fault with the historian for shedding a decent tear to the memory of the brilliant though unprincipled courtier and his infatuated master. But he must have known well that the causes of both nation found in his volume were the false pretences put forth in behalf of these men. It was Hume's object to ennoble them, and he did not scruple either to mutilate or to pervert the truth when necessary for his purpose. Mr Brodie has very able and laboriously exposed the mean artifices to which the would-be-argumentative historian has had recourse in order to give an air of fairness and colouring to documents which he durst not openly garble."—Cunningham's Brief Hist. of Eng. Lon. 18[illegible] xv. 109.

In Prof. Smyth's 5th Lect. on Mod. Hist., also, will be found instances cited of Hu[illegible] perversion of the very authorities he quotes." Gilbert Stuart refers to this subject w[illegible] no little warmth.

"From its beginning to its conclusion Hume's [illegible] chiefly to be regarded as a plausible scheme of partial[illegible] elegant and spirited composition, it merits every commendation. But no friend to humanity, and to the freedom of the kingdom will consider his constitutional inquiries with the same narrative, and compare them with the ancient and venerable monuments of our story, without feeling a lively surprise and a patriot indignation."

"Rapin and Hume are our two great historians. But it is Hume who is read by every one. Hume is the historian whose views and opinions insensibly become our own. He is respected and admired by the most enlightened readers as the critic and philosopher of the ordinary reader to whose mind on all the topics connected with our history, he entirely gives the tone and the law. On every account, therefore, I shall dedicate the remainder of this lecture chiefly to the consideration of his work, that your confidence may not be [illegible] that while you feel, as y[illegible] the charm of what Gibbon called sc[illegible] able beauties, you may be aware of [illegible] certainly exist to the general tendency [illegible] representations. . . . It is understood [illegible] has been proclaimed by many writers, that [illegible] to the side of prerogative, that, in his account [illegible] History is little better than an apology [illegible] read, in this part of his work at least, with caution, and his representations are not considered [illegible]."—Smyth's Lects. on Mod. Hist.; Lect. V.

"Had he written without any such bias [illegible] subject after the Stuarts and the Tories, he might have attained to an eminence far beyond that which he has reached, and descended to posterity not as the first of all party writers of history, but as the author of a truly great natural work, the spirit and execution of which should have been equally admired and approved by all the English."—FREDERICK SCHLEGEL: Lects. on Hist. of Lit.

"No one can be surprised if in so short a time [illegible] to the whole work far more attention was given to the composition of the narrative than to the preparation of the materials. It was altogether impossible that in so short a period [illegible] duty of the historian should be diligently performed. The truth of the work answers to the mode of its performance.

"But, if the History be not diligently prepared is it faithfully written? There are numberless proofs of the contrary, but we have the most express evidence in the author's own statement to prove this position."—Lord Brougham's Life of Hume, in the Lives of Men of Letters of the Time of George III. Lon. and Glas., 1845, 122-123.

One of the most eminent of our modern historians considers that he has caught Hume tripping in the reflection quoted below:

"It is observed by Mr. Hume, that actions at sea are seldom so decisive as those on land: a remark suggested by the repeated indecisive actions between the English and Dutch in the reign of Charles II., but which affords a striking proof of the danger of generalizing from too limited a collection of facts. Had he extended his retrospect further, he would have observed that the most decisive and important of all actions recorded in history have been fought at sea."—SIR ARCHIBALD ALISON: Hist. of Europe, 1789-1815, N. York, 1856, ii. 330-34).

See ante, p. 916, and see Alison's Essays, Edin. and Lon., 1850, iii. 78.

The same distinguished authority joins in the general commendation of the charms of Hume's style:

"The immortal narrative of Hume. . . . Hume, whose simple but profound history will be conned with the long and eventful thread of English story."—Hist. of Europe, 1789-1851, i. 151; 1815-52, iii. 361

We entirely coincide with this assertion: Hume will always be read, in spite of his carelessness, in spite of his errors, and even in spite of his perversions. Nine readers seek amusement where one seeks instruction, and even the tenth man will not neglect Hume; nor can he safely be neglected.

"The accuracy of Hume," remarks an eminent legal authority of America, "in respect of the two first princes of the house of Stuart has been severely attacked by G. Stuart, Whitaker, Brodie, and others; but his charming style, his profound sagacity, and his philosophical reflections clothe his great work with irresistible attractions."—CHANCELLOR KENT.

"It is I submit," says Dr. Dibdin, "in the reign of ELIZABETH that the true genius of Hume may be said to shine forth. Here we have pithy and argumentative vigorous delineation of character and statesmanlike views of policy; but the reign of Elizabeth was worthy of the exercise of such talents."—Lib. Comp., ed. 1825, 244-5.

Dr. Johnson, certainly no admirer of Hume in any of his characters save that of a tory, evinced his usual contempt of popular opinions by declaiming against the much-lauded style of the historian.

"The conversation now turned upon Sir David Hume's style. JOHNSON: 'Why, sir, his style is not English; the structure of his sentences is French. Now, the French structure and the English structure may in the nature of things be equally good. But if you allow that the English language is established, he is wrong. My name might originally have been Nicholson as well as Johnson, but were you to call me Nicholson now, you would call me very absurdly.'"—Boswell's Life of Johnson, ed. Lon., 1847, 150.

"The qu[illegible] d the reader of the criticism of a celebrate[illegible] own day. Commenting on the literature [illegible] the first two Georges, and the greater pa[illegible] of the period which it has already filled. But, though his thinking was English, his style is entirely French, and, being naturally of a cold tone, there is nothing of that eloquence or richness about him which characterizes the writings of Taylor, and Hooker, and Burke, and continues, with less weight of matter, to please in those of Cook and Burnet."—Review of the Works of Scott on Leon. Dec. Sept. 1816, cited in Controv. to Eaton, Rev., [illegible]

Prof. Smyth's reflections in his 22d Lecture upon the Reign of William III. will be cordially endorsed by the vast majority of historical students:

"And now, when we enter upon the reign of William, we have no longer the assistance of the philosophic Hume. We have no longer William can reach those penetrating observations those subtle and intimate beauties which were so justly the delight of Gibbon, and, with whatever prejudices they may be accompanied and, however sophistical may be those representations which they sometimes enforce and adorn, still render the loss of such a writer a subject of the greatest regret and leave a void which it is impossible adequately to supply."—Lects. on Mod. Hist.

"The triumvirate of British historians, Hume, Robertson, and Gibbon, when exemplified in their very dissimilar styles, the triple contrast and harmony of simplicity, elegance and splendour."—JAMES MONTGOMERY: Lect. on Mod. Eng. Lit.

We extract the following lines from Gibbon's Autobiography, as furnishing, in connexion with the preceding quotation, a curious instance of concedence:

"The candour of Dr Robertson embraced his disciple. A letter from Mr Hume overpaid the labour of ten years, but I have never resumed to accept a place in the triumvirate of British historians."

Gibbon's epigrammatic description of the style of the two historians with whom his name is so often associated has been already referred to more than once, and may here be properly quoted:

"The perfect composition, the nervous language the well turned periods of Dr Robertson, inflamed me to the ambitious hope that I might one day tread in his footsteps. The calm philosophy, the careless infinitable beauties of his friend and rival, often forced me to close the volume with a mixed sensation of delight and despair."—Vie supra.

Comparisons, well worthy of perusal, between the histories of Gibbon, Robertson, and Hume, will be found in Schlosser's History of the 18th Century, in Frederick Schlegel's Lects. on the History of Literature, and (by Wm. Gifford) in the London Quarterly Review, vol. xii. 369-375. These critiques we had intended to quote in this article, but we have already transcended our limits. We may remark, in brief, that Schlegel and Gifford, without the least hesitation assign the priority in merit to Hume; and Schlosser seems inclined to award a similar judgment. In our life of THOMAS CARTE, (p. 347,) we have indicated the source to which Hume was perhaps principally indebted for what the lawyers would call the "learning of his history."

Whilst it is deeply to be regretted that Hume's literary vanity and unphilosophical thirst after notoriety so often betrayed him into speculations whose practical effect is to eradicate the first principles and the last hopes of morality and religion, we are pleased to be able to quote, for the encouragement of our studious readers, a reflection which has doubtless stimulated many to days and nights of mental labour and intellectual toil:

"Such a superiority do the pursuits of literature possess above every other occupation, that even he who attains but a mediocrity in them merits the pre-eminence above those that excel the most in the common and vulgar professions."—History of England: Reign of James I.

"[illegible]ated and valuable information"—

A biographical account of Mr. Hunt will be found in the Lon. Gent. Mag., Jan. 1855.

Hunt, Freeman, 1804-1858, widely known as proprietor and editor of The Merchants' Magazine, was a native of Quincy, Mass. Whilst a resident of Boston, he established The Ladies' Magazine, The Weekly Traveller, and The Juvenile Miscellany, and also gave to the world Anecdotes and Sketches illustrative of Female Character; and (in 1840) 2 vols. Lives of American Anecdotes, Original and Selected.

Pe[illegible] [illegible] of American anecdotes."—N. P. Willis, N. Yor[illegible]

In 1[illegible] Mr [illegible] removed to the city of New York, where [illegible] resided until his death. His first enterp[illegible]se in this city was a periodical entitled The Traveller, [illegible] the columns of which he contributed a series of [illegible]ning sketches of travel, which were afterwards [illegible]d and pub. under the title of Letters about the [illegible] and its Vicinity. This vol. was reviewed with grea[illegible]vour, and passed through three edits.

In [illegible]39 Mr Hunt determined to supply a great want in the [illegible]ony and commercial world, and in July of that [illegible] issued the first number of his famous Merchants' Maga[illegible] which now presents in its thirty-eight well-filled [illegible] a most valuable library of Commercial Literature. For the energy, perseverance and talent successfully [illegible]ed in this important enterprise, Mr. Hunt merits [illegible] more praise than we have time or space to afford him We shall, however, quote some more valuable opinion [illegible] than our own at the conclusion of this article.

In 1845 Mr. Hunt pub. the first vol. of The Library of Commerce, and in 1850 appeared the first vol. and in 1857 the second vol., of Lives of American Merchants, and Wealth and Worth, a Collection of Morals, Maxims, and Miscellanies for Merchants. It has been well remarked that "The titles as well as topics of these works show the concentration of purpose with which Mr. Hunt gave himself to his chosen field of literary labour."

The subject of our notice was elected a member of numerous statistical and literary societies, and received the degree of A.M. from Harvard University. Other notices of Mr. Hunt and his useful publications will be found in Poe's Literati, N. York, 1850, 50-52; Bungay's Off-Hand Takings, or Crayon Sketches of the Noticeable Men of our Age, 1854, 368-371; N. Amer. Rev., July, 1856, 222-233 The wise merchants (members of a profession to which authentic information is of peculiar value)

w'll need no solicitation of ours to induce them to peruse and reperuse Mr. Hunt's invaluable vols.; but, as regards the Merchants' Magazine, we shall (to use a mercantile phrase) offer satisfactory endorsements of our own cordial commendation.

"It collects and arranges in good order a large amount of valuable statistical and other information, highly useful, not only to the merchant, but to the statesman, to the cultivator of the earth, to the manufacturer, to the mariner, in short to all classes of the business and reading community."—HENRY CLAY: Ashland, 29th July, 1849

"I regard it as being, beyond all doubt, among the most valuable periodicals of the times."—DANIEL WEBSTER: Washington, March 18, 1851.

"I have found it most useful to me in my senatorial labours, and have been in the habit for many years of carefully consulting it."—THOMAS H. BENTON: Washington City, April 20, 1849.

"It is a grand repository of useful facts and information, which can be found nowhere so well digested and so accessible as in those numbers."—MILLARD FILLMORE.

"Mr. Hunt ought especially to be the man whom the merchants of America delight to honour. It seems strange that we have no similar publication in this country, and yet we have all the raw materials for it in great abundance. We want only a Freeman Hunt."—JAMES WILLIAM GILBART, General Manager of the London and Westminster Bank, and the author of a Practical Treatise on Banking, &c.

Hunt, James Henry Leigh, b. October 19, 1784, at Southgate, Middlesex, was the son of the Rev. Isaac Hunt (ante) and Miss Mary Shewell, the daughter of Stephen Shewell, a merchant of Philadelphia. An aunt of this lady's was the wife of Benjamin West, the eminent American painter. Young Hunt commenced authorship at an early period, and, when the poet was only about sixteen years of age, his verses were collected by his father and pub., with a large list of subscribers, under the title of Juvenilia; or, Poems written between the ages of Twelve and Sixteen, Lon., 1801, 12mo.

"I was as proud perhaps of the book at that time, as I am ashamed of it now.... My book was a heap of imitations, all but absolutely worthless."—Leigh Hunt's Autobiography.

These effusions were given to the world shortly after their author's departure from Christ Hospital, where, like Coleridge, Lamb, and many others who afterwards attained distinction, he received his early education. After some experience as an attorney's clerk, and in the duties connected with a post in the War Office, Hunt united in 1808 with his brother John in the establishment of a weekly paper entitled The Examiner, which periodical, owing to Leigh's able editorship, soon acquired great popularity. Doubtless the practice which he had cultivated in very early life as theatrical critic for the "News" now proved of great advantage to the young editor. Having thus beheld him fairly launched upon that life of literary activity for which he has been so distinguished for the last half-century, we must refer to his piquant Autobiography for further particulars of his career, whilst we devote the limited space to which we are restricted to a catalogue of his works, and the citation of some opinions upon their merits.

In addition to the periodicals already mentioned as claiming a portion of Mr. Hunt's labours, he edited in 1810 The Reflector, a periodical established by his brother, of which only four numbers appeared; wrote almost all the articles (Byron, Hazlitt, and Shelley were also contributors) in The Liberal, 1822, 4 Pts. 8vo; established and edited The Tatler, and The London Journal; edited The Monthly Repository; contributed to The Round Table, The True Sun, the Edinburgh Review, the Westminster Review; edited the Plays of Wycherley, Congreve, and Farquhar, Fairfax's trans. of Tasso's Jerusalem Delivered, and Selections from Beaumont and Fletcher. His translations of Redi's Bacco in Toscano, the Lutrin of Boileau, the Amyntas of Tasso, and of other pieces, have elicited warm commendation, whilst the last-named at least has not escaped without censure. Since 1847 Mr. Hunt has been in receipt of pension of £200 per annum. Many of Hunt's works have been repub. in America by Wells & Lilly, Carey, Lea & Blanchard, Carey & Hart, Wiley & Putnam, the Harpers, W. P. Hazard, Ticknor & Fields, &c. From the many opinions before us respecting the characteristics of this voluminous and popular author, we can find room for a few brief extracts only.

Leigh Hunt as a Poet.

"With acute powers of conception, a sparkling and lively fancy, and a quaintly-curious choice of diction, the grand characteristic of Leigh Hunt's poetry is weed-painting, and in this he is probably without a rival, save in the last and best productions of Keats, who contended, not vainly, with his master on that ground. In this respect, nothing can be more remarkable than some passages in Rimini, and in his collection entitled Foliage, much of which he has since capriciously cancelled, and he also exercised this peculiar faculty most felicitously in translations from the French and Italian, although in some instances he carried it to the amount of grotesqueness or affectation. His heroic couplet has much of the life, strength, and flexibility of Dryden, of whom he often reminds us; and in it he follows gloriously John even to his love for triplets and Alexandrines."—Moir's Sketches of the Poet. Lit. of the Past Half Century.

"The days are happily past when the paltry epithet of 'Cockney Poets' could be bestowed on Keats and Leigh Hunt: the world has outlived them. People would as soon think of applying such a word to Dr. Johnson. Happily, too, one of the delightful writers who were the objects of these unworthy attacks has outlived them also; has lived to attain a popularity of the most genial kind, and to diffuse through a thousand pleasant channels many of the finest parts of our finest writers. He has done good service to literature in another way, by enriching our language with some of the very best translations in a Cowley. Who ever thought to see Tasso's famous passage in Armida's so rendered? (Ode to the Golden Age here quoted.) Who, again, ever hoped to see such an English version of one of Petrarch's most characteristic poems, conceits and all? 'Petrarch's Contemplations of Death in the Bower of Laura' here quoted.

"In justice to Mr. Leigh Hunt, I add to these fine translations, of which every lover of Italian literature will perceive the merit, some extracts from his original poems which need no previous preparation in the reader. Except Chaucer himself no painter of processions has excelled the entrance of Paulo to Lucrezia in the story of Rimini."—Miss Mitford's Recollections of a Literary Life.

"At the outset of his career his ambition was to excel as a bard. His principal success, however, seems chiefly to lay in a certain vein of essay-writing, in which ease and familiarity are delightfully combined. Still he has woven many rhymes that are not only sweet and cheerful, but possess a peculiar grace and merit of their own, besides illustrating some capital items relative to poetical diction and influence. They are, however, deformed by some offences against the dignity of the muse in the shape of affectations and far-fetched conceits."—Tuckerman's Thoughts on the Poets.

Mr. Tuckerman here quotes some most objectionable epithets used by the poet, in which citation he reminds us—though his selection is entirely different—of Lord Jeffrey's excerpts from Rimini.

"What can be said," exclaims the terrible Scotch reviewer, "for such lines as 'She had short notions on the marrying screw,' or, 'He kept no reckoning with his sweets or sours,' or, 'And butter still—in my idea at least.'

or, 'The two divinest things this world has got.'

"We can see no sort of beauty in such absurd and unusual phrases as 'a disjointed waist,'—a 'scattery light,' or 'flings of sunshine,'—nor any charm in such comparatives as 'mortaller,' or 'tasteftuller,' or 'frankller,' or in such words as 'whisks,' and 'swalling,' and 'freaks and matches,' and an hundred others in the same taste."—Edin. Rev., xxvi. 491. Mr. Gilford cites many other instances very much of the same character. See No. 35, ante.

"In spite of his faults, there is something quite bewitching in his character and poems. We hardly judge him by the same laws we apply to other poets; we are willing to take him as he is. The same errors and foibles which would be insufferable in another alter their aspect, if not their nature, as observed in the easy impudence of his chirping egotism. . . . There is every reason to suppose that his poems will long survive the life of their author and the reputation of the majority of his assailants."—Whipple's Essays and Reviews.

"Leigh Hunt, most vivid of poets and most cordial of critics."—John Wilson, Recreations of Christopher North.

Leigh Hunt as a Prose-Writer.

"To my taste, the Author of Rimini and Editor of the Examiner is among the best and least-corrupted of our poetical prose-writers. In his light but well supported columns we find the vacuous, the sharpness, and the sparkling effect of poetry, with little that is extravagant or far-fetched, and no turgidity or pompous pretension. Perhaps there is too much the appearance of relaxation and trifling, as if he had escaped the shackles of rhyme in a caprice, a levity and a disposition to innovate in words and ideas. Still the genuine master-spirit of the prose-writer is there, the tone of lively sensible conversation, and this may in part arise from the author's being himself an animated talker. Mr Hunt wants something of the heat and earnestness of the political partisan, but his familiar and miscellaneous papers have all the ease, grace, and point of the best style of Essay-writing. Many of his effusions in the Indicator show, that if he had devoted himself exclusively to that mode of writing, he inherits more of the spirit of Steele than any man since his time."—Hazlitt's Table-Talk, on the Prose Style of Poets.

"He is, in truth, one of the pleasantest writers of his time,—easy, colloquial genial, humane full of fine fancies and verbal niceties, possessing a loving if not a 'learned spirit,' with hardly a spice of bitterness in his composition. . . His imagination and fancy is a delightful book. The Indicator and Seer are filled with essays of peculiar excellence."—Whipple's Essays and Reviews.

"His prose is gossiping, peaceful, and searching and charms many readers."—Allan Cunningham's Biog. and Crit. Hist. of the Lit. of the Last Fifty Years.

In a review of Hunt's edit. of The Dramatic Works of Wycherley, Congreve, and Farquhar, (1840, 8vo,) an eminent authority thus speaks of the editor in the capacity of a critic:

"In some respects Mr Leigh Hunt is excellently qualified for the task which he has undertaken. His style, in spite of its mannerism, nay, partly by reason of its mannerism is well suited for light gravations, desultory and half critical, half biographical. We do not always agree with his literary judgments; but we find in him what is very rare in our time, the power of justly appreciating and heartily enjoying good things of very different kinds. He can adore Shakspeare and Spenser without denying poetical merit to the author of Alexander's Feast, or fine observation, rich fancy, and exquisite humour to him who imagined Will Honeycomb and Sir Roger de Coverley. He has paid particular attention to the history of the English drama from the Age of Elizabeth down to our time, and has every right to be heard with respect on that subject."—T. B. Hunter, Mrs. Anne, 1742–1821, the wife of the celebrated surgeon, John Hunter, and a sister of Sir Everard Home, is the author of My Mother bids me braid my Hair, and The Mermaid's Song, and other songs made famous by the music of Haydn. In 1802 she pub. a vol. of Poems, which met with but little mercy at the hands of Lord Jeffrey:

"Poetry really does not seem to be her vocation, and rather appears to have been studied as an accomplishment than pursued from any natural propensity."—Edin. Rev., i 421–426, q. v.

"All of her verses are written with elegance and feeling, and her Death-Song is a noble strain, almost worthy of Campbell himself."—Blackwood's Mag., xii. 409.

Also highly commended by the British Critic for October, 1802.

Hunter, John, 1728–1793, the distinguished anatomist and surgeon, was a native of Long Calderwood, near Glasgow, the son of a farmer, and the youngest of ten children. His early education was very defective, as he preferred amusement to the studies of the grammar-school which he occasionally attended. After working as a cabinet-maker's apprentice in Glasgow for about three years, he was induced in his twenty-first year, by the medical reputation of his brother William, in London, to offer himself as his assistant. He arrived in London in 1748, studied anatomy with his brother, and surgery under Cheselden, and, by the distinction which he rapidly acquired and continued to augment, gave evidence that he had found his proper sphere of action. 1. Treatise on the Blood, Inflammation, and Gun-shot Wounds; with the Author's Life, by Everard Home, 1797, 4to: 1812, 2 vols. 8vo. Dr. Hunter contributed many papers to Phil. Trans., Med. Com., and Trans. Med. and Chir., for an account of which and edits. of his works see Watt's Bibl. Brit. A collective ed. of his Works, with Notes and Life, by Palmer, was pub. by Longman in 1838, 4 vols. 8vo, £3 10s. The last edit. is pub. by W. H. Collingridge, Lon., who sells many of the different works separately. This edit. contains about fifty works "carefully printed from Mr. Bensley's edition, without the least abridgment, at about one-sixth of the original price." Bensley's edit. is the one above noticed in 20 vols., pub. at £12. Two vols. of Huntington's Letters were pub. in 1851. The title S.S. has doubtless puzzled many. We give the bearer's own explanation:

"As I cannot get a D.D. for the want of cash, neither can I get at M.A. for want of learning; therefore I am compelled to fly for refuge to S.S., by which I mean Sinner Saved."

An account of Huntington, by Robert Southey, will be found in a review of his works by the latter in the Lon. Quar. Rev., xxiv. 462–510; see also Lowndes's Brit. Lib., 641; T. B. Macaulay's Crit. and Hist. Essays, 1854, ii. 524–525; Blackw. Mag., xlv. 232.

Hurd, Richard, D.D., 1720–1808, a native of Congreve, Staffordshire, admitted of Emanuel Coll., Camb., 1733; one of the Whitehall Preachers, 1750; Rector of Thurcaston, 1757; Rector of Yolkton, Yorkshire, 1762; Preacher of Lincoln's Inn, 1765; Archdeacon of Gloucester, 1767; Bishop of Lichfield and Coventry, 1 to Worcester, 1781; declined the Archbishopric of Canterbury, 1783. His principal works are the following:—1. Commentary on Horace's Ars Poetica, 1749; 4th ed., 1763, 3 vols. 8vo. New ed., 1776. George Colman overthrew Hurd's Hypothesis, and Hurd admitted that Colman was right. See COLMAN, GEORGE, the elder. See Hallam's Lit. Hist. of Europe, ed. 1854, iii. 94, 509; Green's Diary of a Lover of Lit., 1810, 41, 218. The eulogy lavished by Hurd, in this Commentary, on Warburton, gained him the friendship of that prelate. 2. Comment. on Horace's Epistola ad Augustum; with a Discourse on Poetical Imitation, 1751. Warburton considered this Commentary "one of the most masterly pieces of criticism ever written."

"Hurd extracts an order and coherence which I am unable to recognise in the original."—Green's Diary of a Lover of Lit., pp. 40, 120.

3. Dialogues on Sincerity, Retirement, the Golden Age of Elizabeth, and the Constitution of the English Government, 1759, 8vo. Anon. Repub. along with his Letters on Chivalry and Romance, (pub. 1762, 8vo.) and Dialogues on Foreign Travel, (pub. 1764, 8vo.) under the title of Dialogues, Moral and Political, 1765, 3 vols. 8vo; 3d ed., 1771, 3 vols. sm. 8vo. Again, 1788, 3 vols 8vo. The first ed. (1759) contains some passages which were omitted in the subsequent edit.; but see Green's Diary of a Lover of Lit., p. 71.

"Dr. Hurd, it is well known, published, at one time of his life, Moral and Political Dialogues, with a woeful Whiggish cast."—Boswell's Life of Johnson.

"There is a dialogue by Dr. Hurd on the times and personal qualities of Elizabeth, which is not long, and well worth reading, where her character is very severely criticized."—Prof. Smyth's Lects on Mod. Hist.

"I have now seen the whole of the Letters on Chivalry, and am wonderfully taken with them. They cannot but please all persons of taste greatly. They are the petit-piece to that noble work, The Dialogues, in which there is all the correctness of Addison's style and a strength of reasoning under the direction of judgement far superior. The author is one of the best scholars in the kingdom, and of parts and genius equal to his learning, and a moral character that adorns both."—BISHOP WARBURTON.

"After all, there is something offensive to correct feeling and just taste in thus imputing fictitious conversations to real personages, and, though Mr. Hurd has executed his task with delicacy and address, I cannot help thinking that he has set a mischievous example."—Green's Diary of a Lover of Lit., p. 69.

See ADDISON, JOSEPH; GREENE, GEORGE WASHINGTON. A collective ed. of Bishop Hurd's Works, with Life by himself, appeared in 1811, 8 vols. 8vo. This edit. comprises (1.) Serms. and Charges; 2. Introduc. to the Study of the Prophecies; 3. Moral and Political Dialogues; 4. Letters on Chivalry and Romance; 5. Critical Works and Dissertations, including his Horace. In 1808, 4to, 1809, 8vo, were pub. Warburton's Letters to Hurd, of which a lively review by Lord Jeffrey will be found in Edin. Rev., Jan. 1809; and in his contrib. to Edin. Rev., Lon., 1853, 880–893. In addition to authorities cited above, see Disraeli's Quarrels of Authors, and his Curiosities of Lit.; Nichols's Lit. Anec.; Goodhugh's Eng. Gent. Lib. "The most sensible and judicious of modern critics."—THOMAS WARTON.

"Warburton, and his imitator Hurd, and other living critics of that school, are loaded with familiar idioms, which at present would debase even the style of conversation."—Disraeli's Miscell. of Lit.: Style.

"Hurd has perhaps the merit of being the first who in this country aimed at philosophical criticism: he had great ingenuity, a good deal of reading, and a facility in applying it; but he did not feel very deeply, was somewhat of a coxcomb, and having always before his eyes a model neither good in itself nor made for him to emulate, he assumes a dogmatic arrogance, which, as it always offends the reader, so for the most part stands in the way of the author's own search for truth."—*Hallam's Lit. Hurdis, James, D.D., 1763–1801, a native of Sussex, educated at St. Mary's Hall and Magdalene Coll., Oxf.; Rector of Bishopstone, 1791; Prof. of Poetry at Oxford, 1793. He pub. a number of Poems, Lectures on Poetry, Sermons, and theolog. works. A collective ed. of his Poetical Works was pub. at Oxford in 1808, 3 vols. 8vo. Reviewed in Lon. Retrosp. Rev., vol. i. (1820) 58–70. The critic remarks that Hurdis had imbibed so much of the manner and spirit of the author of The Task

"As to entitle him, without much inaccuracy, to the title of a disciple of Cowper."

Hurdis's best known poetical compositions are The Village Curate, 1788, tragedy of Sir Thomas More, 1792, and The Favourite Village, 1800. His theological works are —1. A Short Critical Disquisition on the true meaning of the word תנינם [which he contends signifies the Crocodile] found in Genesis i. 21, Lon., 1790, 8vo. 2. Select Critical Remarks upon the Eng. Hutcheson, Archibald, d. 1740, pub. several works on politics, political economy, &c., the most important of which is the Collec. of Treatises relating to the National Debts and Funds, Lon., 1721, '25, 2 vols. fol. Hutcheson suggested a mode of paying off the public debt, for an account of which see Hume's Essay on Public Credit; M'Culloch's Lit. of Polit. Econ., 219; Blackw. Mag., xxiii. 345.

Hutcheson, C. Southern Mariners, a Tale of Patagonia; a Poem, Lon., 1853, 12mo.

Hutcheson, Francis, 1694–1747, a native of the North of Ireland, where his father was a Presbyterian minister, entered the University of Glasgow in 1710, studied divinity, and was licensed to preach. When about to assume the pastoral charge of a small Presbyterian congregation in the North of England, he was persuaded to open an academy in Dublin, which was liberally encouraged. In 1729 he became Professor of Moral Philosophy in the Univ. of Dublin. In 1725 he pub. An Inquiry into the Original of our Ideas of Beauty and Virtue, and in 1728 an Essay on the Passions and Affections. He also pub. some manuals for his class, &c. His great work —A System of Moral Philosophy, with the Life, Writings, and Character of the Author, by Dr. Wm. Leechman—was pub. by his son, Francis Hutcheson, M.D., in 1755, Glasgow, 2 vols. 4to. His Letters on Virtue appeared in 1772, 8vo. Hutcheson is a warm advocate of the doctrine of an implanted moral sense, intended as a governing principle in the conduct of human actions. He undoubtedly did much to increase—he may almost be said to have established—the school of Shaftesbury and Butler in Scotland. At this we need not marvel, when we read the glowing tribute paid to his philosophical orations by an eminent authority of our own day:

"His Lectures, by their copious illustrations, their amiable tone of feeling, their enlightened views of liberty and human improvement, and their persuasive eloquence, made a deeper impression than the more severe and dry compositions of Butler could ever create, and laid the foundation in Scotland of the modern ethical school."—LORD BROUGHAM: Lives of Philosophers of the Time of Geo. III., art. Adam Smith, ed. 1855, 166.

"Butler and Hutcheson coincided in the two important positions, that disinterested affections, and a distinct moral faculty, are essential parts of human nature. Hutcheson is a chaste and simple writer, who imbibed the opinions without the literary faults of his master, Shaftesbury. He has a clearness of expression and fulness of illustration which are wanting in Butler. But he is inferior to both these writers in the appearance at least of originality, and to Butler especially in that philosophical courage which, when it discovers the fountains of truth and falsehood, leaves others to follow the streams. . . . Hutcheson was the father of the modern school of philosophy in Scotland."—SIR JAMES MACKINTOSH: Prelim. Dissert. Encyc. Brit., and in his Works, 1854, i. 127, 129.

But the honour assigned to Hutcheson in the last paragraph cannot pass unchallenged. This distinction is awarded, by the great philosopher who has just closed his eyes upon the world, to Hutcheson's predecessor at Glasgow:

"Carmichael may be regarded, on good grounds, as the real founder of the Scottish school of philosophy."—SIR WILLIAM HAMILTON: Reid's Collected Writings, p. 30.

The attention of the reader is called to Dr. Leechman's Life of Hutcheson, noticed above:

BATE, JULIUS, and Works there cited, in Watt's Bibl. Brit. and in this Dictionary.

"The works of Hutchinson are entitled to notice, as their author was the founder of a school of philosophy and theology to which some of the most celebrated men of the last century belonged. However absurd many of his speculations seem to be there must be a plausibility in the leading principles of a system which engaged the attention and support of such men as President Forbes and Bishop Horne, Mr. Parkhurst and Bishop Hurdley. The leading idea of Hutchinson is that the Hebrew Scriptures contain the elements of all rational philosophy as well as of genuine religion. That philosophy he opposes to the Newtonian, and hence he wrote his Moses Principia, or a commentary on the Mosaic account of the creation and the deluge. His Moses sine Principio contains an account of the fall, and of other subjects connected with it. His work on the confusion of tongues is very ingenious; in which he attempts to prove that it was not a diversity of language, but of religion, which took place at Babel. His Trinity of the Gentiles gives a view of ancient mythology and idolatry considered chiefly as a corruption of the true religion. In the Covenant of the Cherubim he gives a view of the perfection of the Hebrew Scriptures, and of the Covenant of the Divine Three for the redemption of man. Hutchinson is an obscure, and, at the same time, a most dogmatical and abusive, writer. It is often exceedingly difficult to ascertain his meaning, and still more difficult to acquiesce in it, when ascertained. That he and his scholars have contributed considerably to the interpretation of the Bible, it would be wrong to deny. They have done a good deal, at the same time, to injure and clog the science of criticism."—Orme's Bibl. Bib.

Hutchinson, Thomas, 1711-1780, graduated at Harvard College, 1727; Chief-Justice of the Province of Massachusetts, 1760; Lieutenant-Governor, 1758-71; Governor, 1771-74. He was superseded by General Gage, May 13, 1774, and on the first of the following month sailed for England, where he was in the receipt of a pension until his death at Brompton, June 3, 1780. He was very unpopular in Massachusetts on account of his opposition to the principles of American liberty; and his disgrace was completed by the publication of some of his private letters, of the same tendency, to an ex-member of the British Parliament. These, with some others, were discovered in England by Benjamin Franklin, and by him sent back to Massachusetts to Dr. Cooper, with an injunction that they should not be copied nor published. 1. Hutton, James, M.D., 1726–1797, called the author of the Plutonian Theory of Geology, a native of Edinburgh, took his medical degree at Leyden in 1749. On his return home he became a zealous student of agriculture and geology, and gave the first-fruits of his researches to the world in 1777, under the title of Considerations on the Nature, Quality, and Distinctions of Coal and Culm, Edin., 8vo. In 1792 he pub. Dissertations on different subjects in Natural Philosophy, 4to; in 1794, Dissertation upon the Philosophy of Light, Heat, and Fire, 8vo; in the same year, An Investigation of the Principles of Knowledge, and of the Progress of Reason from Sense to Science and Philosophy, 3 vols. 4to; and in 1795, Theory of the Earth, with Proofs and Illustrations, 2 vols. 8vo. This is a collection, with additions, of his papers on this subject in the Edin. Phil. Trans. His theory, as communicated in the above papers, had been warmly attacked by Dr. Kirwan, in the Memoirs of the Irish Academy. The day that Hutton read Kirwan's attack he commenced the preparation of the MS. of the above two vols. for the press." Professor John Playfair zealously espoused Hutton's cause, and pub. in 1802, 8vo, Illustrations of the Huttonian Theory of the Earth. This work was reviewed in the same year by Dr. John Murray, in A Comparative View of the Huttonian and Neptunian Systems of Geology, in Answer to the Illustrations, &c. If, the hands of Professor Playfair we may safely leave the scientific reputation of Dr. Hutton. Playfair's biographical account of his "guide, philosopher and friend" will be found in Trans. Soc. Hutton, William, 1723–1815, a bookseller of Birmingham, rose by perseverance and industry from poverty to affluence. In his last work—A Trip to Coatham—written in his eighty-sixth year, he tells us—

"I took up my pen and that with fear and trembling, at the advanced age of fifty-six, a period when most would lay it down. I drove the quill thirty years, during which time I wrote and published thirty books."

His works were originally pub. from 1782 to 1810. A collective ed. of his Works was pub. in 1817, in 8 vols. 8vo, consisting of—Vol. I. His Life, written by himself; Journey to London; 2d edition. II. History of Birmingham. III. Courts of Requests, and Dissertation on Juries and Hundred Court. IV. Battle of Bosworth Field; 2d edit., with Additions by Nichols. V. History of Derby; Description of Blackpool. VI. History of the Roman Wall. VII. Remarks on North Wales; Tour to Scarborough, with A Survey of York. VIII. Trip to Coatham.

He also pub. The Barbers; a Poem, 1793, 8vo; Edgar and Elfrida; a Poem, 1794, 8vo. There has been a new ed. of his Poems, chiefly Tales, 8vo; and, since the collective ed. of his Works was pub., there have been new eds. of the Court of Requests, 1840, 8vo; his Life, by himself, 1842, sq.; Trip to Redcar and Coatham, 1841, 8vo. "The variety and novelty of its contents gave this book a credit which in some degree it preserves; but Hyde was ignorant of the ancient language of Persia, and is said to have been often misled by Mohammedan authorities. The vast increase of Oriental information in modern times renders it difficult for any work of the seventeenth century to keep its ground."—Hallam's Lit. Hist. of Europe.

Inchbald, Mrs. Elizabeth, 1756–1821, a celebrated actress, dramatist, and novelist, a native of Stanningfield, Suffolk, where her father, Mr. Simpson, was a farmer, came to London at the age of sixteen to seek an engagement on the stage, and married Mr. Inchbald, an actor of some reputation. The beautiful Mrs. Inchbald seems to have trod the boards with unbounded applause from her first appearance on the stage until her retirement in 1789. From this period she supported herself by her literary labours, which had commenced as early as 1781, although her Comedy then written—I'll Tell You What—was not performed until 1785. The first piece of her composition which was played was the Farce of A Mogul Tale, or, The Descent of the Balloon, which came out in 1784 at the Haymarket Theatre. The following is a list of her dramas: 1. A Mogul Tale; Farce, 1784. Not printed. 2. Appearance is against them; Farce, 1785, 8vo. 3. I'll Tell You What; Com., 1786, 8vo. 4. Widow's Vow; Farce, 1786, 8vo. 5. All on a Summer's Day. Com., 1787. Not printed. 6. Animal Magnetism; Farce, 1788. Not printed. 7. The Child of Nature; Dram. Piece, 1788, 8vo. 8. Midnight Hour; Com., 1788, 8vo. 9. Such Things Are; Play, 1788, 8vo. 10. Married Man; Com., 1789, 8vo. 11. The Hue and Cry; Farce, 1791. Not printed. 12. Next-Door Neighbours; Com., 1791, 8vo. 13. Young Men and Old Women; Farce. Not printed. 14. Every one has his faults; Com., 1793, 8vo. 15. The Wedding Day; Com., 1794, 8vo. 16. Wives as they were, and Maids as they are; Com., 1797, 8vo. 17. Lovers' Vows; Play, 1798, 8vo. 18. Wise Man of the East; Play, 1799, 8vo. 19. To Marry or not to Marry; Com., 1805, 8vo. Mrs. Inchbald also edited a Collection of Plays, (The British Theatre,) with Biographical and Critical Remarks, 25 vols., 1806-09; a Collection of Farces and other After-pieces, in 7 vols. 12mo, 1809; and the Modern Theatre, 10 vols. 12mo, 1809. But it is by her novels—A Simple Story, 1791, 4 vols. 12mo, and Nature and Art, 1796, 2 vols. 12mo—that this excellent woman is best known to the reading-world at large. A notice of each of these works from eminent critics is all for which we can find space:

"I have just been reading for the third, I believe for the fourth time, The Simple Story. Its effect upon my feelings was as powerful as at the first reading: I never read any novel—I except none,—I never read any novel that affected me so strongly, or that so completely possessed me with the belief in the real existence of all the persons it represents. I never once recollected the author whilst I was reading it; never said or thought, that's a fine sentiment,—or, that is well expressed,—or, that is well invented; I believed all to be real, and was affected as I should be by the real scenes, if they had passed before my eyes: it is truly and deeply pathetic."—Maria Edgeworth.

"If Mrs. Radcliffe touched the trembling chords of the imagination, making wild music there, Mrs. Inchbald has no less power over the spring of the heart. She not only moves the affections, but melts us into 'all the luxury of woe.' Her Nature and Art is one of the most interesting and pathetic stories in the world. It is indeed too much so; the distress is too naked, and the situations hardly to be borne with patience."—Hazlitt: On the English Novelists.

Mrs. Inchbald had prepared four vols. of autobiographical reminiscences, for which she was offered £1000 by Sir Richard Phillips, the publisher; but, acting by the advice of her spiritual guide, Dr. Poynter, she destroyed the MS. In 1833, however, Mr. Boaden pub. Memoirs of Mrs. Inchbald, compiled from an autograph journal which she had kept for above half a century. Of these Memoirs a review, accompanied by copious extracts, will be found in Lon. Gent. Mag., 1833, Pt. 2, 240–243, 332–336. A biographical notice of Mrs. Inchbald, pub. at the time of her death, will be found in the same periodical, 1821, Pt. 2, 184 185, 648. Ingersoll, C. M. English Grammar, Phila.

Ingersoll, Charles Jared, a member of the Philadelphia Bar, b. Oct. 3, 1782, at Philadelphia, is a son of Jared Ingersoll, of Philadelphia, and a grandson of Jared Ingersoll, of Connecticut, Stamp Commissioner. The subject of our notice was elected a member of the National House of Representatives in 1812, and has, until within the last seven or eight years, been actively engaged in public life in various capacities. His principal literary productions are the following:

About 1800, a poem, called Chiomara, published in the Port-Folio, edited by Joseph Dennie. 1801. A tragedy, in five acts, called Edwy and Elgiva, performed at the theatre, Chestnut Street. 1808. A pamphlet on the international disputes, called the Rights and Wrongs, Power and Policy, of the United States of America. 1810. A volume entitled Inchiquin the Jesuit's Letters on American literature and politics. Reviewed in the Lon. Quar. Rev., x. 494–539. See also Rich's Bibl. Amer. Nova, ii. 50. The review in the London Quarterly was answered by James K. Paulding, in his United States and England, pub. in 1814. 1811–15. Numerous contributions, anonymous, to the Democratic Press, Phila., and National Intelligencer, Washington, on the controversies with England which produced the war declared in 1812. 1813–15. Several Speeches, published in pamphlets, as member of Congress, concerning that war. 1823. Discourse before the American Philosophical Society on the influence of America on the mind. Republished in England and France. 1827. The Address of the Assembly of friends of domestic manufactures at Harrisburg; and (1829) most of the address of the National Assembly on that subject at New York. Translation of a French Work on the freedom of navigation and commerce of neutral nations in time of war, vindicating the law of nations that free ships make free goods; published in the American Law Journal. 1830. Review of Bourrienne's Memoirs, in American Quarterly Review. 1831. A dramatic tragic poem, in five acts, called Julian. 1838. Article on the Supreme Court of the United States, its judges and jurisdiction, in the United States Magazine and Democratic Review. 1835. A pamphlet entitled View of River-Rights. 1837. In the Convention to reform the Constitution of Pennsylvania, Reports on Currency, Speeches, published in pamphlets, on the Judiciary and Legislative power over bank-charters. 1841–42, '44–48. Reports and Speeches in Congress, published in pamphlets, on Tariff, Bank, Mexico, Texas, and Oregon. Many Discourses and Orations, published in pamphlets, on various subjects, literary and political. 1845–52. History of the War of 1812–15, between Great Britain and the United States: in four volumes. Vols. i. and ii. were reviewed in the Lon. Athenæum, 1853, 103–104.

"The quotations that we have made suggest a concluding remark as to Mr. Ingersoll's style. It is a rough, energetic style, not deficient in happy and vivid expressions; but we have rarely met with American writing more contemptuous not only of English rules, but of the reader's respiratory conveniences. . . . The book is hard to read because of the uncouthness of its forms."—Ubi supra.

Whatever may be the peculiarities of Mr. Ingersoll's style, the public are certainly indebted to him for much valuable information, collected from original sources, and first made known to the world through the medium of these volumes.

For further information concerning Mr. Ingersoll and his literary labours, see Duyckincks' Cyc. of Amer. Lit.; N. Amer. Rev., xviii. 157–178, (by Jared Sparks;) Ibid., xxii. 212-215; Democrat. Rev., (with portrait,) vi. 339; Ibid., xvi. 221.

Ingersoll, Jared, 1722–1781, a native of Milford, Conn., graduated at Yale College in 1742, and was appointed Stamp Commissioner in 1765. He was subsequently made Admiralty Judge for the Middle District, and resided some time in Philadelphia, but returned to New Haven, where he died in August, 1781. He was present at the debate on the Stamp-Act, and on his return home pub. a pamphlet on the subject, (New Haven, 1766, 4to,) which is now very rare, and has even escaped the researches of Mr. Rich. Extracts from this pamphlet will be found in a review of Lord Mahon's Hist. of England, (by J. G. Palfrey,) N. Amer. Rev., lxxv. 141-143.

Ingersoll, Joseph Reed, a member of the Philadelphia Bar, grandson of the preceding, and brother of Charles Jared Ingersoll, (ante,) was for many years an influential member of the National House of Representatives. For the last few years he has retired from public life. In addition to a number of printed speeches and addresses, political, literary, and philanthropic, Mr. Ingersoll is favourably known as an author by his translation into English of Roccus's tracts De Navibus et Naulo, and De Assecurationc, Phila., 1809, 8vo.

Mr. Ingraham was noted for his love of rare and curious books and prints; and the catalogue of his library, sold in Philadelphia, February, 1855, is well worthy of the attention of the veritable bibliomaniac. A notice of Mr. Ingraham, with a portrait, will be found in the Democratic Review, xxv. 77.

Ingraham, Rev. J. H., now a clergyman of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States, before his ordination pub. a number of romances, among which are The Southwest, Burton, Lafitte, Will Terrill, and Rivingstone. Ingulphus, a monastic historian, b. in London, about 1030, d. 1109, has long enjoyed the reputation of the authorship of a work on the life and miracles of St. Guthlac, and a History of the Monastery of Croyland, 626–1089. The latter, which embodies many particulars relating to English history, was pub. by Sir Henry Savile, in the Rerum Anglicarum Scriptores post Bedam præcipui, Lon., 1596, fol.; Franc., 1601, fol.; and entire, with Peter of Blois's continuation, (1090–1117,) in the Rerum Anglicarum Scriptorum veterum, Oxon., 1684, fol., tom. i. A new ed., edited by Mr. H. T. Riley, has been recently pub., 1854, p. 8vo, in Bohn's Antiq. Lib., vol. xxix. But, unfortunately for the fame of Ingulphus, it has been proved (by Sir Francis Palgrave first, in the Lon. Quar. Rev., and by Thomas Wright, in Biog. Brit. Lit.) that this history is a forgery. See these authorities, and Hallam's Lit. Hist. of Europe, ed. Lon., 1854, i. 16, and 27, n. In the history it is stated that its reputed author, Ingulphus, also wrote a life of St. Guthlac; but no such book is known to exist, nor is it mentioned by any other authority.

Innes, Louis, a R. Catholic priest, b. about 1650, Principal of the Scotch College at Paris, and Parisian secretary to James II., is said to have written the Memoirs of James II., an abstract from which was used by James Stanier Clarke (q. v.) in the work pub. by him, entitled The Life of James II., &c. The original memoir, in 4 vols. fol., MS., was destroyed, but a compendium was previously prepared, and it is to this we have reference in the above remark. But see next article.

Innes, Thomas, 1662–1744, a Roman Catholic priest, brother of the preceding, and his successor in the office of Principal of the Scotch College at Paris, was the author of A Critical Essay on the Ancient Inhabitants of the Northern Parts of Britain, in which he attacks with much success the assertions of Fordun's Chronicle, and other histories, respecting the antiquities of Scotland. He is also supposed by some to have been the author of the Memoir of James II. noticed in preceding article. A biographical account of Innes will be found in Chambers and Thomson's Biog. Dict. of Eminent Scotsmen, 1855, iii. 183–187. Innes's Critical Essay was answered by Andrew Waddell, Edin., 1733, 4to, and by Alex. Taitt, 1741, 12mo. Both of these answers will be found in vol. i. of Scotia Rediviva, 1826, 8vo. Innes's Critical Essay is a work of great value to the student of Scotch history:

We happen to possess Ireland's own MS. of one of his forgeries.—Henry the Second: the rascal seemed to feel but little penitence for his fraud; for at the conclusion he indulges in the self-gratulatory exclamation, "Huzza! Huzza! Huzza!" In addition to the Shakspeare forgeries, Ireland wrote a number of novels, plays, poems, &c., 1799–1814, a list of which will be found in Watt's Bibl. Brit.

Irving, Edward, 1792–1834, a native of Annan, Dumfriesshire, Scotland, was educated at the University of Edinburgh; Assistant minister to Dr. Chalmers, of St. John's Church, Glasgow, 1819–22; minister of the Scotch Church, Cross Street, Hatton Garden, London, 1822; removed to the large church built for his congregation in Regent's Square, 1829; accused of heresy by the Presbytery of London, 1830; ejected from his church, May 3, 1832. After his ejectment, his friends purchased for him the picture-gallery of Benjamin West, in Newman Street, and there Mr. Irving attracted large crowds by his remarkable exhibitions of the "gift of unknown tongues," produced directly, as he believed, by divine inspiration. He died of consumption at Glasgow, December 6, 1834, in the 42d year of his age. He was undoubtedly a sincere and excellent man; but his judgment and prudence were not equal to his piety and devotion, even before the unmistakable evidences of insanity which eventually clouded his fine intellect. He pub.—For the Oracles of God, Four Orations;—For Judgment to Come, an Argument in Nine Parts, 3d ed., Lon., 1824, 8vo; Babylon and Infidelity foredoomed of God, 1826, 2 vols. 12mo, reprinted in 1 vol. 8vo; Serms., Lects., and Occasional Discourses, Lon., 1828, 3 vols. 8vo; Homilies on the Sacraments, vol. i., 1828, sm. 8vo; The Last Days, 1828, 8vo, 2d ed., with Life by H. Bonar, 1850, p. 8vo; Expositions of the Book of Revelation, 1831, 4 vols. 12mo; and a number of single serms., theolog. treatises, &c. One of his best productions is his Introduction to Bishop Horne's Comment. on the Psalms, already noticed by us in the life of that excellent prelate. Mr. Irving's disciples are by no means extinct, in proof of which a project is now (1856) on foot to build Irvingite chapels in all the large towns of the United Kingdom; and it is reported that one gentleman in London has recently subscribed no less than £100,000 towards this scheme. "He was unquestionably, by many degrees, the greatest orator of our times. Of him indeed, more than of any man whom I have seen throughout my whole experience it might be said, with truth and emphasis, that he was a Boanerges, a son of thunder."—De Quincey: ubi supra.

"What the Scottish uncelebrated Irving was, they that have only seen the London celebrated (and distorted) one can never know. Bodily and spiritually, perhaps there was not (in that November, 1822) a man more full of genial energetic life in all these Islands."—Carlyle: ubi supra.

"Mr. Irving has shrunk from no opinion, however paradoxical. He has scrupled to avow no sentiment, however obnoxious. He has revived exploded prejudices; he has scouted prevailing fashions. He has opposed the spirit of the age, and not consulted the esprit de corps. . . . He has held a play book in one hand and a Bible in the other, and quoted Shakspeare and Melancthon in the same breath."—Hazlitt: ubi supra.

"I could hardly keep my eyes off him while we were at table. He put me in mind of the devil disguised as an angel of light, so ill did that horrible obliquity of vision harmonize with the dark tranquil features of his face, resembling that of our Saviour in Italian pictures, with the hair carefully arranged in the same manner."—Sir Walter Scott: ubi supra.

Irving, Helen W., is the nom de plume of a very young lady, a resident of Lynn, Massachusetts, who has pub. a number of poetical pieces in The Home Journal and other periodicals. The stanzas entitled Love and Fame have been cited as especially deserving of commendation. See T. B. Read's Female Poets of America; Caroline May's American Female Poets.

Irving, John Treat, 1778-1838, Presiding Judge of the Court of Common Pleas for the City and County of New York from 1817 until his death, and a brother of Washington and Peter Irving, was a contributor to the Morning Chronicle, (started in New York, Oct. 1, 1802,) a Democratic journal, conducted by the last-named of his two brothers. He acquired some distinction by his poetical attacks upon the tenets of his political opponents, and more by the exemplary discharge of the duties connected with his judicial station. See Daly's Hist. of Judic Trib. of N. York, p. 65.

Irving, John Treat, a member of the New York Bar, son of the preceding, and a nephew of Washington Irving, is best known as an author by his Sketches in an Expedition to the Pawnee Tribes, Phila., 1833, 2 vols. 12mo, Lon., 1835, 2 vols. p. 8vo: The Attorney, a Novel; and Harry Harson, or The Benevolent Bachelor: a Novel. Irving, Peter, 1771-1838, a brother of Washington Irving, pub. at New York, in 1820, a novel entitled Giovanni Sbogarro; a Venetian Tale, (from the French,) with alterations by Percival G——. Mr. Irving was editor and proprietor of The Morning Chronicle, a Democratic paper, started in New York, Oct. 1, 1802, and co-projector with his brother Washington of the humorous sketches which the latter expanded into the celebrated History of New York, by Diedrich Knickerbocker. Dr. Irving—so called from some attention paid to the study of medicine in early life—resided in Europe from 1809 to '36, and died in about two years after his return to New York.

Irving, Theodore, LL.D., b. 1809, in the city of New York, a son of Ebenezer Irving, resided for some years abroad with his uncle, Washington Irving; was from 1836 to '49 Professor of History and Belles-Lettres at Geneva College, and subsequently filled for three years the chair of Belles-Lettres in the Free Academy of New York. In December, 1854, he took holy orders in the Protestant Episcopal Church. In addition to many fugitive essays contributed to the periodicals of the day, Mr. Irving is the author of two valuable works, viz.: 1. The Conquest of Florida, by Hernando de Soto, Phila., 1835, 2 vols. 12mo; Lon., 1835, 2 vols. p. 8vo. Revised ed., uniform with the collective ed. of Washington Irving's Works, N. York, 12mo. Also pub. in vol. x. of H. G. Bohn's collective ed. of Washington Irving's Works, Lon., 1851, 10 vols. 8vo.

"The book before us is a delightful one. . . . In their style, too, these volumes are related to the pure and graceful writing of the author of the Life of Columbus. . . . The history before us is hardly a thing to read or criticise without a spark of the old ballad spirit being lighted within us, and we had better close our notice, lest we be tempted to try the indiscretion of a rhyme."—Lon. Athen., 1835, 609-611.

2. The Fountain of Living Waters; illustrated by Facts, N. York, 1854, 18mo; 4th ed., 1855, 18mo.

"The whole object of the book is to lead erring and wandering souls to Christ. Believing that it is well calculated to accomplish this end we would commend it as a book to be put into the hands of young persons whose minds are turned more or less to religious themes, and particularly such as need kind and gentle persuasives to piety."—Prot. Epis. Rev and Church Reg., N. York, April, 1855, 315.

"Living Waters is a sweet and tender appeal in behalf of spiritual religion, addressed especially to the young."—Method. Quar. Rev.

Irving, Thomas. Con. to Med. Com., 1790.

Irving, Washington, one of the most distinguished of modern authors, was born April 3, 1783, in the city of New York, in a house in William Street, between John and Fulton Streets, and not far from that venerable pile the Old Dutch Church. This mansion—so long an object of interest to citizen and sojourner—had until within the last few years resisted the progress of "improvement," which was gradually changing the face of the neighbourhood; but it too at last yielded to its fate, and in 1840 its site was occupied by one of the stately "Washington Stores." The father of Washington Irving was a native of Scotland, his mother an Englishwoman, and perhaps it is not entirely a matter of imagination to fancy that the national characteristics of both parents are to be discovered in several of the productions of the author of The Sketch-Book and Bracebridge Hall.

The earliest of Mr Irving's contributions to the Republic of Letters—a number of letters on the drama, the social customs of New York, &c.—were pub., in 1802, (under the nom de plume of Jonathan Oldstyle,) in The Morning Chronicle, a Democratic journal, edited by the author's brother, Dr. Peter Irving. These epistles appeared in pamphlet form, without the author's consent, in the year 1824. After some attention to the study of Coke and Blackstone, the state of Mr. Irving's health caused him in 1804 to seek for that physical benefit which a change of scene and climate might naturally be expected to afford. After an absence of two years in Italy, Switzerland, France, and England, &c., he returned home in 1806, resumed his legal studies, and was admitted to the bar. In January, 1807, appeared, to the great delight of the wits of the good city of Gotham,—always willing to enjoy a laugh,—No. 1 of a semi-monthly magazine, the joint production of Washington Irving, James K. Paulding, and William Irving; the latter contributing the poetry, and hints and sketches for some of the essays. This was the since-famous Salmagundi, or The Whim Whams and Opinions of Launcelot Langstaff and Others. The amusing character of this periodical rendered it exceedingly agreeable to the town, and its popularity promised a long and profitable life; but for some reason or other it was discontinued after the issue of the twentieth number. In 1809 was pub. the famous History of New York, by Diedrich Knickerbocker. The first part of this work was sketched in company with Dr. Peter Irving, who, on his departure for Europe, confided the whole to Washington, by whose humorous genius it was expanded to its present shape. Though this was one of the first-fruits of his inventive talent, it is risking but little to affirm that in its peculiar qualities it has not been surpassed by any later efforts—successful as they have been—of its accomplished author. In 1810, Washington Irving—who had never found sufficient attraction in his legal studies to induce him to practise the profession—was admitted as a partner, with two of his brothers, in the extensive commercial establishment which they conducted at New York and Liverpool. The failure of this house in 1817, consequent upon the pecuniary difficulties which followed the treaty of peace between England and the United States, occurred when Washington was in Europe, and this reverse of fortune induced the already popular author to determine to follow literature as a profession. He had of late employed his pen but seldom: a series of naval biographies contributed to Moses Thomas's (of Philadelphia) Analectic Magazine, (of which Irving was in 1813–14 the editor,) and a biographical sketch of Thomas Campbell, prefixed to a Philadelphia edit. of the works of the latter, are all of Irving's productions with which the world seems to have been favoured, from the date of the publication of The Knickerbocker, in 1809 to the time of the appearance of The Sketch-Book, in 1819. The numbers of the last-named work (composed in London) were transmitted to New York for publication, were read with avidity on both sides of the water, and several of the series were soon copied by Jerdan in the London Literary Gazette, and by the editors of other periodicals.

"We are greatly at a loss [remarks the formidable Blackwood in the number for February, 1820] to comprehend for what reason Mr. Irving has thought fit to publish his Sketch-Book in America earlier than in Britain; but at all events he is doing himself great injustice by not having an edition printed here of every number, after it has appeared in New York. Nothing has been written for a long time for which it would be more safe to promise great and eager acceptance."—Vol. vi. 557, (by J. G. Lockhart.)

This is the article referred to by Sir Walter Scott in the letter quoted by Irving in the Preface to his revised edit. of The Sketch-Book.

"This was encouragement indeed,—encouragement such as many a British aspirant for literary fame would have given the copy-right of his best work to have secured. In the same month in which the above eulogy appeared, Irving pub. in London, under the nom de plume of Geoffrey Crayon, Gent^{n}, the first vol. of The Sketch-Book. It was printed by John Miller, but at the author's expense; Murray, the Great Mogul of the book-trade, having declined the enterprise. The failure of Miller within a few weeks after the publication threw Irving again on the town for a publisher, and, through the friendly offices of Sir Walter Scott, Murray was induced to act in the premises. He gave the author £200, which he soon felt justified by the sale of the work in increasing to £400. The Sketch-Book was originally pub. in February, 1820, in 1 vol., but in July of the same year it appeared in 2 vols.,—a 2d edit. of the 1st, together with a new vol. The author had now attained an extended literary reputation, both at home and abroad; and so far was he from having any difficulty in procuring a publisher, that when Bracebridge Hall, or the Humourists, was ready for the press in 1822, Mr. Murray was ready to offer 1000 guineas for the copy-right without having seen the MS. He obtained the coveted prize at his offer, and subsequently gave the same author nearly twice as much (£2000) for the Chronicle of the Conquest of Granada, and quite three times as much (3000 guineas) for the History of the Life and Voyages of Christopher Columbus. But we anticipate. The dates of the publications of Irving's succeeding works, given to the world between the appearance of The Sketch-Book in London, in 1820, and his return to the United States in May, 1832, were as follows:

Bracebridge Hall, or the Humourists; a Medley, by Geoffrey Crayon, Gent^{n}, Lon., 1822, 2 vols. 8vo; N. York, 1822, 2 vols. 8vo.

Tales of a Traveller, by Geoffrey Crayon, Gent^{n}, Lon., 1824, 2 vols. 8vo; N. York, 1824, 4 Pts. Sold to Murray (without his having seen the MS.) for 1500 guineas.

The Life and Voyages of Christopher Columbus, 1828, 4 vols. 8vo; N. York, 1828, 3 vols. 8vo.

Chronicle of the Conquest of Granada, Lon., 1829, 2 vols. p. 8vo; Phila., 1829, 2 vols. 12mo.

Voyages of the Companions of Columbus, 1 vol., Lon., Paris, and Phila., 1831.

The Alhambra, Lon., 1832, 2 vols. 8vo; Phila., 1832, 2 vols. 12mo.

In May, 1832, as above stated, Mr. Irving returned home, after an absence of seventeen years. During this long period he had been an extensive traveller. We left him at London, superintending the publication of The Sketch-Book, in 1820. A portion of this year and of the following was spent in the city of Paris: the winter of 1822 was passed at Dresden, and that of 1825 in the South of France. In the winter of 1825–26, at the earnest request of Mr. Alexander H. Everett, American minister to Spain,—to whom the idea was first suggested by O. Rich, Esq., American Consul at Madrid,—Mr. Irving visited Madrid for the purpose of translating into English the valuable compilation of Navarette, Coleccion de los Viages y Descubrimientos, &c. pub. at Madrid in 1825, (after Mr. Irving's arrival,) in 2 vols. 4to. Mr. Rich, indeed, had from the first set his heart—not upon a mere translation of this collection, but—upon a Life of Columbus from the pen of Washington Irving. This darling desire he was so happy as to see realized, and to him, therefore, is the world indebted for the publication of this work. Mr. Irving was the guest of this eminent bibliographer, whose name has long been honoured by students in both hemispheres; and, says he,

"In his extensive and curious library I found one of the best collections extant of Spanish colonial history, containing many documents for which I might elsewhere search in vain. This he put at my absolute command, with a frankness and unreserve seldom to be met with among the possessors of such rare and valuable works; and his library has been my main resource throughout the whole of my labours."

We shall have more to quote to Mr. Rich's credit when we reach his patronymic in the future pages of our Dictionary. In this year (1826) and the following, as also in the spring of 1829, Mr. Irving made profitable journeys in the South of Spain, the results of which were given to the world in 1829, in The Chronicle of the Conquest of Granada; in 1832, in the picturesque pages of The Alhambra; in 1835, in The Legends of the Conquest of Spain; and in 1849–50, in Mahomet and his Successors.

Mr. Irving left Spain in July, 1829, and returned to London to discharge the duties connected with the Secretaryship of Legation to the American Embassy, which had been conferred upon him during his absence. In 1830 Mr. Henry Hallam and himself were honoured by the gift of the two fifty-guinea gold medals ordered by George IV. to be presented to the two authors who should be adjudged to have attained the greatest excellence in historical composition. This high compliment to Mr. Irving was a well-deserved tribute to the merits of his History of the Life and Voyages of Christopher Columbus. In the next year the degree of LL.D. was conferred upon Mr. Irving by the University of Oxford,—a testimonial which that august body is not in the habit of bestowing upon slight foundations. After an absence protracted through seventeen years, Mr. Irving at length sailed for home, and arrived in New York on the 21st day of May, 1832. To one who had conferred such imperishable renown upon the American name—even had there been nothing in the man to elicit that enthusiastic affection with which Washington Irving is regarded by his countrymen—no common honours were accorded. A public dinner was immediately tendered to him in New York, and the friends of early days, together with those who had grown into civic eminence and social consideration during his absence, united in paying homage to him who had conferred honour upon all. The citizens of other States also claimed their right to entertain their illustrious countryman, and nothing but that modesty which has always been a distinguishing trait of his character prevented a series of ovations and a triumphal march through the American Republic from Boston to St. Louis and Philadelphia to New Orleans.

"We cannot refuse ourselves the pleasure," remarks one of the most eminent of his countrymen, "of bearing our humble part in the cordial welcome with which the unanimous voice of the country is now greeting the distinguished pilgrim on his return from abroad. . . . The open and hearty welcome which his fellow-citizens have given him shows that he is best appreciated where he is best known. His reception at New York was the fairest triumph that has yet been accorded to literary desert in the New World."—Edward Everett: Review of The Alhambra, in N. Amer. Rev. xxxv. 265–282.

Shortly after his return to the United States, Mr. Irving visited some of the most interesting portions of the Great West, and gratified the world with the fruits of his researches among the Indians, in the Tour on the Prairies, pub. in the Crayon Miscellany in 1835. Those more fond of studying the phenomena of life under another phase, found in the Recollections of Abbotsford and Newstead Abbey, and The Legends of the Conquest of Spain,—comprising the second and third vols. of the Crayon Miscellany,—sufficient to charm the imagination and delight the taste. To this collection succeeded Astoria; or, Anecdotes of an Enterprise beyond the Rocky Mountains, pub. in 1836, (in which the author was assisted by his nephew, Pierre M. Irving;) and the Adventures of Captain Bonneville, U.S.A., in the Rocky Mountains and the Far West, (based upon the MSS. of Capt. B. and other materials,) which was given to the world in 1837. In the years 1839 and '40, Mr. Irving contributed a number of papers to The Knickerbocker Magazine, a portion of which, with other fugitive articles, were collected in 1855, and pub. in a vol. under the title of Wolfert's Roost. From 1842 to '46 Mr. Irving resided at Madrid as United States Minister to Spain, and, returning home in the latter year, sought a quiet retreat for his remaining years in Wolfert's Roost,—an earthly paradise which we shall not attempt to describe after the portraiture which the owner himself has given to the world. The "Stronghold of old Baltus Van Tassel on the Banks of the Hudson," so graphically sketched in the Legend of Sleepy Hollow, has now acquired a double share of renown and undying honours by the occupancy of its eloquent topographer. A well-drawn picture of Wolfert's Roost and its present lord (by Henry T. Tuckerman) will be found in The Homes of American Authors, N. York, 1853. Here, in his bachelor-home,—for Geoffrey Crayon has been content to eulogize the blessings of matrimony whilst denying himself their indulgence,—in the company of his surviving brother and affectionate nieces, who are to him as daughters, the author of the Sketch-Book passes his tranquil days in calm anticipation of that change which, we trust, for the sake of his many friends, is yet at a long distance.

His publications since his retirement have been the Biography and Poetical Remains of the late Margaret Miller Davidson, 1841; Oliver Goldsmith, a Biography, 1849, (enlarged from a sketch prefixed to the Works of the latter pub. in Paris, Galignani, 1825, 4 vols.. Baudry, 1837, 4 vols. 8vo;) Mahomet and his Successors, 2 vols., 1849–50; The Life of George Washington, vol. i., 1855, ii. and iii., 1856. This work will probably comprise two or three more volumes. Mr. Irving has also within the last few years superintended the publication of a revised edit. of his works,—urged thereto by the persuasions of the eminent publisher, Mr. George P. Putnam, of New York. The new edit. was issued by Mr. Putnam in 15 vols., 1848–50, and the sale so far (i.e. to Jan 1857) has been 250,000 vols., which, added to about as many disposed of the old edits., gives an aggregate sale in America alone of half a million vols. of the works of this popular author. This enumeration does not include the 98,000 vols. already printed of the unfinished life of Washington, nor the number of copies sold of Wolfert's Roost, which must be very large.

The Works of Washington Irving, in the new revised and uniform edit. just referred to, are thus arranged: Vol. I. Knickerbocker's History of New York. II. The Sketch-Book. III., IV., V. Columbus and his Companions. VI. Bracebridge Hall. VII. Tales of a Traveller. VIII. Astoria. IX. The Crayon Miscellany. X. Capt. Bonneville's Adventures. XI. Oliver Goldsmith; a Biography. XII., XIII. Mahomet and his Successors. XIV. The Conquest of Granada. XV. The Alhambra. To these must be added Wolfert's Roost and The Life of Washington, (also pub. by Geo. P. Putnam & Co. of New York,) which, with The Legends of the Conquest of Spain, will be included in a Second Series of uniform edits of Irving's Works. A collective London edit. is pub. by Henry G. Bohn, uniform with his Standard Library. It is comprised in 10 thick 8vo vols., (1851,)—viz.: Vol. I. Salmagundi and Knickerbocker; with Portrait of Irving. II. Sketch-Book, and Life of Goldsmith. III. Bracebridge Hall, Abbotsford, and Newstead. IV. Tales of a Traveller, and The Alhambra. V. Conquest of Granada, and Conquest of Spain. VI., VII., Life of Columbus, and Companions of Columbus; with a New Index and a fine Portrait. VIII. Astoria, and a Tour on the Prairies. IX. Mahomet and his Successors; with Portrait. X. Conquest of Florida, (by Theodore Irving,) and Adventures of Capt. Bonneville. Irving's Works are also pub. in London, from time to time, by Murray, Bentley, Routledge, W. Smith, Tegg, &c.

Some have been issued with illustrations, on both sides of the Atlantic; and Messrs. Childs & Peterson, of Philadelphia, publish Irving's Select Works, illustrated by F. O. C. Darley and others, in 6 vols. 8vo; viz.: I. The Sketch-Book. II. Knickerbocker's History of New York. III. Tales of a Traveller. IV. Oliver Goldsmith: A Biography. V. The Alhambra. VI. Bracebridge Hall; or, The Humorists.

This volume (VI.) is illustrated by fourteen steel plates, engraved by Greatbach and others, from original designs by Schmolze.

What more acceptable testimonial of regard could be presented to a friend than this valuable set of works?

The same publishers issue a companion-volume to this set, or the complete works of Irving, entitled The Illustrated Beauties of Irving, "containing thirty spirited Illustrations of the Works of Washington Irving, finely engraved on steel, accompanied by an elaborate and carefully-prepared Biographical and Critical Sketch of Mr. Irving, from Allibone's Dictionary of Authors; also, a notice of Sunny Side, &c., by H. T. Tuckerman, Esq.; together with choice passages selected from each of Mr. Irving's works."

The "notice" by Mr. Tuckerman, above referred to, is an extract from the admirable sketch entitled Sunny Side and its Proprietor, to which we have just called the attention of the reader who desires to see a graphic portraiture of Geoffrey Crayon reposing amidst the rural shades o Sleepy Hollow. We can bear witness to the faithfulness of the picture. There are enough points of resemblance in literary taste, culture, and style between the limner and his subject to make "Tuckerman upon Irving" sound as natural and fitting as "Coke upon Littleton."

Nor must we omit to notice the Illustrated Edition of Irving's Life of Washington, now (1858) in course of publication (by Putnam) in semi-monthly Parts, (14 to each vol.,) imp. 8vo, 100 copies large paper 4to.

And now, in accordance with our promise in the preface to this work,—a promise which the preceding pages will prove we have neither forgotten nor delayed to fulfil,—we shall proceed to adduce, as we have done in other instances, the verdicts which eminent critics have passed upon the literary characteristics of the subject of our notice. In many preceding cases we have been obliged to omit much more than we had space to quote of interesting and truly valuable criticism; but, when we commence the pleasing task of citing opinions respecting the productions of Washington Irving, we are literally oppressed by the embarras de richesses. As we glance around our library-shelves, and behold the mass of materials which we have been for years collecting on this theme, (as we have on the same scale, though not to the same extent, collected for the illustration of many thousands of other writers,) we feel it to be no exaggeration to say that we could readily fill a goodly octavo volume with the matter which our space will oblige us to reject. Be it our care, therefore, to make that judicious selection from the materials which invite our research, which shall truly represent the impression which this distinguished writer has made upon the present generation and the one which first sat in judgment on the early fruits of his literary toil.

1. SALMAGUNDI; OR, THE WHIM-WHAMS AND OPINIONS OF LAUNCELOT LANGSTAFF, ESQ., AND OTHERS, January, 1807, to January, 1808:

"We all remember the success of Salmagundi, to which he was a large and distinguished contributor; with what rapidity and to what extent it circulated through America; how familiar it made us with the local pleasantry and the personal humours of New York, and what an abiding influence it has had in that city, by forming a sort of school of wit of a character somewhat marked and peculiar, and superior to every thing our country has witnessed, except, perhaps, that of the wits of The Anarchiad in Connecticut."—EDWARD EVERETT: N. Amer. Rev., xv. 206, July, 1822.

"We have no hesitation in saying at the outset, that we consider the good papers of Salmagundi, and the greater part of Knickerbocker, superior to the Sketch-Book. . . . It [Salmagundi] was exceedingly pleasant morning or after-dinner reading, never taking up too much of a gentleman's time from his business and pleasures, nor so exalted and spiritualized as to seem mystical to his fore-reaching . . . sion. . . . Though its wit is sometimes forced, and its serious style sometimes false, upon looking it over we have found it full of entertainment, with an infinite variety of characters and circumstances, and with that amiable, good-natured wit and pathos which shows that the heart has not grown hard while making merry of the world."—RICHARD M. DANA, Sr.: N. Amer Rev., ix. 323, 324, 344–345, Sept. 1819.

"The better pieces are written in Mr. Irving's best manner. Take it altogether, it was certainly a production of extraordinary merit, and was instantaneously and universally recognized as such by the public. It wants of course the graver merits of the modern British Collections of Essays; but for spirit, effect, and actual literary value, we doubt whether any publication of the class since The Spectator, upon which it is directly modelled, can fairly be put in competition with it."—ALEXANDER H. EVERETT: N. Amer. Rev., xxviii. 116, Jan. 1829.

"It was in form and method of publication imitated from The Spectator, but, in details, spirit, and aim, so exquisitely adapted to the latitude of New York, that its appearance was hailed with a delight hitherto unknown: it was, in fact, a complete triumph of local genius."—HENRY T. TUCKERMAN: Sketch of Amer. Lit.

"In this work we are introduced to the watering-places, balls, elections, reviews, and coteries of the daughter-country, and particularly of New York, the centre of its fashion, in a style of unsparing and broad humour, infinitely outdoing any liberties which Mathews thought fit to take with his hospitable entertainers, and reflecting some credit on the good-temper which was shown by its reception. . . . That Salmagundi owes its principal pretensions to Mr. Irving's exertions we are the more inclined to conclude from the evidence of a work in which, not very long afterwards, he tried his strength single-handed, under the title of Knickerbocker's Humorous History of New York."—Lon. Quar. Rev., xxxi. 474, 475, March, 1825.

"The production of Paulding, Irving, Verplanck, and perhaps of others, in partnership [an error, see p. 935]; the papers of Paulding are more sarcastic, ill natured, acrimonious,—bitter,—than those of Irving; but quite as able: those by Verplanck we do not know: we have only heard of him as one of the writers: it is a work in two volumes duodecimo; essays, after the manner of Goldsmith,—a downright, secret, laboured, continual imitation of him,—abounding, too, in plagiarisms: the title is from our English Flim-Flams oriental papers, the little man in black, &c. &c. from the Citizen of the World: parts are capital: as a whole, the work is quite superior to any thing of the kind which this age has produced."—John Neal: Blackw. Mag., xvii. 61, Jan. 1825.

2. Knickerbocker's History of New York, 1809.

It was to this work that Irving owed his fortunate introduction to Sir Walter Scott. Campbell was aware of the delight with which it was read by the Great Unknown, and therefore gave the author a letter to Abbotsford. The young American arrived at Selkirk on the 29th of August, 1817.

"I had come down from Edinburgh," he tells us, "partly to visit Melrose Abbey and its vicinity, but chiefly to get a sight of the 'mighty minstrel of the North.' I had a letter of introduction to him from Thomas Campbell, the poet, and had resolved, from the interest he had taken in some of my earlier scribblings, that a visit from me would not be deemed an intrusion. On the following morning, after an early breakfast, I set off in a postchaise for the Abbey. On the way thither I stopped at the gate of Abbotsford, and sent the postillion to the house with the letter of introduction and my card, on which I had written that I was on my way to the ruins of Melrose Abbey, and wished to know whether it would be agreeable to Mr. Scott (he had not yet been made a baronet) to receive a visit from me in the course of the morning."—Irving's Abbotsford.

Mr. Lockhart shall tell us in what spirit this "modest approach" was received:

"Scott's family well remember the delight with which he received this announcement: he was at breakfast, and sallied forth instantly, dogs and children after him as usual, to greet the guest and conduct him in person from the highway to the door."—Lockhart's Life of Scott.

Mr. Irving must be permitted to take up the thread:

"Before Scott had reached the gate he called out to me in a hearty tone, welcoming me to Abbotsford, and asking news of Campbell. Arrived at the door of the chaise, he grasped me warmly by the hand: 'Come, drive down, drive down to the house,' said he; 'ye're just in time for breakfast, and afterwards ye shall see all the wonders of the Abbey.'

"I would have excused myself on the plea of having already made my breakfast. 'Hout, man!' cried he; 'a ride in the morning in the keen air of the Scotch hills is warrant enough for a second breakfast!'"—Ubi supra.

Thus graphically is sketched, by the gratified stranger, his first interview with the tried and loving friend of many years; and this lifelike description is familiar, or should be so, to all. But it has been the happy lot of the writer of these pages to hear from Irving's own lips—while the generous tear of affection quivered in his eye—the pathetic account of his last interview with his friend, a few months before the lamentations of nations over his grave testified to the strong hold which he had gained upon the hearts of his readers in every land. But we are anticipating here: should we ever record the deeply-interesting narration to which we refer, it will be more appropriately introduced in our life of the author of Waverley. It is worth mentioning, in this connexion, that in a letter from Scott to John Richardson, dated 22d Sept. 1817, he remarks:

"When you see Tom Campbell, tell him with my best love that I have to thank him for making me known to Mr. Washington Irving, who is one of the best and pleasantest acquaintances I have made this many a day."

Every American who has been abroad, and mingled at all in the polite circles of Europe, can testify that Sir Walter Scott here speaks that only which thousands will gladly endorse. We quote one instance which we find recorded in Mr. N. P. Willis's agreeable Pencillings by the Way. He is describing an evening party at the Countess of Blessington's:

"Near me sat Smith, the author of Rejected Addresses,—a hale, handsome man, apparently fifty, with white hair, and a very nobly-formed head and physiognomy. . . . Among other things, he talked a great deal of America, and asked me if I knew our distinguished countryman, Washington Irving. I had never been so fortunate as to meet him. 'You have lost a great deal,' he said, 'for never was so delightful a fellow. I was once taken down with him into the country by a merchant to dinner. Our friend stopped his carriage at the gate of his park, and asked us if we would walk through his grounds to the house. Irving refused, and held me down by the coat, so that we drove on to the house together, leaving our host to follow on foot. "I make it a principle," said Irving, "never to walk with a man through his own ground. I have no idea of praising a thing whether I like it or not. You and I will do them to-morrow morning by ourselves."' The rest of the company had turned their attention to Smith as he began his story, and there was a universal inquiry after Mr. Irving. Indeed, the first questions on the lips of every one to whom I am introduced as an American are of him and Cooper."

Tom Moore's warm affection for the author of The Sketch-Book is no secret to those who have read the entertaining Diary of the former, recently published by Lord John Russell. We quote from one of the poet's entries a bon mot of Irving's, which has amused us not a little:

"April 10, 1830.—Forgot to mention in its place Irving's description of the evening at Horace Twiss's, (the evening of the day he wanted me to meet the Duke of Wellington.) But few people had come; and 'there was Twiss,' said Irving, 'with his two great men, the Duke and the Chancellor, just like a spider that has got two big flies and does not know what to do with them.'"

But, the reader will query, how had Scott become acquainted with the literary merits of the young American?—for such acquaintance he seems to have had. Lockhart shall again be our spokesman:

"Scott had received The History of New York by Knickerbocker, shortly after its appearance in 1812, from an accomplished American traveller, Mr. Brevoort; and the admirable humour of this early work had led him to anticipate the brilliant career which its author has since run. Mr. Thomas Campbell, being no stranger to Scott's high estimate of Irving's genius, gave him a letter of introduction," &c.

It so happens—though it is hardly an accident, either—that we have before us a fac-simile of Scott's letter to Mr. Henry Brevoort, acknowledging the receipt of Knickerbocker's History of New York; and it is strictly to our present purpose—the citation of opinions upon Irving's works—to quote this epistle for the gratification of t ader:

"My Dear Sir:—I beg you to accept my best thanks for the uncommon degree of entertainment which I have received from the most excellently-jocose history of New York. I am sensible that as a stranger to American parties and politics I must lose much of the concealed satire of the piece; but I must own that, looking at the simple and obvious meaning only, I have never read any thing so closely resembling the style of Dean Swift as the annals of Diedrich Knickerbocker. I have been employed these few evenings in reading them aloud to Mrs S. and two ladies who are our guests, and our sides have been absolutely sore with laughing. I think, too, there are passages which indicate that the author possesses power of a different kind, and [he] has some touches which remind me much of Sterne. I beg you will have the kindness to let me know when Mr. Irvine takes pen in hand again, for assuredly I shall expect a very great treat, which I may chance never to hear of but through your kindness. Believe me, dear sir,

"Your obliged and humble servant,

"Walter Scott.

"Abbotsford 23d April, 1813."

We have already seen that it was to the friendly offices of Scott that Irving was indebted for the happy circumstance which made John Murray his publisher, and the handsome tribute to both these gentlemen which appears in the Preface to the revised edition of The Sketch-Book (New York, 1848) must not be omitted in this place:

"From that time [the publication of The Sketch-Book in 1820] Murray became my publisher, conducting himself in all his dealings with that fair, open, and liberal spirit which had obtained for him the well-merited appellation of the Prince of Booksellers. Thus, under the kind and cordial auspices of Sir Walter Scott, I began my literary career in Europe; and I feel that I am but discharging, in a trifling degree, my debt of gratitude to the memory of that golden-hearted man in acknowledging my obligations to him. But who of his literary contemporaries ever applied to him for aid or counsel that did not experience the most prompt, generous, and effectual assistance?"

We continue the quotation of opinions:

"Equally or more admired [than Salmagundi] was Knickerbocker's History of New York, a work to be compared with any thing of the kind in our language; a book of unwearying pleasantry, which, instead of flashing out, as English and American humour is wont, from time to time, with long and dull intervals, is kept up with a true French vivacity from beginning to end; a book which, if it have a fault, has only that of being too pleasant, too sustained a tissue of merriment and ridicule."—Edward Everett: N. Amer. Rev., xv. 206, July, 1822.

"It has the same faults and same good qualities in its style, its wit and humour, and its characters are evidently by the same hand, as the leading ones in Salmagundi, though not copies from them. They are perfectly fresh and original, and suited to their situations. Too much of the first part of the first volume is laborious and up-hill; and there are places here and there in the last part, to which there is the same objection. Our feelings seldom flag in the second."—Richard H. Dana, Sr.: N. Amer. Rev., ix. 345, Sept. 1819.

This we consider as equal to the best, and in some [illegible] perhaps superior to any other, of our author's productions. [viz.: Oldstyle, Salmagundi, Naval Biographies, The Sketch-Book, [illegible] bridge Hall, Tales of a Traveller, and Columbus.] It is [illegible] which exhibits most distinctly the stamp of real inventive [illegible] the true test, as we have hinted, of genius. The plan, [illegible] simple enough, and when hit upon sufficiently obvious, is [illegible] original."—Alex. H. Everett: N. Amer. Rev., xxviii. 247, Jan. 1829.

"The most elaborate piece of humor in our literature,—Irving's facetious history of his native town."—HENRY T. TUCKERMAN: Sketch of Amer. Lit.

"Of the point of many of the allusions contained in this political satire, partaking somewhat of the style of Swift's Tale of a Tub, and in which more than one President of the United States figures, we very much lament that we are not fully competent to judge. To us it is a tantalizing book, of which all that we understand is so good, and affords us so much pleasure, even through an imperfect acquaintance with it, that we cannot but conclude that a thorough knowledge of the whole point in every part would be a treat indeed."—Lon. Quar. Rev., xxxi. 475. March, 1825.

Another authority does not consider that Irving was so invariably allegorical as the critic just quoted seems to suppose:

"By nine readers out of ten, perhaps, Knickerbocker is read as a piece of generous drollery—nothing more. Be it so. It will wear the better. The design of Irving himself is not always clear, nor was he always undeviating in his course. Truth or fable, fact or falsehood,—it was all the same to him, if a bit of material came in his way. In a word, we look upon this volume of Knickerbocker—though it is tiresome, though there are some wretched failures in it, a little overdoing of the humorous, and a little confusion of purpose throughout—as a work honourable to English literature, manly, bold and so altogether original, without being extravagant, as to stand alone among the labours of men."—JOHN NEAL: Blackw. Mag., xvii. 62, Jan 1825.

"To speak the plain truth, Diedrich Knickerbocker is, after all, our favourite. There is more richness of humour, and there is more strength of language too, in these earlier efforts."—Blackw. Mag., xiv. 564. Nov. 1823.

"The whole book is a jeu-d'esprit, and perhaps its only fault is, that no jeu-d'esprit ought to be quite so long as to fill two closely-printed volumes."—Ibid., vii 361, July, 1820, (by J. G. Lockhart.)

The eloquent historian of The Conquest of Mexico, in a dissertation upon the Right of Title by Discovery, after referring the reader to some of the great legal luminaries of different countries,—to Vattel, Kent, and Wheaton,—concludes with the following allusion to the erudite essay of our ancient friend, the chronicler of the early fortunes of Nieuw-Nederlandts:

"If it were not treating a grave discussion too lightly, I should crave leave to refer the reader to the renowned Diedrich Knickerbocker's History of New York, book 1, chap. 5, for a luminous disquisition on this knotty question. At all events he will find there the popular arguments subjected to the test of ridicule—a test showing, more than any reasoning can, how much or rather how little, they are really worth."—Prescott's Hist. of the Conquest of Mexico, 23d ed., Bost., 1855. ii 33, n.

For further notices of Knickerbocker's History of New York, see Lon. Month. Rev., xciv. 67; Lon. Athen., 1832, 458; Knickerbocker Mag., iii. 1; GRAHAME, JAMES, p. 717, in this Dictionary.

3. THE SKETCH-BOOK, 1819-20.

"I have glanced over The Sketch-Book. It is positively beautiful, and increases my desire to crimp you, if it be possible."—Sir Walter Scott to Washington Irving, offering him the editorship (with a salary of £800 per annum) of a projected Edinburgh weekly literary periodical. This offer was gratefully declined by Irving.

"But, though it is primarily for its style and composition that we are induced to notice this book, it would be quite unjust to the author not to add, that he deserves very high commendation for its more substantial qualities, and that we have seldom seen a work that gave us a more pleasing impression of the writer's character, or a more favourable one of his judgment and taste. . . It seemed fair and courteous not to admit a stranger on his first introduction to our pages: and what we have quoted, we are persuaded, will justify all that we have said in his favour. . . We have found the book in the hands of most of those to whom we have thought of mentioning it."—LORD JEFFREY. Edin. Rev., xxxiv. 161, 168, 176, Aug. 1820.

"Few recent publications have been so well received in England as The Sketch-Book. Several of the Waverley novels have passed through fewer editions than this agreeable work, and the journals of most consequence have paid the highest compliments to its merit. We are nevertheless free to confess that we think The Sketch-Book as a whole inferior to the author's earlier writings."—EDWARD EVERETT: N. Amer. Rev., xv. 208, July, 1822.

"We will be open with him, and tell him that we do not think the change is for the better. He appears to have lost a little of that natural run of style for which his lighter writings were so remarkable. He has given up something of his direct, simple manner, and plain phraseology, for a more studied, periphrastical mode of expression. He seems to have exchanged words and phrases which were strong, distinct, and definite, for a genteel sort of language, cool, less definite, and general. It is as if his mother-English had been sent abroad to be improved, and, in attempting to become accomplished, had lost too many of her home qualities. . . . The Sketch Book is extremely popular, and it is worthy of being so. Yet it is with surprise that we have heard its style indiscriminately praised. . . . Had we thought less highly of his powers, we should have said less about his errors. Did we not take delight in reading him, we should have been less earnest about his mistakes. . . . He is a man of genius, and able to bear his faults."—RICHARD H. DANA, SR.: N. Amer. Rev., ix. 348, 350, 356, Sept. 1819.

"The characteristics of The Sketch-Book are essentially the same with those of the preceding work; but, with somewhat more polish and elegance, it has somewhat less vivacity, freshness, and power. This difference constitutes the distinction between Mr. Irving's first and second manner, the latter of which is preserved in all his subsequent publications, excepting the one immediately before us, [Life of Columbus.] Of these two manners, the one or the other may perhaps be preferred by different readers, according to their different tastes. We incline ourselves to the former, conceiving that spirit and vigour are the highest qualities of style, and that the loss of any merit of this description is but poorly compensated by a little additional finish."—ALEX. H. EVERETT: N. Amer. Rev., xxviii 119. Jan. 1829.

"His stories of Rip Van Winkle and Sleepy Hollow are perhaps the finest pieces of original fictitious writing that this country has produced, next to the works of Scott."—Chambers's Cyc. Eng. Lit., Edin., 1844. ii 594.

Dr. Dibdin, a Nestor among critics, cannot find words sufficiently strong in which to express his admiration of The Sketch Book. Referring to Mr. Roscoe, he remarks:

"This is probably the last time that his name will adorn those pages; and in taking leave of it how can I better express my feelings than in the beautiful language of the author of The Sketch Book?"—Library Companion, ed. 1825, 642.

Again:

"I know of few passages—indeed, I know of none—which so completely and so delicately (if I may so speak) describe the contents of a well stored library as the following, from the author of The Sketch Book: 'When all that is worldly turns to dross around us, these only retain their steady value.' &c."

The doctor quotes to the end of the next paragraph, and then demands,

"Can sentiment (I ask) be purer, or language more harmonious, than this?"—Ubi supra p 544. See also p 346.

"The Sketch Book is a timid, beautiful work; with some childish pathos in it, some rich, pure, bold poetry: a little squeamish, puling, lady-like sentimentality: some courageous writing, some wit, and a world of humour, so happy, so natural, so altogether unlike that of any other man, dead or alive, that we would rather have been the writer of it, fifty times over, than of every thing else that he has ever written. The touches of poetry are everywhere; but never where we would look for them. Irving has no passion: he falls utterly in true pathos,—cannot speak as if he were carried away by any thing. He is always thoughtful: and, save when he tries to be fine or sentimental, always natural. The 'dusty splendour' of Westminster Abbey, the 'ship staggering over the precipices of the ocean, the shark 'darting, like a spectre, through the blue waters,'—all these things are poetry, such poetry as never was, never will be, surpassed. We could mention fifty more passages,—epithets of power, which no mere prose writer would have dared, under any circumstances, to use."—JOHN NEAL: Blackw. Mag., xvii 65, Jan 1825.

"We trust some arrangement has been entered into, by virtue of which the succeeding numbers of this exquisite miscellany may be early given to the English public; who, we are sure, are, at least as much inclined to receive them well as the American. Mr. Washington Irving is one of our best favourites among the English writers of this age, and he is not a bit the less so for having been born in America."—Blackw. Mag., vii 361, July, 1820, (by J. G. Lockhart.)

We have already quoted Lockhart's opinion of The Sketch Book on a preceding page, q. v. See also Christopher North's Noctes Ambrosianæ, July, 1822, and May, 1823.

"Of the merit of his Knickerbocker and New York Stories we cannot pretend to judge. But in his Sketch-Book and Bracebridge Hall he gives us very good American copies of our British Essayists and Novelists which may be very well on the other side of the water, or as proofs of the capabilities of the national genius, but which might be dispensed with here, where we have to boast of the originals. Not only Mr. Irving's language is with great taste and felicity modelled on that of Addison, Goldsmith, Sterne, or Mackenzie, but the thoughts and sentiments are taken at the rebound, and, as they are brought forward at the present period, want both freshness and probability. Mr Irving's writings are literary anachronisms. He comes to England for the first [the second] time; and, being on the spot, fancies himself in the midst of those characters and manners which he had read of in The Spectator and other approved authors, and which were the only idea he had hitherto formed of the parent-country. Instead of looking round to see what we are, he sets to work to describe us as we were, at second-hand."—Hazlitt's Spirit of the Age.

As this charge—of literary anachronism—has often been urged against some of the graphic scenes depicted in The Sketch-Book and Bracebridge Hall, it is only just to allow the author to be heard in his own defence:

"At the time of the first publication of this paper, [The Christmas Dinner, in The Sketch-Book,] the picture of an old-fashioned Christmas in the country was pronounced by some as out of date. The author had afterwards an opportunity of witnessing almost all the customs above described, existing in unexpected vigour in the skirts of Derbyshire and Yorkshire, where he passed the Christmas holidays. The reader will find some account of them in the author's account of his sojourn in Newstead Abbey."—Note to revised edit. of The Sketch-Book, New York, 1848. p. 298.

We lack space to quote Mr. Irving's description of the primitive customs which he found in full and honoured observance in different parts of England,—customs which, as he remarks,

"Have only been pronounced obsolete by those who draw their experience merely from city life. . . . It has been deemed that some of the anecdotes of holiday customs given in my preceding writings related to usages which have entirely passed away. Critics who reside in cities have little idea of the primitive manners and observances which still prevail in remote and rural neighbourhoods."—Crayon Miscellany: Newstead Abbey, N. York, 1848, 298.

Mr. Irving's comments are fully endorsed by an eminent English authority:

"The accuracy of his pictures of old English customs and sports, which he represents as flourishing under the influence of the benevolent squire, has been questioned, we know, by suburban readers: in our opinion, and according to our experience, there is nothing too highly coloured in them. [The writer then proceeds to prove his position.] We think, therefore, that, far from exceeding the limits of probability in this respect, Mr. Irving has hardly made the full use of northern customs which was really open to him. Nor can we see any thing overdrawn in the characters themselves."—Lon. Quar. Rev., xxxi. 476, 477, March. 1825.

The Dublin University Mag. remarks, in the same strain:

"Bracebridge Hall is the only account we have which gives any thing like a true picture of the life of an English country gentleman of our own day."—May. 1835, 554.

Other reviews of The Sketch-Book appeared in the Lon. Quar. Rev., xxv. 50; Lon. Month. Rev., xciii. 198; Edin. Month. Rev., iv. 303. In our life of Lord Byron, p. 322 of this Dictionary, will be found an interesting account of the enthusiastic admiration expressed by his lordship of The Sketch-Book and its author.

Before we leave our subject, we must not forget to copy an entry in Moore's Diary, in which the success of The Sketch-Book at its first appearance is referred to:

"Dined with McKay at the table-d'hote, at Meurice's, for the purpose of being made known to Mr. Washington Irving, the author of the work which has lately had success, The Sketch-Book; a good-looking and intelligent-mannered man."—Paris, Dec. 21, 1820.

4. BRACEBRIDGE HALL; OR, THE HUMOURISTS, 1822:

"The great charm and peculiarity of his work consists now, as on former occasions, in the singular sweetness of the composition, and the mildness of the sentiments,—sickled over perhaps a little, now and then, with that cloying heaviness into which unvaried sweetness is so apt to subside. The rhythm and melody of the sentences is certainly excessive: as it not only gives an air of mannerism, but raises too strong an impression of the labour that must have been bestowed, and the importance which must have been attached to that which is, after all, but a secondary attribute to good writing. It is very ill-natured in us, however, to object to what has given us so much pleasure; for we happen to be very intense and sensitive admirers of those soft harmonies of studied speech in which this author is apt to indulge himself: and have caught ourselves, oftener than we shall confess, neglecting his excellent matter, to lap ourselves in the liquid music of his periods, and letting ourselves float passively down the mellow falls and windings of his soft-flowing sentences, with a delight not inferior to that which we derive from fine versification."—LORD JEFFREY: Edin. Rev., xxxvii. 338-339. Nov. 1822.

"We have no hesitation in pronouncing Bracebridge Hall quite equal to any thing which the present age of English literature has produced in this department. In saying this, we class it in the branch of essay-writing. . . . Besides the episodical tales, he has given us admirable sketches of life and manners, highly curious in themselves, and rendered almost important by the good-natured mock gravity, the ironical reverence, and lively wit, with which they are described. We can scarce express the delight with which we turn to the definite images such a work excites, from the vagueness and generality of ordinary story-writing, where personages without prototypes in any society on earth speak a language learned out of books, without a trait of nature, life, or truth."—EDWARD EVERETT: N. Amer. Rev., xv. 209. 223-224. July, 1822.

"Bracebridge Hall certainly does not possess the spirit of The Sketch-Book."—Blackw. Mag. xi 688. June. 1822.

"STOUT GENTLEMAN—very good, and a pretty fair account of a real occurrence. [see Note at bottom of the page;] STUDENT OF SALAMANCA—beneath contempt. Irving has no idea of genuine romance, or love, or any thing else, we believe, that ever seriously troubles the blood of men: ROOKERY—struck off in a few hours: contrary to what has been said, Irving does not labour as people suppose—he is too indolent—given too much, we know, to revery: DOLPH HEYLIGER; THE HAUNTED HOUSE; STORM SHIP—all in the fashion of his early time: perhaps—we are greatly inclined to believe—perhaps the remains of what was meant for Salmagundi or Knickerbocker: the rest of the two volumes quite unworthy of Irving's reputation." — JOHN NEAL: Blackw. Mag., xvii. 66, January, 1825.

"In spite, however, of the pleasure which Bracebridge Hall has afforded us, we can see nothing in it which might not have been compressed into the space of one volume. The make-weights (for we can give them no other name) which are thrown in to round off the work more properly belong to Mr. Irving's recent publication, the Tales of a Traveller: in fact they are, for the most part, told by the same imaginary narrators, and we shall, therefore, consider them under the same head."—Lon. Quar. Rev., xxxi. 481-482, March, 1825.

See also Moore's Diary, March 19, 1821.

5. TALES OF A TRAVELLER, 1824.

"I have been miserably disappointed in the Tales of a Traveller." In this strain commences Timothy Tickler's review of the Tales, and he proceeds to abuse them terribly: the more so, he intimates, from the fact that "Few people have admired Mr. Irving more than myself. few have praised him more, and certainly few wish him and his career better than I do at this moment."—Blackw. Mag., xvi. 296, 297, Sept. 1824.

In the same periodical (xvii. 66-67, American Writers, No. 4, by John Neal) the Tales are quite as severely handled, but the critic dismisses the author with many civil words and a hearty benediction:

"You—Geoffrey Crayon—have great power,—original power. We rejoice in your failure now, because we believe that it will drive you into a style of original composition, far more worthy of yourself. Go to work. Lose no time. Your foundations will be the stronger for this uproar. You cannot write a novel, a poem, a true tale, or a tragedy. You can write another SKETCH-BOOK worth all that you have ever written, if you will draw out from yourself. You have some qualities that no other living writer has,—a bold, quiet humour, a rich, beautiful mode of painting without caricature, a delightful, free, happy spirit: make use of them. We look to see you all the better for this trouncing. God bless you! Farewell."

The reviewer in the London Quarterly (vol. xxxi. 481-487, March, 1825) finds hardly any thing to commend in the Tales of a Traveller, save the autobiography of Buckthorne:

"It is with great pleasure that we turn from productions which Mr Irving honestly confesses to be the sweepings of his Scrap-book, to the tale of Buckthorne, whose adventures, together with those of his friends, occupy the second division of the tales. In this instance, finding the contents of the said Scrap-book run short, he has been driven to tax his own invention in good earnest, and the result is excellent. From the evidence of this tale, which abounds in point and incident, it seems probable to us that he might as a novelist prove no contemptible rival to Goldsmith, whose turn of mind he very much inherits, and of whose style he particularly reminds us in the life of Dribble. Like him, too, Mr. Irving possesses the art of setting ludicrous perplexities in the most irresistible point of view, and we think equals him in the variety, if not in the force, of his humour. . . . After the evidence of Mr. Irving's powers afforded by the last-quoted passage, he must in future be true to his own reputation throughout, and correct the habits of indolence which so considerable a part of the Tales of a Traveller evince. The indulgence which he so fairly deserved at his outset, as an ingenious stranger intuitively proficient in the style and ideas of the mother-country, must now cease, and he must be considered in future as not only admitted to the full freedom and privileges of the English guild of authorship, but amenable also at the same time as an experienced craftsman, to its most vigorous statutes. We may congratulate him on the rank which he has already gained, of which the momentary caprice of the public cannot long deprive him; and with hearty good will, playfully, but we hope not profanely, we exclaim, as we part with him, 'Very pleasant hast thou been to me, my brother Jonathan.'"—Lon. Quar. Rev., xxxi. 483-484. 486-487.

But perhaps the most severe of all the reviews of the Tales of a Traveller appeared in the Westminster Review, (ii. 334,) then in the first blossom of its youth. Geoffrey Crayon's courteous notices of the English nobility, and his equally creditable disgust at the sanguinary horrors of the French Revolution, excited the ire of the democratic critic to an uncontrollable pitch. Even the author's admiring friend, Tom Moore, seems to have had but little hope for the success of the Tales:

"Irving and I set out for the cottage between ten and eleven. Took Irving after dinner to show him to the Starkeys, but he was sleepy, and did not open his mouth: the same at Kiwyn's dinner. Not strong as a lion, but delightful as a domestic animal. Walked him over this morning to call on Lord Lansdowne, (come down in consequence of Lord King's illness,) who walked part of the way back with us. Read me some parts of his new work, Tales of a Traveller. Rather tremble for its fate. Murray has given him 1500*l.* for it; might have had, I think, 2000*l.*"—June 17, 1824.

6. THE LIFE AND VOYAGES OF CHRISTOPHER COLUMBUS, 1828:

> "Venient annis
> Sæcula seris, quibus, Oceanus
> Vincula rerum laxet, et ingens
> Pateat tellus, Typhisque novos
> Detegat Orbes, nec sit terris
> Ultima Thule."—SENECA: Medea.

"The author, having resided for some years past in Madrid, and enjoyed access to the archives of the Spanish Government, as well as to many private libraries, has been enabled to weave into this Work many curious facts, hitherto unknown, concerning the History of Columbus."

The existence of a new world beyond the Atlantic was firmly believed by many of the ancients, as is abundantly proved by numerous passages in the classics:

"None of the intimations [remarks Mr. Prescott] are so precise as that contained in the well-known lines of Seneca's Medea:

> 'Venient annis sæcula,' &c.

Although, when regarded as a mere poetical vagary, it has not the weight which belongs to more serious suggestions of similar import, in the writings of Aristotle and Strabo. The various allusions in the ancient classic writers to an undiscovered world form the subject of an elaborate essay in the Memorias da Acad. Real das Sciençaş de Lisboa, (tom. v. pp. 101-112,) and are embodied, in much greater detail, in the first section of Humboldt's Histoire de la Géographie du Nouveau Continent: a work in which the author, with his usual acuteness, has successfully applied the vast stores of his erudition and experience to the illustration of many interesting points connected with the discovery of the New World and the personal history of Columbus."—Hist. of the Reign of Ferd. and Isabella, 11th ed., Bost., 1856, ii. 116-117, n.

Mr. Prescott remarks in the text:

"A proof of this popular belief occurs in a curious passage of the Morgante Maggiore of the Florentine poet Pulci, a man of letters, but not distinguished for scientific attainments beyond his day. The passage is remarkable, independently of the cosmographical knowledge it implies, for its allusion to phenomena in physical science not established till more than a century later.

The devil, alluding to the vulgar supposition respecting the Pillars of Hercules, thus addresses his companion Rinaldo:

"'Know that this theory is false: his bark
The daring mariner shall urge far o'er
The western wave, a smooth and level plain,
Albeit the earth is fashioned like a wheel.
Man was in ancient days of grosser mould,
And Hercules might blush to learn how far
Beyond the limits he had vainly set
The dullest sea-boat soon shall wing her way.
Men shall descry another hemisphere,
Since to one common centre all things tend;
So earth, by curious mystery divine,
Well balanced, hangs amid the starry spheres.
At our Antipodes are cities, states,
And thronged empires, ne'er divined of yore.
But see, the Sun speeds on his western path
To glad the nations with expected light.'

PULCI: Morgante Maggiore, canto 25, st. 229, 230."

"I have used blank verse," proceeds Mr Prescott, "in a note, as affording facility for a more literal version than the corresponding ottava rima of the original. This passage of Pulci, which has not fallen under the notice of Humboldt, or any other writer on the same subject whom I have consulted, affords probably the most circumstantial prediction that is to be found of the existence of a western world. Dante two centuries before, had intimated more vaguely his belief in an undiscovered quarter of the globe.

'De' vostri sensi ch' è del rimanente,
Non vogliate negar l'esperienza,
Diretro al sol, del mondo senza gente.'

Inferno, cant. 26, v. 115."—Hist supra, 117-118, 118, n.

We happen to have lying on our table a notice of a work which should not be neglected by the collector of American History, (a large class among our friends in Boston and New York,) and which we observe has not escaped the researches of Mr. Irving (Hist. of Columbus) or of Mr. Prescott, (Hist. of Ferdinand and Isabella.) It is entitled Raccolta del Documento Originale e mediti spettante a Cristoforo Colombo alla Scoperta ed al Governo dell'America, Genoa, 1823, 4to. An invaluable collection of authentic remains, letters, memorials, &c. of the great navigator, with a learned introduction by Prof. Spotorno.

An English trans. of this work was issued in the same year (1 vol. 8vo, pp. 159 and 255) in London. A notice of this collection will be found in Rich's Bibl. Amer. Nova, ii. 152, 155; N. Amer. Rev., xviii. 415-417, April, 1824, (by Jared Sparks;) Ibid., xxi. 398-429, Oct. 1825. The Coleccion de los Viages y Descubrimientos de Don Martin Fernandez de Navarrete, Madrid, 1825, 2 vols. 4to, (3d vol., 1829, 4to,) to which we have already referred, will of course be found in the American department of the collector's Library. Those who are still ignorant of the value of this treasury, and the eminent services of its erudite compiler to the important cause of historical research, must consult Prescott's Mexico, 23d ed., 1855, Pref., vi.-vii.; his Ferd. and Isabella, 11th ed., 1856, Pref., v., and vol. ii., 133-134, 307, n.; his Peru, ed. 1855, Pref., vi.-vii., vol. ii., 76; Irving's Columbus and his Companions, ed. 1848, i., Pref., 13-18, iii., Introduc, xv. See also a review of Navarrete's Coleccion,—written by Caleb Cushing, of Massachusetts, a ripe scholar,—in the N. Amer. Rev., xxiv. 265-294, April, 1827.

"His great work, Coleccion de los Viages y Descubrimientos," remarks Mr Prescott, "although far from being completed after the original plan of its author, is of inestimable service to the historian."—Peru, Pref., vii.

Perhaps we have already lingered sufficiently long on the threshold of our subject,—the citation of opinions respecting Irving's History of Columbus; but we must not pass on without commending to our reader a notice in the N. Amer. Rev., xliii. 43-52, July, 1836, (by J. L. Kingsley,) of the Italian Jesuit Ubertino Carrara's Latin epic on the Discovery of America, entitled Columbus, first pub. 1715, at Rome. The poet thus announces his subject:

"Primus ab Europâ, Solis qui visit iter unum,
Perque prophanatum vetiti mare, maxima regna
Regibus Hispanis, orbemque adjecit orbi,
Sit mihi materies operis."—Lib. I. 1.

We recently cut the following notice from some paper of the day:

"Chart of Columbus.—An old picture-dealer has lately sold to the Spanish Government, for 4000 fr., the chart which the pilot of Columbus, Juan de la Cosa, used in his voyage to the New World. It was formerly in one of the public libraries of Spain; and, when the galleries and churches of that country were ravaged by Marshal Soult, it fell into his hands, with The Conception, by Murillo, and various other spoils."

In the adduction of opinions respecting the manner in which Mr. Irving has acquitted himself in the responsible office of the biographer of the Great Admiral, with whom can we so properly begin as with that eminent scholar to whose researches Mr. Irving and the world at large are so much indebted for all that we know of the illustrious Genoese? And here we are greatly pleased in being able to quote in evidence the most unqualified commendation of Mr. Irving's labours, which eulogy we are the more rejoiced to find from the certainty that if the opinion made us much against, as it fortunately does for, the historian's reputation, it would not be withheld from our readers. Our duty is neither to bury Cæsars nor to praise them, but rather to faithfully chronicle the recorded decisions of the great judges of literary jurisprudence. M. Navarrete may well be supposed to have entertained a natural anxiety that the copious collections for the illustration of the Life of Columbus which he had brought together, at the price of so many days and nights of persevering industry and careful research, should be faithfully made known to those who could only enjoy them in an English dress. Indeed, as we have seen in a preceding page, nothing more was originally contemplated by Mr. Everett than a translation by Irving of Navarrete's Collection. But, fortunately for the cause of letters, Mr. Irving determined upon a more comprehensive undertaking:

"On considering the matter more maturely," he remarks, "I perceived that, although there were many books, in various languages, relative to Columbus, they all contained limited and incomplete accounts of his life and voyages; while numerous valuable tracts on the subject existed only in manuscript or in the form of letters, journals, and public monuments. It appeared to me that a history faithfully digested from these various materials was a desideratum in literature, and would be a more satisfactory occupation to myself, and a more acceptable work to my country, than the translation I had contemplated."—Madrid, 1827; Pref. to 1st edit. Life of Columbus.

The work was completed, and this decisive seal to its excellence was impressed by the learned Navarrete himself:

Yo me complazco en que los documentos y noticias que publiqué en mi coleccion sobre los primeros acontecimientos de la historia de América hayan recaido en manos tan hábiles para apreciar su autenticidad, para examinarlas con crítica, y propagarlas por todas partes, echando los fundamentos de la verdad que hasta ahora ha sido tan adulterada por los escritores parciales ó sistemáticos."—From a letter dated Madrid, April 1, 1831.

The same distinguished authority, in the Introduction to the 3d vol. of his Collection of Spanish Voyages, after adducing a number of testimonials to the usefulness of the two first vols., (1825, 4to,) remarks:

"Insigne prueba de esto mismo acaba de darnos el Señor Washington Irving en la Historia de la Vida y de los Viages de Cristóbal Colon que ha publicado con una aceptacion tan general como bien merecida. Dijimos en nuestra Introduccion (1, 255, pag. lxxxii.) que no nos proponiamos escribir la historia de aquel almirante, sino publicar noticias y materiales para que se escribiese con verdad y con una fortuna que el primero que se haya aprovechado de ellas sea un literato juicioso y erudito, conocido ya en su patria y en Europa por otras obras apreciables. Colocado en Madrid, exento de las rivalidades que han dominado entre algunas naciones Europeas sobre Colon y sus descubrimientos, con la proporcion de examinar excelentes libros y preciosos manuscritos, de tratar á personas instruidas en estas materias y tomando siempre á la mano los autores documentos que acabamos de publicar, ha logrado dar á su historia aquella extension, imparcialidad, y exactitud que la hacen muy superior á las de los escritores que le precedieron. Agrégase á esto, su método, arreglo, y conveniente distribucion; su estilo animado puro, y elegante, la noticia de varias personages que intervinieron en los sucesos de Colon, y el examen de varias cuestiones en que hace siempre la mas sana crítica la erudicion y buen gusto." —Prologo al tomo III., Madrid 1829, 4to.

It is proper that we should next quote the verdict of Mr Alexander H. Everett,—so intimately connected with the inception of this great enterprise,—one of the ripest scholars that America has yet produced, and a critic of too much candour to permit his own interest in the work or his friendship for the author to either influence his judgment or qualify its expression:

This is one of those works which are at the same time the delight of readers and the despair of critics. It is as nearly perfect as any work well can be, and there is therefore little or nothing left for the reviewer but to write at the bottom of every page, as Voltaire said he should be obliged to do if he published a commentary on Racine, Pulchre! bene! optimè! . . He has at length filled up the void that before existed, in this respect, in the literature of the world and produced a work which will fully satisfy the public and supersede the necessity of any future labours in the same field. While we venture to predict that the adventures of Columbus will hereafter be read only in the work of Mr. Irving, . . we not but think it a beautiful coincidence that the task . . . celebrating the achievements of the discoverer of our continent should have been reserved for one of its inhabitants, and that the earliest professed author of first-rate talent who appeared among us should have devoted one of his most important and finished works to this pious purpose.

'Such honors Ilion to her hero paid,
And peaceful slept the mighty Hector's shade.'

For the particular kind of historical writing to which Mr. Irving is fitted to aspire and excel, the Life of Columbus is undoubtedly one of the very best—perhaps we might say, without the fear of mistake, the very best—subject afforded by the annals of the world. . . . In treating this happy and splendid subject, Mr. Irving has brought out the full force of his genius, as far as a just regard for the principles of historical writing would admit."—N. Amer. Rev., xxviii. 103, 128, 129, Jan. 1829.

The verdict of the brilliant historian of the Reign of Ferdinand and Isabella—who has so greatly distinguished himself by his researches in the same field of historical investigation as that in which Mr. Irving gleaned so abundant a harvest—must have been awaited by the latter with no little anxiety. In a notice of the publication of the Coleccion of Señor Navarrete, to which we have frequently referred, Mr. Prescott remarks:

"Fortunately, Mr. Irving's visit to Spain at this period enabled the world to derive the full benefit of Señor Navarrete's researches, by presenting their results in connexion with whatever had been before known of Columbus, in the lucid and attractive form which engages the interest of every reader. It would seem highly proper that the fortunes of the discoverer of America should engage the pen of an inhabitant of her most favoured and enlightened region; and it is unnecessary to add, that the task has been executed in a manner which must secure to the historian a share in the imperishable renown of his subject."—Ferd. and Isabella, 11th ed. 1856, ii. 133.

"It is not necessary to pursue the track of the illustrious voyager whose career, forming the most brilliant episode to the history of the present reign, has been so recently traced by a hand which few will care to follow."—Ibid., ii. 465–466. See also 482–483, n.

"The noblest monument to the memory of Columbus."—Ibid., ii. 509.

"I will only remark, in conclusion of this too prolix discussion about myself, that, while making my tortoise-like progress, I saw what I had fondly looked upon as my own ground (having indeed lain unmolested by any other invader for so many ages) suddenly entered, and in part occupied, by one of my countrymen. I allude to Mr. Irving's History of Columbus and Chronicle of Granada; the subjects of which, although covering but a small part of my whole plan, form certainly two of its most brilliant portions. Now, alas! if not devoid of interest, they are at least stripped of the charm of novelty. For what eye has not been attracted to the spot on which the light of that writer's genius has fallen?"—Ibid., i., Pref., xi.–xii.

In his Preface to the History of the Conquest of Mexico, Mr. Prescott, referring to the passage just quoted, notices it as a "singular chance," that, after collecting the materials for his last-named work, he found himself "unconsciously taking up ground which Mr. Irving was preparing to occupy." But we have already noticed this fact in our Life of CHARLES JAMES FOX, p. 624 of this Dictionary, to which the reader is referred. We had intended to quote other comments of Mr. Prescott's upon Irving's History of Columbus, but, as our article already lengthens beyond our intended limits, we must be content to refer the reader to the Preface to Mexico, ix., x.; Ibid., iii. 252, n.; Prescott's review of Irving's Chronicle of the Conquest of Granada, in N. Amer. Rev., xxix. 293–314, Oct. 1829. See also W. H. Gardiner's review of Prescott's Ferd. and Isabella, in N. Amer. Rev., xlvi. 203–291, Jan. 1838,—Prescott and Irving Compared, &c.

We proceed with our quotations; but they must be brief:

This is on the whole an excellent book; and we venture to anticipate that it will be an enduring one. Neither do we hazard this prediction lightly, or without a full consciousness of all it implies. . . . For we mean, not merely that the book will be familiarly known and referred to some twenty or thirty years hence, and will pass in solid binding into every considerable collection; but that it will supersede all former works on the same subject, and never be itself superseded."—LORD JEFFREY: Edin. Rev., xlviii. 1–32, Sept. 1828.

"When he writes the history of Columbus, you see him weighing doubtful facts in the scales of a golden criticism. You behold him laden with the manuscript treasures of well searched archives, and disposing the heterogeneous materials into a well digested and instructive narration."—EDWARD EVERETT: N. Amer. Rev., xli. b, July, 1835.

"This work is written with the attractions of style and taste, and glowing description, which belong to the inspiration of the theme, and to the genius of the distinguished author."—CHANCELLOR KENT.

"A life of Columbus authentic, clear, and animated in narration, graphic in its descriptive episodes, and sustained and finished in style. It is a permanent contribution to English as well as American literature; one which was greatly needed and most appropriately supplied."—HENRY T. TUCKERMAN: Sketch of Amer. Lit.

"Since I have been here, I have contrived (by reading a half-hour in the night and a half-hour in the morning) to peruse the whole of Irving's Life of Columbus, in three volumes. It is quite an interesting work, though I think too much spread out by repetition of the same thoughts and descriptions. It is in all respects, however, reputable to the literature of our country."—JUDGE STORY: Letter to Wm. W. Story, Washington, Feb. 21, 1836.

Judge Story's comment reminds us of a similar one recorded by Tom Moore, and Cooper's ready retort:

"When Rogers, in talking of Washington Irving's Columbus, said, in his dry, significant way, 'It's rather long.' Cooper turned round on him, and said, sharply, 'That's a short criticism.'"—Moore's Diary, May 27, 1828.

"Davison mentioned the enormous price given by Murray for Irving's two last works; 3000 guineas for Columbus, and 2000*l.* for the Chronicles of Granada: the latter never likely, he said, to sell at all."—Ibid., July 16, 1829.

"It is true that for Murray (according to his own account) they have not been so fortunate; his loss on the two publications being (as he says) near 3000*l.*, which may not be far from the truth, as the Chronicles have not sold at all."—Ibid., Nov. 12, 1829.

"By the accession of his volumes, we have now the biography of Columbus; as by Robertson's [History of America] we before had, and still have, the history. Mr. Irving's has been to me a very interesting production, sometimes marked with passages of great force and beauty; and it contains every thing respecting Columbus that can be wanted. He has had valuable sources of information, which he describes, and which were not within the reach of Robertson. Still, his volumes only show, as usual, the merits of Robertson. Upon looking over the historian's account once more, I see no mistakes, and no material omissions: in a concise and calm manner every particular of importance is intimated to the reader; and Mr. Irving has only told in the detail (but in a very interesting and agreeable manner, and I recommend his volumes to you) what our excellent historian had told before."—Prof. Smyth's Lects. on Mod. Hist.

There is another comparison between Robertson and Irving which it occurs to us to quote. It is one drawn by Lord Brougham in his Life of Dr. Robertson, and elicited by the account of the latter, in his History of America, of the first discovery of land by Columbus:

If the "tone dramatic," remarks his lordship, "has been applied to this narrative, it has been advisedly chosen; because no one can doubt that with the most scrupulous regard to the truth, and even to the minute accuracy of his history, this composition has all the beauties of a striking poem. To judge of its merits in this respect, I will not compare or rather contrast it with the Histories of Oviedo or Herrera, or Ferdinand Columbus, or even with the far better composition of Dr. Campbell, or whoever wrote the history of the discovery in Harris's Bibliotheca Itinerarium, nor yet with the ambitious but worse-written narrative of Mr. Washington Irving in his Life and Voyages of Columbus," &c.

The noble critic then proceeds (in a note) to quote examples from both writers:

"It is no part of my intention to underrate the merits of this very popular author: but I speak of the manner in which he has treated the subject; and, coming after so great a master, it was not judicious in him to try for effect, instead of studying the chaste simplicity of his predecessor. These are a few of his expressions: The ships 'were ploughing the waves;' Columbus was 'wrapped in the shades of night;' he 'maintained an intense watch;' he 'ranged his eye along the dusky horizon;' he beheld 'suddenly a glimmering light.' Robertson had never thought of saying 'suddenly,' as knowing that light must of necessity be sudden. Then the light has 'passing gleams;' his feelings 'must have been tumultuous and intense;' contrary to the fact, and to the character of the man; 'the great mystery of the ocean was revealed;' 'what a bewildering crowd of conjectures thronged on his mind!' All this speculation of the writer to insure the effect, Dr. Robertson rejects as fatal to effect, and gives only what actually happened. Finally, he was possibly to find 'the morning dawn upon spicy groves, and glittering fanes, and gilded cities.' Surely no one can hesitate which of the two pictures to prefer. If the one is not absolutely tawdry, the other is assuredly more chaste. To compare the two pieces of workmanship is a good lesson, and may tend to cure a vitiated taste. (Book iii. Chap. 3.) To take only one instance: 'About two hours before midnight, Columbus, standing on the forecastle, observed a light at a distance, and privately pointed it out to Pedro,' &c. Thus Robertson. Irving says, 'Wrapped from observation in the shades of night, he maintained an intense and unremitting watch, ranging his eye along the dusky horizon. Suddenly, about ten o'clock, he thought he beheld a light glimmering at a distance.' Can any one doubt which of the two passages is the most striking,—the chaste and severe, or the ornamented and gaudy and meretricious? The account of Robertson makes the ships lie-to all night. Irving either makes them lie-to, and afterwards go on sailing rapidly; or the lying to was the night before, and they sailed quicker the nearer they came to land and in the dusk. The one makes them only see the shore after dawn; the other makes them see it two leagues off, in a dark night, at two in the morning, within the tropics."—Lives of Men of Letters of the Time of George III., Lon. and Glasg., 1855, 265, 265–266, n. 7. CHRONICLE OF THE CONQUEST OF GRANADA, FROM THE MSS. OF FRAY ANTONIO AGAPIDA, 1829.

Perhaps we need hardly inform our readers that the worthy chronicler Fray is an imaginary personage.

"Mr. Irving's late publication, the Chronicle of the Conquest of Granada, has superseded all further necessity for poetry, and, unfortunately for me, for history. He has fully availed himself of all the picturesque and animating movements of this romantic era; and the reader who will take the trouble to compare his Chronicle with the present more prosaic and literal narrative [War of Granada, in Ferd. and Isabella] will see how little he has been seduced from historic accuracy by the poetical aspect of his subject. The fictitious and romantic dress of his work has enabled him to make it the medium for reflecting more vividly the floating opinions and chimerical fancies of the age, while he has illuminated the picture with the dramatic brilliancy of colouring denied to sober history."—Prescott's Ferd. and Isabella, 11th ed., 1856, ii. 109, n.

And see Mr. Prescott's review of the Chronicle, in N. Amer. Rev., xxix. 293–314; also in his Miscellanies, 1855, 88–122.

"A few works recently published in the United States have shed far more light [than Robertson's Charles V. and Watson's Philip II.] on the interior organization and intellectual culture of the Spanish nation. Such, for example, are the writings of Irving, whose gorgeous colouring reflects so clearly the chivalrous spirit dours of the fifteenth century."—Ibid., Miscell., 128–126, q. v.; (from N. Amer. Rev., July, 1837.)

Since Mr. Prescott's commendation was penned, the Chronicle has been brought more strictly within historical bounds, and in other respects also greatly improved.

"His Chronicle, at times, wears almost the air of romance; yet the story is authenticated by frequent references to existing documents, proving that he has substantial foundation for his most extraordinary incidents."—Lon. Quar. Rev., xliii. 55–89.

This article, explanatory of the work, and carefully avoiding commendation, was written for the Quarterly by Mr. Irving, at the request of Mr. John Murray. See also Lon. Month. Rev., cxix. 430; Amer. Month. Rev., v. 190; Lon. Lit. Gaz., 1829, 329.

9. The Alhambra, 1832.

"On the whole, we consider the work before us as equal in literary value to any of the others of the same class, with the exception of The Sketch-Book; and we should not be surprised if it were read as extensively as even that very popular production. We hope to have it in our power, at no remote period, to announce a continuation of the series which we are satisfied will bear, in the booksellers' phrase, several more volumes."—Edward Everett: N. Amer. Rev. xxxv. 265–282. Oct. 1832.

A very suggestive remark occurs in the course of this review, which we quote with the hope that it will bring forth fruit in its season:

"The period of the Moorish ascendency is, perhaps, the most interesting in the annals of Spain, and would furnish a fit subject for a more methodical, extensive, and elaborate historical description than has yet been given of it in any language."

Since the above was written, Mr. Prescott, indeed, has given us his truly great work on the Reign of Ferdinand and Isabella, in which we have a graphic account of the decadence—or, more properly speaking, the extirpation—of the Moorish power in Spain: and he has not neglected eloquently to dilate upon the ancient glories of Cordova, Seville, and Granada in their best estate, but it did not enter into his plan to discuss this comprehensive theme in the extent which alone do it justice. With the vast collections which he has already made, the profound knowledge of the subject which the digestion of those materials has conferred, and the eloquence and force of his historic pen, what better subject can Mr. Prescott have than the one we have ventured to suggest? But, before we entirely forget Mr. Irving in this episode, we must remember to notice that, whilst Mr. Everett ranks The Alhambra below The Sketch-Book, Mr. Prescott very happily refers to the volume as the "beautiful Spanish Sketch-book, The Alhambra." See Ferd. and Isabella, 11th ed., 1856. ii. 100, n. See other reviews of The Alhambra, in the Westminster Rev., xvii. 132: Lon. Athen., 1832, 283; Amer. Month. Rev., ii. 117. We must commend to the attention of those fond of the remains of Moorish antiquity, the splendid publication of Owen Jones, 1842–45, 2 vols. fol. columbia, £24, or in grand eagle fol., £36, entitled Illustrations of the Palace of the Alhambra.

Doubtless the reader of Mr. Irving's thrilling account of his midnight explorations of the Alhambra has often asked himself, "How much of this is sober matter of fact, and how much poetical license?" We are fortunately enabled to answer this question from a letter of Mr. Irving to the author of this Dictionary:

"The account of my midnight rambles about the old palace is literally true, yet gives but a feeble idea of my feelings and impressions and of the singular haunts I was exploring. Every thing in the work relating to myself and to the actual inhabitants of the Alhambra is unexaggerated fact: it was only in the legends that I indulged in romancing; and these were founded on materials picked up about the place.

10. A Tour on the Prairies, 1835.

"To what class of compositions the present work belongs we are hardly able to say. It can scarcely be called a book of travels, for there is too much painting of manners and scenery, and too little statistics; it is not a novel, for there is no story; and it is not a romance, for it is all true. It is a sort of sentimental journey, a romantic excursion, in which nearly all the elements of several different kinds of writing are beautifully and gaily blended into a production almost sui generis. . . . We are not sure that the passage in the book which we have read with greatest satisfaction is not that in which we are promised its continuation."—Edward Everett: N. Amer. Rev., xli. 1–28. July. 1835.

"The whole work bears the impress of Mr. Irving's taste. A great variety of somewhat discordant materials is brought into a consistent whole, of which the parts have a due reference to each other; and some sketches of life and traits of humour come fresh from the pen of Geoffrey Crayon."—Edward Everett: N. Amer. Rev., xliv. 200–237, Jan. 1837.

"I have read Astoria with great pleasure: it is a book to put in your library, as an entertaining, well-written—very well-written—account of savage life, on a most extensive scale. Ellice, who has just come from America, says Mr. Astor is worth £5,000,000 sterling; but Baring does not believe it, or is jealous perhaps."—Rev. Sydney Smith to Sir George Phillips, Combe Foley, Dec. 22, 1836: Smith's Letters and Memoirs, 1855, vol. ii.

"The narrative, though told with the grace of the writer, is necessarily dry."—Blackw. Mag., xli 169, Feb. 1837, q. v.

We must not omit to quote the following well-merited tribute to a gentleman who, by his extensive circulation of sound literature for many years both in Europe and America, has honestly earned the title of a benefactor to the public mind. We refer to Mr. Irving's friend and publisher, Mr. George P. Putnam, of New York:

"We notice Astoria and the Tour on the Prairies now, only on account of their connection with our subject, and to commend the taste and enterprise of the publisher who has given to the reading world what has long been wanted,—a neat and uniform edition of all the writings of Mr Irving, at a price which ought to obtain for them a wide circulation. These two works, which have all the pleasing characteristics of the author's style, appear very seasonably in a new edition."—Prof. Frances Bowen: Adventures on the Prairies, in N. Amer. Rev., lxix. 175–190. July, 1849.

We have not the slightest interest in the gains or losses of Mr. Putnam's copy rights, but we have much in the moral and intellectual cultivation of the mind and heart of our countrymen and countrywomen, and therefore, as Lord Chesterfield said of the witty scintillations of the Dean of St. Patrick's, "He that hath any books in the three kingdoms hath those of Swift," so say we, He that hath any books in this great republic should have those of Irving. As for those who have no books,—if any such there be,—in that household you may look for ennui, mental and physical languor, gossiping, dissipation, and "every evil work." As Sancho Panza conferred his hearty benediction upon the philanthropic inventor of sleep, so do we cordially revere the character of the literary Howard who founded the first family library. Of Sancho's favourite recreation he could only say, in the height of his somniferous paean, that it "covered a man like a mantle;" but of good books we can testify that they nurture the soul with the food of angels.

But "to proceed with our subject," as the divines say, which has "naturally divided itself" into a hydra-headed discourse: other reviews of Astoria will be found in the Westminster Rev., xxvi. 318; Amer. Quar. Rev., xxi. 60; South. Lit. Mess., ii. 59. See also Franchère's Narrative of a Voyage to the Northwest Coast of America, in 1811–14, translated into English by J. V. Huntingdon, N. 15. Wolfert's Roost, 1855, 12mo. This vol. forms No. 4 of Constable's Miscellany of Foreign Literature, pub. at Edinburgh. The publication of this vol. elicited so many complimentary notices, that the New York publishers, Messrs. Geo. P. Putnam & Co., issued a collection of them in pamphlet form of 24 pages. This little brochure should accompany every set of Irving's works. We give an extract from a notice which has escaped the vigilance of the publisher:

"We envy those who will now read these tales and sketches of character for the first time. Washington Irving is here, as he always is, equal to himself. He has the finish of our best writers; he has the equality and gentle humour of Addison and Goldsmith."—Westminster Rev., April 1855.

Another complimentary notice, also not in the pamphlet just referred to, appeared in the Lon. New Monthly Magazine, and was copied into the Boston Living Age for Aug. 11, 1855. From a review of Wolfert's Roost, in the Lon. Athenæum, 1855, 192–193, we have already given an extract in our article on Ralph Waldo Emerson, to which the reader is referred.

16. The Life of George Washington, N. York, vol. i., 1855; vols. ii., iii., 1856; iv., 1857. See ante.

We have before us a number of eulogistic reviews of the early vols. of this as yet unfinished history; but it is obvious that a production of this character must be regarded as a whole, and that no intelligent, impartial criticism can be expected until those among us learned in historic lore shall have had opportunity to sit in judgment upon a completed work, and compare accredited "State-Paper" documents with the biographer's charming story. That such verdict will be a favourable one, Mr. Irving's well-known conscientiousness as a historian forbids us to doubt. In the mean time, there can be no impropriety in our remarking that the biographer has well merited the gratitude of his countrymen for transporting the illustrious commander from the learned austerity of the Senate-Chamber, and the chilling dignity of Congressional Libraries, to the domestic familiarity of the parlour and the winter-evening fireside of the cottage. Reviews of the early vols. of the Life of Washington will be found,—of vol. i., in Westminster Rev., Oct. 1855; vol. iii., Ibid., Oct. 1856; vols. i., ii., iii., Lon. Athenæum, Aug. 16, 1856; i., ii., iii., N. Amer. Rev., July, 1856.

As every thing concerning Washington Irving may be presumed to be interesting to the reader, we quote the following genealogical scrap from Dennistoun's Memoirs of Sir Robert Strange:

"John of Irwyn had landed possessions in the parish of Holm, in Orkney, in 1438, when the county was still an appanage of the crown of Denmark and Norway. The Irvines of Sebay are very frequently mentioned in the times of Robert and Patrick Stewart, Earls of Orkney, and suffered very severely from the outrages of these rapacious nobles. They became extinct in the direct male line temp. Charles I.; but one collateral branch had immediately before settled in the Island of Sunday, and another, the Irvines of Gairstay, in the Island of Shapinshay. They lost the estate of Gairstay several generations back, and sank down into the condition of mere peasants, tenants of Quhome, where some of them reside at this day. I was there lately with Mr. Balfour, the proprietor of Shapinshay, who pointed out the old and modest house at Quhome where was born William Irvine, father of Washington Irving. Is it not somewhat singular that Sir Robert Strange and the author of Bracebridge Hall can be almost demonstrated of the same blood? I guess if Irving knew his pedigree could be traced step by step up to John Erwyn of 1438, he would readily claim and vindicate his Orcadian descent."

We have already referred to Lord Byron's enthusiastic attachment to the writings and character of Irving, (Life of Lord Byron in this Dictionary.) In a letter to Tom Moore, (Ravenna, July 5, 1821,) he remarks:

"I have had a friend of your Mr. Irving's, ... and talked with him much of Irving, whose writings are my delight."

Again, under date of Sept. 24, 1821, he proposes to Murray, as one of the articles of their future correspondence, that he should not send him "any modern, or (as they are called) new, publications, in English, whatsoever, save and excepting any of Walter Scott, Crabbe, ... Irving, (the American,)" &c.

"The names of Cooper, Channing, and Washington Irving," remarks the historian of Modern Europe, "amply demonstrate that the American soil is not wanting in genius of the most elevated and fascinating character."—Sir Archibald Alison: Hist. of Europe, 1789-1815, chap lxxvi.

Mr. Stewart, of the American Navy, a friend of the present Emperor of France, tells us that, when in New York, Louis Napoleon declined to "appear in society," but adds:

"'There are, however,' remarked the prince, 'individuals resident in New York whose acquaintance I should be happy to make. Mr. Washington Irving is one. I have read his works, and admire him both as a writer and a man, and would take great pleasure in meeting him. Chancellor Kent is another. I have studied his Commentaries, think highly of them, and regard him as the first of your jurists. I would be happy to know him personally.'"

"He did make the acquaintance both of Mr. Irving and the Chancellor," continues Mr. Stewart, "and enjoyed the hospitality of the one at Sunnyside, and of the other at his residence in town."—Letter of Rev. C. S. Stewart, N. York, April 4, 1856, to the National Intelligencer.

How many can echo this remark of Napoleon!—"I admire him both as a writer and as a man." It is indeed true, to borrow the words of an eminent American poet,

"Amiableness is so strongly marked in all Mr. Irving's writings as never to let you forget the man; and the pleasure is doubled in the same manner as it is in lively conversation with one for whom you have a deep attachment and esteem. There is in it also the gayety and airiness of a light, pure spirit,—a fanciful playing with common things, and here and there beautiful touches, till the ludicrous becomes half picturesque."—Richard H. Dana, Sr.: N. Amer. Rev., lx. 336, Sept. 1819.

If Mr. Dana were called upon to reaffirm the above, after forty years, and over the large pile of volumes which Mr. Irving has since given to the world, we are satisfied that he would do it without a moment's hesitation.

Many years ago Edward Everett advised the young aspirant after literary distinction,

"If he wishes to study a style which possesses the characteristic beauties of Addison's, its ease, simplicity, and elegance, with greater accuracy, point, and spirit, let him give his days and nights to the volumes of Irving."—N. Amer. Rev., xli. 4, July, 1835.

Young men have followed this advice most sedulously; and, indeed, a number of years before this counsel was penned, Mr. Irving's example had produced wonders:

"The great effect which it has produced is sufficiently evident already, in the number of good writers, in various forms of elegant literature, who have sprung up among us within the few years which have elapsed since the appearance of Mr. Irving, and who justify our preceding remark, that he may fairly be considered as the founder of a school."—Alexander H. Everett: N. Amer. Rev., xxviii. 111, Jan. 1829.

"Heretofore the essays of Washington Irving have offered a solitary specimen of the lighter literature of America, but we can now only regard Geoffrey Crayon as the founder of a class of writers, who follow closely in his footsteps."—Court Journal: Notice of Stories of American Life, edited by Mary Russell Mitford.

These remarks applies to both sides of the water. If an English reviewer desire to pay an especially handsome compliment to an author,—presuming that the case admits of a likeness being instituted at all,—he is very likely to be strongly reminded of the style of the author of The Sketch-Book. Let us cite some instances. The author of the article on George Colman and Bonnel Thornton's Connoisseur, in Chambers's Cyclopedia of English Literature, quotes a passage from an essay on Country Churches, "which," says the critic, "seems like a leaf from the note-book of Washington Irving." The reviewer in the London New Times remarks, of the author of Tales of a Voyager, that his "humour is of the spirit and quality of Washington Irving." The London Gentleman's Magazine says that in the perusal of The Journal of an Exile "we have frequently been reminded of the style and manner of The Sketch Book,—the same pathos, the same originality of thought, the same felicity of expression." The London Monthly Review is so delighted with The Lucubrations of Major Humphrey Ravelin, that it declares that "many of the practised writers must fall into the rear, in competition with Major Ravelin, who must stand master with Geoffrey Crayon." The London Spectator, in a notice of the Autobiography of Hugh Miller, remarks that "his style has a purity and elegance which reminds one of Irving and Goldsmith." One of the most distinguished of American authors is not disposed to think that any of Irving's imitators have equalled their master; at least, this was his opinion at the time he penned the article from which we are about to quote:

"The candour with which the English have recognised Mr. Irving's literary merits is equally honorable to both parties, while his genius has experienced a still more unequivocal homage in the countless imitations to which he has given rise; imitations whose uniform failure, notwithstanding all the appliances of accomplishment and talent, prove their model to be inimitable."—William H. Prescott: N. Amer. Rev., xxxv. 191-192, July, 1832.

It is only proper to remark that Mr. Prescott has no reference, so far as we are aware, to either of the comparisons cited above. They were collected by ourselves, in the course of desultory reading. Washington Irving, indeed, can never be confounded with the host of his imitators, abroad or at home. His literary reputation rests upon sure foundations,—broad, deep, well settled, and immutable. As regards his own country,

"Other writers may no doubt arise in the course of time, who will exhibit in verse or prose a more commanding talent, and soar a still loftier flight in the empyrean sky of glory. Some western Homer, Shakspeare, Milton, Corneille, or Calderon, may irradiate our literary world with a flood of splendour that shall throw all other greatness into the shade. This, or something like it, may or may not happen; but, even if it should, it can never be disputed that the mild and beautiful genius of Mr. Irving was the Morning Star that led up the march of our heavenly host; and that he has a fair right, much fairer certainly than the great Mantuan, to assume the proud device, Primus ego in patriam."—Alexander H. Everett: N. Amer. Rev., xxviii. 110, Jan. 1829.

As respects Mr. Irving's fame abroad, it is certainly true, as Mr. Prescott remarks, that his merits have been—from the first, we will add—warmly acknowledged by British critics and cordially appreciated by British readers.

The circulation of his delightful volumes is by no means confined to the literary circles of the critics:

"To my poor cottage, rich only in printed paper," remarks an accomplished lady, "people all come to borrow books for themselves or for their children. Sometimes they make their own selections; sometimes, much against my will, they leave the choice to me: and in either case I know no books that are oftener lent than those that bear the pseudonym of Geoffrey Crayon. Few, very few, can show a long succession of volumes so pure, so graceful, and so varied as Mr. Irving."—Mary Russell Mitford's Recollections of a Literary Life.

Such a tribute as this must be peculiarly grateful to Mr. Irving. "It is excellent," says Isabella to the haughty duke, "to have a giant's strength;" but there is a rarer and more precious gift. To have the power, by the magic of the inspiration of genius, to elevate the mind and to improve the heart,—to cause the rich to forget their covetousness and the poor their poverty,—to while away the tedious hours of declining age, of bodily pain, or mental disquietude,—this is indeed a gift more excellent than the giant's strength, the victor's laurel, or the conqueror's crown; and this honour has WASHINGTON IRVING,—the author of THE SKETCH-BOOK and THE ALHAMBRA, the biographer of COLUMBUS and of WASHINGTON.

Irving, William, 1766–1821, a native of the city of New York, a brother of Washington Irving, was engaged in mercantile business in the place of his birth for a number of years, and from 1813 to '19 was a member of the National Congress. In 1793 he was married to a sister of James K. Paulding, and assisted him and Washington Irving in the composition of Salmagundi,—noticed at length in the preceding article. To this popular periodical William contributed the poetry, and hints and sketches for some of the essays. Of the other three brothers of Washington Irving, Ebenezer, born in 1776, is still living, (in 1857,) and resides with Washington Irving at Sunnyside; Peter, born in 1771, died in 1838; and John Treat, born in 1778, died in 1838. The last two have been noticed on an earlier page of our Dictionary.

Warren, M.D. The distinguished author of this vol. has enjoyed the advantages of half a century's medical practice. This should be a sufficient endorsement of the sagacity of his counsels. The work has been well received on both sides of the Atlantic. The London Critic of April 1st, 1856, compares this work most favourably with publications lately issued by two medical professors at Edinburgh, and dismisses the subject with the remark:

"The conclusion we have come to after a perusal of it is, that Dr. Jackson has been, through a long professional career, a judicious, safe, prudent, and sufficiently energetic practitioner, reflecting credit on American Practice of Physic."

Dr. Jackson was a pupil of Dr. Edward Augustus Holyoke, the centenarian, and gives us a sketch of his character in the introductory letter to the above-named work, which, we may say in conclusion, is of interest to the laic as well as the physician.

Jackson, John, 1686–1763, a learned Arian divine, a native of Yorkshire; admitted of Jesus Coll., Camb., 1702; Rector of Rossington, Yorkshire, 1710; Confrater of Wigton's Hospital, 1719; and Master, 1729. He pub. many theolog. treatises, 1714–49, among which were several in defence of Dr. Samuel Clarke's Doctrine of the Trinity, and a number against Warburton, Convers Middleton, Law, Whiston, and the deistical writers Collins, Tindal, and Morgan. His best-known work is Chronological Antiquities for 5100 years, Lon., 1752, 3 vols. 4to. In German at Erlangen, 1756, 3 vols. 4to.

"Great labour has been bestowed upon it, as the nature of the subject required, and the very extent of the performances shows."—Orme's Bibl. Bib.

He was profoundly versed in theology, metaphysics, the languages, the arts and sciences, and was pious, charitable, and courteous. He was the author of Commentaries on the Apostles' Creed, many serms. and theolog. treatises, of which a collective edit. was pub., with a Life of the author, by E. Vaughan, in 1673, 3 vols. fol. New ed., revised and improved, Oxf., 1844, 12 vols. 8vo. A Synoptical Table of his Works was pub. in 1838, 12mo, by the Rev. John Henry Todd. And see Goode, Wm., No. 5.

"I speak it in the presence of God, I have not read so hearty, vigorous a champion against Rome, so convincing and demonstrative, as is Dr. Jackson: and I bless God for the Confirmation he hath given me in the Christian Religion against the Atheist, Jew, and Socinian."—Thomas Hearnat, the Diet.

"He is generally full of meaning: it is scarce possible to open in any page where we shall not find something seldom if at all to be met with anywhere else. A curious reader will find something remarkable and worthy of reading in the whole."—Dr. Bonpuntor.

"Dr. Jackson is a magazine of theological knowledge, everywhere penned with great elegance and dignity, so that his style is a pattern of perfection . . . He deserves to be numbered with the English fathers of the church."—Jones, of Nayland: Life of Bishop Horne.

"Deficient in evangelical views, and redundant in reasoning philosophy, yet full of useful thoughts."—Buckeridge's C. S.

Jackson is often quoted by Bishop Patrick in his Commentaries on the Old Testament, and is commended by Bishop Horne, Merrick, &c.

"In my judgment the most valuable of all our English divines. . . . I think you would find three or four pages per day a wholesome and pleasant diet . . . The philosophy, the strength of faith, and the sincere religious heat with which his three folios abound. . . . An author with whom, more almost than any other, one might be contented in a prison."—Robt. Southey. Life and Correspondence.

Rev., xviii. 123-152,) and several treatises on subjects of Political Economy, among which are—1. Two Reports on the Trade in Corn, and the Agricult. of the North of Europe, 1826-27, fol.; printed by H. of C.

"These Reports contain a great deal of valuable information respecting the agriculture and statistics of the North of Europe."—McCulloch's Lit. of Polit. Econ., 79.

2. An Inquiry into the Production and Consumption of the Precious Metals, 1831, 2 vols. 8vo. Undertaken at the suggestion of Mr. Huskisson, who assisted the author.

"Though perhaps the best on the subject, this work is very defective. It was reviewed, and some of its eficiencies pointed out, in the 55th volume of the Edinburgh Review."—McCulloch: ubi supra, 356.

Yet the work is highly commended by the Edin. Rev., the Lon. Quar. Rev., the Times, and the Spectator. See Huskisson, William, M.P. A Biography of Mr. Jacob will be found in Lon. Gent. Mag., May, 1852. See also index to Blackw. Mag., vols. i.-l.

Vol. i. contains Matthew, with the harmony: vol. ii., Mark and Luke; vol. iii., John and Acts. 3. Question-Books designed to accompany the preceding three vols.

"Dr. Jacobus possesses many qualifications for a successful commentator on the sacred Scriptures. To a mind vigorous by original endowment, he adds the varied stores of sacred learning, analytical powers of a high order, a sound judgment, a severe literary taste, a deep-toned piety, an earnest love of truth, a familiarity with Biblical places, objects, and customs, from personal observation; while the style in which he clothes his thoughts is clear, strong, compact, and epigrammatic. His plan has some novel features which enhance the value of his labours."—Bibliotheca Sacra.

James I., King of Scotland, 1395–1437, the second son of King Robert III., was captured by an English cruiser when on his way to France in 1405, and kept a prisoner in England until 1423, when he ascended the Scottish throne. He was assassinated by some rebellious subjects at Perth in 1437. He employed his imprisonment to such good purpose as to become famous for his erudition and manifold accomplishments. As an author he is best known by The King's Quhair, (Book,) consisting of 197 seven-lined stanzas, and elicited by the charms of the Lady Jane Beaufort, of the blood royal of England, whom he beheld in the garden from his window in Windsor Castle. Need we add that the restoration to freedom left the royal wooer still a captive, and that the Lady Jane became Queen of Scotland? The other poems ascribed to him are Christis Kirk of the Grene; (also attributed to James V.;) Peblis to the Play, (doubtful,) Falkland on the Grene, a Song on Absence, and some minor pieces. The Poetical Remains of James I., edited by Wm. Tytler, were pub., Edin., 1783, 8vo. The Works of James I., containing the three poems noticed above, with two others generally ascribed to King James V.,—The Gaberlunzie Man, and the Jollie Beggar,—were pub. at Perth, 1786, 12mo. Tytler's edit. is accused, by Ritson and others, of many errors. The poems of James will also be found in Sibbald's Chronicles of Scottish Poetry. It is alleged that portions of The King's Quhair are superior to any poetry produced in England, with the exception of Chaucer's, before the age of Elizabeth. Indeed, Ellis says,

"It is full of simplicity and feeling, and is not inferior in poetical merit to any similar production of Chaucer."—Spec. of the Early Eng. Poets, ed. 1845, i. 244.

Hallam remarks that

"The King's Quhair is a long allegory, polished and imaginative, but with some of the tediousness usual in such productions."—Lit. Hist. of Europe, ed. 1854, i. 126.

But perhaps no one has better described the author and his poem than Washington Irving, in the article entitled A Royal Poet, in the Sketch-Book. This admirable sketch—which was declared by Lockhart (Blackwood's Mag., vi. 559, Feb. 1820) to be "infinitely more graceful than any piece of American writing that ever came from any other hand, and well entitled to be classed with the best English writings of our day"—is, or ought to be, familiar to all of our readers.

"I have been particularly interested," remarks Irving after a visit to the prince's former prison in Windsor Castle, "by those parts of the poem which breathe his immediate thoughts concerning his situation, or which are connected with the apartment in the Tower. They have thus a personal and local charm, and are given with such circumstantial truth as to make the reader present with the captive in his prison, and the companion of his meditations. . . . As an amatory poem it is edifying, in these days of coarser thinking, to notice the nature, refinement, and exquisite delicacy which pervade it, banishing every gross thought or immodest expression, and presenting female loveliness clothed in all its chivalrous attributes of almost supernatural purity and grace."—Sketch-Book, ed. N. York, 1855, 109–110, 117.

It is declared that James was as ready with his sword as with his pen, and equally so, we may add, with his feet, voice, and fingers, for he could sing, dance, and play on eight different instruments of music. The Scotch historians can never say enough in his praise:

"His scales erat, ut ejus dictione nihil fuerit artificiosius: ita Poeta, ut carmina non tam arte strinxisse, quam naturæ sponte fudisse videretur. Cui rem fidem faciunt carmina diversi generis, quæ in rhythmum Scotice illigavit, so artificio," &c.—Bishop Lesley: De Actibus Gest. Scot., ed. 1675, 4to, lib. vii. 257, 266, 267.

James IV., King of Scotland, grandson of the preceding, was killed at the battle of Flodden Field, 1513, aged 40. He is said by Bishop Tanner (Bibliotheca) to have written upon the Apocalypse; but this is doubtful. See Park's Walpole's R. and N. Authors.

James V., King of Scotland, son of the preceding, d. 1542, in the 33d year of his age. To him are ascribed Christis Kirk of the Grene, and the Gaberlunzie Man, (see James I., ante.) These two were pub. by John Callander, Edin., 1782, 8vo. See Park's R. and N. Authors; Pinkerton's Select Scottish Ballads; Watt's Bibl. Brit., Lowndes's Bibl. Man. Christis Kirk of the Grene is a great favourite with the Scotch:

James VI. of Scotland and I. of England, 1566–1625, grandson of the preceding, and only child of Mary, Queen of Scots, by her cousin, Henry Stuart, Lord Darnley, when only 18 years of age pub. a vol. entitled Essayes of a Prentice in the Divine Art of Poesie, with the Rewles and Cauteles to be perused and avoided, Edin., 1584, 4to. In this vol. we have a mixture of poetry and prose, neither of much value. The latter gives the reader instructions in the proper mode of making verse. This was reprinted in Edin., 1814, sm. 4to, with a Prefatory Memoir by R. P. Gillies. A copy of the original ed. was sold at Bindley's sale for £26 5s. In 1591 appeared His Majesties Poeticall Exercises at Vacant Houres, 4to, and other works followed this collection. In 1616 (fol.) was given to the world a collective ed. of his prose compositions:

James I. his workes, pub. by the Bp. of Winchester. Fine portrait by Passe, and frontispiece by Elstrack, folio. Containing Paraphrase on Revelation, Meditations, Basilicon Doron, Dæmonology, Counterblast to Tobacco, Law of Free Monarchies, Powder Treason, Defence of the Rights of Kings, Præmonition to Christian Monarchs, Speeches, &c.

For an account of the separate publications of his majesty, and works connected with his reign, we must refer the reader to Watt's Bibl. Brit.; Lowndes's Bibl. Man.; Park's Walpole's R. and N. Authors; Sir J. Harrington's Nugæ Antiquæ; Arthur Wilson's Hist. of his Life and Reign; the histories of the time; Decker's Entertainment to K. Nor must we omit to mention Secret Histories of the Court of James I., with Notes and Introduction by Sir W. Scott, 2 vols. 8vo, 1811. Contents. Osborne's Traditional Memoirs, Sir A. Weldon's Court and Character of James I., Aulicus Coquinariæ, Sir L. Peyton's Divine Catastrophe of the House of Stuart.

As an author his majesty certainly has not enjoyed the same reputation since his death that he did in the midst of his brilliant court. Horace Walpole—not generally unwilling to find merit in noble pens—dismisses his majesty's literary claims with more wit than flattery:

"One remark I cannot avoid making: the king's speech is always supposed by parliament to be the speech of the minister: how cruel would it have been on King James's ministers, if that interpretation had prevailed in his reign! . . . Bishop Montague translated all his majesty's works into Latin: a man of so much patience was well worthy of favour."—R. and N. Authors, Park's ed., i. 115–116, 120.

As regards his theological abilities, an eminent authority remarks:

"His character as a man unfortunately adds no weight to his sentiments as an expositor; and his works would long ago have been forgotten, had they not been the production of a royal author. I ought not to omit his Majesty's poetical translation of the Psalms of David; a poor production from a scholar of Buchanan."—Orme's Bibl. Bib.

James II., King of England, 1633–1701, second son of the preceding, wrote an account of his life, which was preserved in MSS. in the Scotch College at Paris until the Revolution, and was subsequently destroyed. James, George Payne Rainsford, b. in London about 1800, commenced his literary career at an early age by anonymous contributions to the journals and reviews which catered to the literary taste of "a discerning public." Some of these juvenile effusions fell under the notice of Washington Irving, and this gentleman, with his usual kindness of heart, encouraged the young author to venture upon something of a more important character than the fugitive essays which had hitherto employed his pen. Thus strengthened in his literary proclivity, the young aspirant nibbed his "gray-goose quill," commenced author in earnest, and gave to the world in 1822 his first work,—a Life of Edward the Black Prince. Mr. James now turned his attention to a field which had recently been cultivated with eminent success,—historical romance,—and completed in 1825 his novel of Richelieu, which, having received the favourable verdict of Sir Walter Scott, made its appearance in 1829. This was followed in the next year by Darnley and De L'Orme.

Richelieu was so fortunate as to secure the favour of the formidable Christopher North of Blackwood; but this invaluable commendation was withheld from Darnley:

"Mr. Colburn has lately given us two books of a very different character, Richelieu and Darnley. Richelieu is one of the most spirited, amusing and interesting romances I ever read; characters well drawn—incidents well managed—story perpetually progressive—catastrophe at once natural and unexpected—moral good, but not goody—and the whole felt, in every chapter, to be the work of a—Gentleman."—Noctes Ambrosianæ, April, 1830; Blackw. Mag., xxvii. 688. q. v.

From this time to the present (1858) Mr. James has been no idler in the Republic of Letters, as the following alphabetical list of his writings amply proves:

1. Adrg, or The Peruvians; a Poem, 1 vol. 2. Agincourt, 1844, 3 vols. 3. Agnes Sorrel, 1853, 3 vols. 4. Arabella Stuart, 1853, 3 vols. 5. Arrah Neil, 1845. 3 vols. 6. Attila, 1837, 3 vols. 7. John Jones's Tales from English History, for Little John Joneses, 1849, 2 vols. 44. John Marston Hall, 1834, 3 vols.; subsequently pub. under the title of Little Bull o' Fire, 1847, 1 vol. 45. King's Highway, 1840, 3 vols. 46. Last of the Fairies, 1847, 1 vol. 47. Life of Edward the Black Prince, 1822, 2 vols. 48. Life of Henry IV. of France, 1847, 3 vols. 49. Life of Vicissitudes, 1 vol. 50. Man-at-Arms, 1840, 3 vols. 51. Margaret Graham, 1847, 2 vols. 52. Mary of Burgundy, 1833, 3 vols. 53. Memoirs of Great Commanders, 1832, 3 vols. 54. Morley Ernstein, 1842, 3 vols. 55. My Aunt Pontypool, 3 vols. 56. Old Dominion; or, The Southampton Massacre, 1856, 3 vols. 57. Old Oak Chest, 3 vols. 58. One in a Thousand, 1835, 3 vols. 59. Pequinillo, 1852, 3 vols. 60. Philip Augustus, 1831, 3 vols. 61. Prince Life, 1855, 1 vol. 62. Revenge, 1851, 3 vols.; so styled by the bookseller, without the author's consent. It was originally pub. in papers under a different name. 63. Richelieu, 1829, 3 vols. 64. Robber, 1838, 3 vols. 65. Rose D'Albret, 1840, 3 vols. 66. Russell, 1847, 3 vols. 67. Sir Theodore Broughton, 1847, 3 vols. 68. Smuggler, 1845, 3 vols. 69. Stepmother, 1846, 3 vols. 70. Story without a Name, 1852, 1 vol. 71. String of Pearls, 1849, 2 vols. 72. Ticonderoga; or, The Black Eagle, 1854, 3 vols. 73. Whim and its Consequences, 1847, 3 vols. 74. Woodman, 1847, 3 vols. 75. Lord Montagu's Page, Phila., 1858, 12mo.

It will be seen that the above list presents a total of 189 vols.,—viz.: 51 works in 3 vols. each, 2 in 4 vols. each, 6 in 2 vols. each, and 16 in 1 vol. each. Almost all of these vols. are of the post-octavo size. Mr. James is also the editor of the Vernon Letters, illustrative of the times of William III., 1841, 3 vols. 8vo; and of Wm. Henry Ireland's historical romance of David Rizzio, 1849, 3 vols. p. 8vo; and was associated with Dr. E. E. Crowe in the Lives of the Most Eminent Foreign Statesmen, 1832–38, 5 vols. p. 8vo. (4 vols. were Mr. James's, and 1 vol. Dr. Crowe's,) and with Mr. Maunsell B. Field, in the composition of Adrian, or The Clouds of the Mind, 1852, 2 vols. p. 8vo.

To this list may be added Norfolk and Hereford, (in a collection entitled Seven Tales by Seven Authors,) and enough articles in various periodicals to fill eight or ten volumes. Perhaps we should not omit to notice that a work entitled A Brief History of the United States Boundary Question, drawn up from official papers, pub. in London, 1839, 8vo, and ascribed to Mr. James, is not his production; nor had he any share (further than writing a preface, or something of that kind) in another work often credited to him,—Memoirs of Celebrated Women, 1837, 2 vols. p. 8vo. During the reign of William IV. the author received the appointment of historiographer of Great Britain; but this post was resigned by him many years since.

There have been new edits. of many of Mr. James's novels, and some or all of them have appeared in Bentley's Series of Standard Novels. There has been also a Parlour-Library Edition. A collective edit. was pub. by Smith, Elder & Co., commencing in June, 1844, and continued by Parry, and by Simpkin, Marshall & Co. In America they have been popular, and pub. in large quantities.

About 1850, Mr. James, with his family, removed permanently to the United States. He was British Consul at Richmond, Virginia, from 1852 to Sept, 1858, when he was appointed Consul at Venice, where he now (1858) resides. The space which we have occupied by a recital of the titles only of Mr. James's volumes necessarily restricts the quotation of criticisms upon the merits or demerits of their contents. It has fallen to the lot of few authors to be so much read, and at the same time so much abused, as the owner of the fertile pen which claims the long list of novels commencing with Richelieu in 1829 and enter ling to Lord Montagu's Page in 1858. That there should be a family likeness in this numerous race—where so many, too, are nearly of an age—can be no matter of surprise. The mind, like any other artisan, can only construct from materials which lie within its range; and when no time is allowed for the accumulation and renewal of these, it is vain to hope that variety of architecture will conceal the identity of substance. Yet, after all, the champion of this popular author will probably argue that this objection against the writings of Mr. James is greatly overstated and extravagantly overestimated. The novelist can draw only from the experience of human life in its different phases, and these admit not of such variety as the inordinate appetite of the modern Athenians unreasonably demands. A new series of catastrophes and perplexities, of mortifications and triumphs, of joys and sorrows, cannot be evoked for the benefit of the reader of each new novel. Again, Mr. James's admirer insists that this charge of sameness so often urged against our novelist's writings is perhaps overstated. Where one author, as is frequently the case, gains the reputation of versatility of talent by writing one or two volumes, it is not to be believed that Mr. James exhibits less in one or two hundred. He who composes a library is not to be judged by the same standard as he who writes but one book. And even if the charge of "sameness" be admitted to its full extent, yet many will cordially concur with the grateful and graceful acknowledgment of one of the most eminent of modern critics:

"I hail every fresh publication of James, though I half know what he is going to do with his lady, and his gentleman, and his landscape, and his mystery, and his orthodoxy, and his criminal trial. But I am charmed with the new amusement which he brings out of old materials. I look on him as I look on a musician famous for "variations." I am grateful for his vein of cheerfulness, for his singularly varied and vivid landscapes, for his power of painting women at once lady-like and loving, or rare talent for making lovers to match, at once beautiful and well-bred, and for the solace which all this has afforded me, sometimes over and over again, in illness and in convalescence, when I required interest without violence, and entertainment at once animated and mild."—LEIGH HUNT.

Two of the severest criticisms to which Mr. James's novels have been subjected are, the one in the London Athenæum for April 11, 1846, and the one in the North American Review (by E. P. Whipple) for April, 1844. From each of these we quote a few lines:

"The first and most obvious contrivance for the attainment of quantity is, of course, dilution; but this resource has practically its limit, and Mr. James had reached it long Commonplace in its best day, any thing more feeble, vapid,—loppy, in fact, (for we know not how to characterize this writer's style but by some of its own elegancies,)—than Mr. James's manner has become, it were difficult to imagine. Every literary grace has been swamped in the spreading marasmus of his style."—Athenæum: ubi supra.

"He is a most scientific expositor of the fact that a man may be a maker of books without being a maker of thoughts: that he may be the reputed author of a hundred volumes and flood the market with his literary wares, and yet have very few ideas and principles for his stock in trade. For the last ten years he has been repeating his own repetitions and echoing his own echoes. His first novel was a shot that went through the target, and he has ever since been assiduously firing through the hole . . . When a man has little or nothing to say, he should say it in the smallest space. It should not, at any rate, take up more room than suffices for a creative mind. He should not provoke hostility and petulance by the effrontery of his demands upon time and patience. He should let us off with a few volumes, and gain our gratitude for his benevolence, if not our praise for his talents."—E. P. WHIPPLE: ubi supra, and in his Essays and Reviews, ii. 116–137.

We have spoken of Mr. James's champions and admirers; and such are by no means fabulous personages, notwithstanding the severe censures of which we have just exhibited specimens. A brief quotation from one of these eulogies will be another evidence added to the many in this volume of a wide dissimilarity in critical opinions:

"His pen is prolific enough to keep the imagination constantly nourished; and of him, more than of any modern writer, it may be said, that he has improved his style by the mere dint of constant and abundant practice. For, although so agreeable a novelist, it must not be forgotten that he stands infinitely higher as an historian. . . . The most fantastic and beautiful coruscations which the skies can exhibit to the eyes of mankind dart as if in play from the huge volumes that roll out from the crater of the volcano. . . . The recreation of an enlarged intellect is ever more valuable than the highest efforts of a confined one. Hence we find in the works before us, [Corse de Leon, The Ancient Régime, and The Jacqueries,] lightly as they have been thrown off, the traces of study,—the footsteps of a powerful and vigorous understanding."—Dublin University Magazine, March, 1842.

The Edinburgh Review concludes some comments upon our author with the remark,

"Our readers will perceive from these general observations that we estimate Mr. James's abilities, as a romance-writer, highly: his works are lively and interesting, and animated by a spirit of sound and healthy morality in feeling, and of natural delineation in character, which, we think, will secure for them a calm popularity which will last beyond the present day."

We have before us more than thirty (to be exact, just thirty-two) commendatory notices of our author, but brief extracts from two of these all for which we can find space.

"He belongs to the historical school of fiction, and, like the masters of the art, takes up a real person or a real event, and, pursuing the course of history, makes out the intentions of nature by adding circumstances and heightening character, till, like a statue in the hands of the sculptor, the whole is in fair proportion, truth of sentiment, and character. For this he has high qualities,—an excellent taste, extensive knowledge of history, a right feeling of the chivalrous, and a heroic and a ready eye for the picturesque: his proprieties are admirable; his sympathy with whatever is high-souled and noble is deep and impressive. His best works are Richelieu and Mary of Burgundy."—ALLAN CUNNINGHAM: Biog. and Crit. Hist. of the Lit. of the Last Fifty Years, 1853.

The critic next to be quoted, whilst coinciding in the objections prominently urged against Mr. James as an author,—repetition, tediousness, and deficiency of terseness,—yet urges on his behalf that "There is a constant appeal in his brilliant pages not only to the pure and generous, but to the elevated and noble sentiments; he is imbued with the very of chivalry; and all his stories turn on the final triumph of those who are influenced by such feelings over such as are swayed by selfish or base desires. He possesses great pictorial powers, and a remarkable facility of turning his graphic pen at will to the delineation of the most distant and opposite scenes, manners, and social customs. . . . Not a word or a thought which can give pain to the purest heart ever escapes from his pen: and the mind wearied with the cares and grieved at the selfishness of the world reverts with pleasure to his varied compositions, which carry it back, as it were, to former days, and portray, perhaps in too brilliant colours, the ideas and manners of the olden time."—SIR ARCHIBALD ALISON: Hist. of Europe, 1815–52, chap. v., 1853. James, L. Letters relating to the College of Physicians, Lon., 1688, 4to.

James, Maria, b. in Wales about 1795, emigrated to America in her seventh year, and since the age of ten has lived at service with a number of families, whose regard she has secured by the excellence of her deportment and her intellectual abilities. In 1833 some of her compositions fell into the hands of Professor Alonzo Potter, D.D., of Union College, now the esteemed Bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the State of Pennsylvania, and in 1839 he introduced a collection of them to the public under the title of Wales, and other Poems, by Maria James. Some specimens of Miss James's poetry will be found in Griswold's Female Poets of America.

James, Marmaduke. Serm., 1659, 4to.

James, Richard, 1592–1638, a native of Newport, Isle of Wight, educated at Exeter and Corpus Christi Colleges, Oxford, pub. a number of sermons, &c., 1625–33, and left many MS. pieces. This learned critic and antiquary was a nephew of Thomas James, D.D., Sub-dean of Wells. See Athen. Oxon.; Biog. Brit., Supp.; Bp. Nicolson's Hist. Lib.; Lon. Gent. Mag., xxxvii. 336.

James, Robert, M.D., 1703–1776, the inventor of the celebrated Fever Powder, was a native of Staffordshire, and educated at St. John's College, Oxford. His best-known work is A Medicinal Dictionary, Lon., 1743–45, 3 vols. fol. His Vindication of the Fever Powder was not pub. until after his death. See Chalmers's Biog. Dict.; Boswell's Life of Johnson. Dr. Johnson, who always had a propensity for dabbling in physic, furnished some of the articles for the Medicinal Dictionary, and observed of Dr. James, "No man brings more mind to his profession."

Johnson also wrote the Dedication (and nothing of his is more truly "Johnsonese,") to Dr. Mead.

James, Thomas, D.D., 1571?–1629, a native of Newport, Isle of Wight, educated at and Fellow of (1593) New College, Oxford; appointed Keeper (the first one) of the Bodleian Library, 1602; resigned this post in 1620; Sub-dean of Wells, 1614, and subsequently Rector of Mongeham, Kent. His best-known work is A Treatise of the Corruption of Scriptures, Councils, and Fathers, by the Prelates, Pastors, and Pillars of the Church of Rome, for Maintenance of Popery and Irreligion, Lon., 1612, 4to; 1688, 8vo; edited by Rev. J. E. Cox, 1843, 8vo. A new ed. of his Bellum Papale (first ed., 1600, 4to, again, 1678, 8vo) was pub. in 1841, 12mo. We have already noticed his Catalogue of the Bodleian Library in the Life of Sir Thomas Bodley. Dr. James was one of the most learned critics of his day. See Athen. Oxon.; Biog. Brit., Supp.; Genl. Dict.; Usher's Life and Letters; Oldys's Librarian; Horne's Introduc. to the Scrip.

James, Capt. Thomas. Dangerous Voyage for discovering the northwest passage to the South Sea, Lon., 1633, 4to, 1740, 8vo. Also in Churchill's Voyages, ii. p. 479, 1703; in Coxe's Voyages, i. 1741; and in Harris's Collection, vol. ii. It is a valuable work to the collector of Arctic Voyages, and has brought as much as £6.

"His narrative contains some remarkable physical observations on the cold and ice; but no hint of any discovery of importance."—Stevenson's Voyages and Travels.

James, Lt.-Col. Thomas, R. Artillery. The Hist. of the Herculean Straits, now called the Straits of Gibraltar, Lon., 1771, 2 vols. r. 4to. The 2d vol. contains detailed accounts of several sieges and successful defences of Gibraltar previous to the last great siege which it sustained.

James, Thomas, d. 1804, Head-Master of Rugby School, 1776–93, pub. a Compend. of Geography for Rugby School, two serms., and the Fifth Book of Euclid explained by Algebra.

James, Thomas, Vicar of Sibbertoft and Theddingworth. 1. The Fables of Æsop; a new version, chiefly from the Original Greek, Lon., 1847, p. 8vo. With upwards of 100 illust. by Tenniel.

"Remarkable for the clearness and conciseness with which each tale is narrated."—Lon. Examiner.

This new trans. is intended to take the place of the defective ones of Croxall, Baldwin, L'Estrange, &c. The illustrations add greatly to the value of the work.

"Nothing has been seen like them since Bewick."

2. Æsop for the Million; 38th thousand, 1858, p. 8vo. 3. The Book of Common Prayer, &c., edited with Notes and Illustrations.

"It is impossible to speak too highly of the exceeding beauty of this work."—Cambridge Chronicle.

James, Thomas C., M.D., 1766–1835, an eminent physician, a native of Philadelphia, Penn., graduated as a student of medicine at the University of Pennsylvania in 1788, and in 1811 was appointed Professor of Midwifery in the same institution. He practised his profession in his native city with great success until his death. Dr. James was an accomplished scholar, and contributed to the Philadelphia Port-Folio, under the signature of P. D., translations in verse of the Idyls of Gessner, which were highly commended. See Williams's Amer. Med. Biog.; Phila. Casket, March, 1830; Amer. Med. Jour., (art. by Hugh L. "This book is one of which it is not too high praise to assert, that it approaches as nearly to perfection, in its own line, as any historical work perhaps ever did; and we must acknowledge that we cannot contemplate without admiration the impartial and unwearied zeal for historical truth which alone could have supported the author through his tedious and thankless labours."—Edin. Rev.

Highly commended by other authorities.

"Mr. Tickler.—'A Naval History is a very good thing, if written by a competent person, which James is not, although the man has some merit as a chronicler. But the very idea of criticising in detail every action, just as you would criticise a volume of poems, is not a little absurd. Southey's Life of Nelson is good.'

Jameson, Mrs. Anna, a daughter of Mr. Murphy, late painter-in-ordinary to the Princess Charlotte, was married about 1824 to Mr. Jameson, who has for many years held an official appointment in Canada. This union "proved less fortunate in its issues than in its promises, and has long been practically, though not legally, dissolved." The works of this lady have long enjoyed an extensive popularity, and few writers of the age have done so much to refine the public taste and diffuse a knowledge of the great masters of art. 1. "Two truly delightful volumes."—CHRISTOPHER NORTH: Noctes Ambrosianæ, Nov. 1832.

"Mrs. Jameson's Essays on the Female Characters of Shakspeare are among the best. It was right that this province of illustration should be reserved for a woman's hand."—Hallam's Lit. Hist. of Europe, ed. 1854, iii. 94.

"Mrs. Jameson's volume on the Female Characters is a most eloquent and passionate representation of Shakspeare's women, and in many respects is an important contribution to critical literature. This is one of the most valuable lexicographical works ever issued. The erudition, patience, and industry of the author are beyond praise: his accuracy, however, is not always beyond question. But who is to decide where there must be so much of mere conjecture? We may be allowed to suggest that the philologist should secure, as a companion for Jamieson's Dictionary, Dictionarium Scoto-Celticum, pub. by The Highland Society, 1825, 2 vols. 4to, £7 7s.; large paper, £10 10s.; condensed edit., with additional words, £1 1s. "This book is perhaps the most interesting, the most beautiful, and the cheapest series ever offered to the public."—Lon. Athenæum.

The Illustrations, apart from the descriptive matter, were issued in 1846, &c. in Parts at 5*s*. each. In the preparation of this valuable series, Sir Wm. Jardine was assisted by Swainson, Waterhouse, Macgillivray, Bushnan, Selby, Scoresburgh, Col. Hamilton Smith, Dr. Hamilton, and the Rev. James Duncan. Each vol. (sold separately) contains a memoir of a celebrated naturalist. Sir Thomas Dick Lauder and Capt. Thomas Brown commenced in November, 1833, the issue of The Miscellany of Natural History, the design of which, the London Athenæum declares, was taken from the work just noticed. See Athen., 1833, 802–804. 4. Ichnology of Annandale, 3 Pts. fol., 1832, each £1 1*s*. 5. Contributions to Ornithology, 4 series, 1848–51, £3 9*s*. for all. 6. "I never read a thing with more pleasure than an additional sheet to Jervas's preface to Don Quixote: before I got over two paragraphs I cried out, 'Aut Erasmus, aut Diabolus.'"—POPE.

The most beautiful edit. of Don Quixote in English is that pub. by Tilt in London, 1838, 3 vols. 8vo, £2 10*s.*; again, 1843, 2 vols. r. 8vo; again, by Willoughby, 1852, 2 vols. r. 8vo, £2 1*s.*; 2 vols. in 1, 8vo, 10*s.* 6*d.* This is Jarvis's trans. revised and corrected, with 800 wood-engravings, after the designs of Tony Johannot, and 16 addit. plates by Cosmo Armstrong. A revised trans. for general reading, with illustrations by Warren, was pub. by Burns in London, in 1848, fp. 8vo, 6*s.* This is the proper edit. for the ladies' parlour. Another revised trans., formed on those of Motteux, Jarvis, and Smollett, with 18 cuts by Armstrong, and 32 after Johannot, was pub. in London in 1842, £1 8*s.*; the same, with only the usual 18 cuts by Armstrong, 18*s.*

"Well adapted, by its accuracy, comprehensiveness, and the popular language in which it is expressed, to be a proper and valuable book for the purpose which it was designed to fill."—JOHN C. WARREN, M.D., of Boston.

Commended by other high authorities. Dr. Jarvis has pub. a number of pamphlets on various branches of medical science, and contributed to the leading American medical journals.

Jarvis, Samuel Farmer, D.D., LL.D., 1787–1851, a son of Bishop Jarvis, (ante,) and a native of Middletown, Conn., was educated at Yale College, ordained deacon in 1810, and priest in 1811; Rector of St. Michael's Church, Bloomingdale, New York, 1811; of St. James's, New York, (held in conjunction with the former,) 1813; Prof. of Biblical Criticism in the (Episcopal) General Theological Seminary, New York, 1819–20; first Rector of St. Paul's Church, Boston, 1820–26; travelled in Europe, 1826–35; Prof. of Oriental Literature in Washington (now Trinity) College, Hartford, 1835–37; Rector of Christ Church, Middletown, 1837–42; appointed Historiographer of the Church by the General Convention (Prot. Epis. Church) of 1838. From 1842 until his death Dr. Jarvis devoted his time chiefly to the preparation of an ecclesiastical history, (commended to his care by the General Convention of 1838,) portions of which were pub. in 1844 and 1850. See Nos. 5, 8. 1. A Discourse on the Religion of the Indian Tribes of North America, N. York, 1820, 8vo. Favourably reviewed by John Pickering in the N. Amer. Rev., July, 1820. 2. "Dr. Jarvis has exhibited accuracy and fidelity as an historian, the ripest judgment and the clearest reasoning as a commentator upon the intricate authorities on which he had to build his foundation for inquiry, and has shown himself an accomplished scholar, fully equal to the task committed to his charge. The work is a foundation on which the Christian historian and theologian may build; for the materials are solid, and the work admirably executed."—Lon. Polytechnic Review.

"A learned work on New Testament Chronology, by an American divine (Dr. Jarvis, of Connecticut) of standing and reputation. It is quite pleasant to find the daughter-church rearing chronologers and scholars; and we commend Dr. J.'s undertaking to the candid estimate and patronage of the learned."—Lon. Chris. Rememb.

"A thorough and comprehensive analysis of all the evidence extant, whether sacred or profane, upon the most difficult and important points in ecclesiastical chronology,—viz.: the precise years of the birth and death of our Saviour. . . . Jay, William, 1769–1854, an eminent Dissenting divine, a native of Tisbury, Wiltshire, commenced preaching when between 15 and 16 years of age, and before he was 21 had delivered nearly 1000 sermons. On the 31st of Jan. 1791, he became the minister of Argyle Chapel, Bath, and remained in this situation until June, 1853, or for sixty-two years. In Jan. 1841, on the completion of the 50th year of his ministry, the jubilee was celebrated by religious services in the chapel, and by a feast in the Assembly Rooms, where 820 persons sat down together to breakfast. A salver and £650 were presented to the object of this gratifying token of respect. To the volume pub. on this occasion,—Jubilee Memorial, 1841, 12mo,—to Jay's Autobiography, edited by Rev. Geo. Redford and Rev. J. Angell James, 1854, 8vo, (3d ed., 1855, p. 8vo.) to the Memoir of Jay, by Rev. S. S. Wilson, 1854, fp. 8vo, to Wallace's Portraiture of Jay, with Notes of his Conversations, &c., and to Pen-Pictures of Popular English Preachers, 1852, 12mo, we refer the reader for information respecting this excellent divine. The best known of Jay's works are Morning and Evening Exercises, (vols. x.-xv., 1842, of the collective ed. of his Works.) The Christian Contemplated, (vol. vi., 1843, of his Works.) Short Discourses, (vols. x. and xii., 1844, of his Works:) and Mornings with Jesus, 1854, fp. 8vo. The collective ed. to which we refer is in 12 vols. 8vo, Bath, 1842-44, (N. York, 3 vols. 8vo,) and was corrected and revised by the author himself. To these 12 vols. must be added Lectures on Female Scripture Characters, 1854, cr. 8vo; Mornings with Jesus, 1854, fp. 8vo; Evenings with Jesus; and Final Discourses at Argyle Chapel, Bath, 1854, fp. 8vo. As a preacher, as well as an author, Mr. Jay has acquired great celebrity. John Foster calls him the Prince of Preachers; Sheridan styled him the most natural orator whom he had ever heard, Dr. James Hamilton speaks of hearing him "with wonder and delight;" and Beckford describes his mind as "a clear, transparent stream, flowing so freely as to impress us with the idea of its being inexhaustible."

His sermons, too,—not always the case with the effusions of popular preachers,—will bear the dispassionate judgment of the closet without lessening the reputation of their author.

"Mr. Jay's sermons, although a little too warmly coloured, have, upon the whole, great merit as honest and impassioned expositions of the several texts which are handled."—Bickn's Lib. Comp.

"Eloquent and pious."—Dr. E. Williams's C. P.

"Happily connects privilege and practice."—Bickersteth's C. S.

"His sermons, like his other publications, are universally admired, and permanently fixed the writer's reputation. . . . One great charm of this divine's works is the catholic spirit which pervades them. The dissenter seldom intrudes, the sectarian never appears; and Christians of all denominations may read his predilections without finding any violence done to their party predilections."—Lowndes's Brit. Lib., 657, 903.

"His works are very practical and devotional."—Bickersteth's C. S.

"Mr. Jay's Works have held a high place in the estimation of the religious world for more than the average duration of human life."—Lon. Athenæum.

Jefferson, Thomas, April 2, 1743–July 4, 1826, a native of Shadwell, Albemarle county, Virginia, entered William and Mary College in 1760, and subsequently studied law under George Wythe. In 1769 he was elected a member of the Colonial Assembly, and in 1775 succeeded Peyton Randolph in the National Congress at Philadelphia, and on the 28th of June, in the next year, as chairman of the committee appointed for that purpose, reported the celebrated 'Declaration of Independence,—which, with some alterations, was adopted on the 4th of July ensuing. How far Mr. Jefferson is entitled to the credit of the entire originality of this famous document, the reader will be able to form an opinion after consulting the works of John Adams, of Thomas Jefferson, and the biographies of these distinguished statesmen and patriots. See also an interesting article upon this topic in George Ticknor Curtis's History of the Constitution of the United States, vol. i., 1854, pp. 81–88. It is neither our business nor our pleasure to adjudicate on questions of state-paper history or political partisanship in a volume of this character, but we may be allowed to say that Jefferson's claim to the authorship of the Declaration of Independence seems as fully substantiated as the nature of the case will possibly allow. From 1779 to '81 Mr. Jefferson was Governor of his native State; in 1783 was again elected a member of Congress: from 1784 to '89 resided at Paris, succeeding Franklin in 1785 as minister from the United States; in 1789 he was appointed by General Washington Secretary of State, which office he held until 1793; was Vice-President of the United States 1797–1801, and President of the Republic 1801–09. Mr. Jefferson had now reached an age when the duties of public life were no longer inviting, and he passed his remaining years at Monticello, dividing his time between his plantation, his library, and the entertainment of the many visitors attracted to his mansion by his widely-extended reputation at home and abroad. He died on the same day as that which closed the earthly existence of John Adams,—the 4th of July, 1826.

As an author, Mr. Jefferson is best known by his Notes on the State of Virginia, (originally drawn up for M. De Marbois,) of which 200 copies were privately printed at Paris in 1784, (but dated 1782,) 8vo. A French translation, by the Abbé Morellet, with some alterations by the author, appeared at Paris in 1786, 8vo, and an edit. of the original in English was pub. by Stockdale in London in 1787, 8vo.

But on this subject we can give nothing more satisfactory to the reader than the following table, (drawn up by a well-known American historian and bibliographer,) which we find in The Historical Magazine, Boston, Feb. 1857, vol. i., No. 2, p. 52.

"Jefferson's Notes on Virginia.—The following is a list of the several editions of this work, as far as ascertained. Those with a * prefixed have been collated. They are all 8vo except when otherwise marked:

"* Editio princeps, Paris, 1782; pp. 391; plate of Mammoth Cave.

"* French edition, Paris, 1786; pp. viii., 290, iv., map.

"* 1st English do., Stockdale, London, 1787; pp. ii., 382; map.

"* 1st American do., Pritchard and Hall, Philadelphia, 1788; pp. ii., 244.

"2d American do., Philadelphia, 1788; pp. ii., 336.

"Another do., Philadelphia, 1792: ii., 336.

"* Another do., Carey, Philadelphia, 1794; ii., 336; map.

"* Appendix to Notes, Smith, Philadelphia, 1800; pp. 51; woodcut.

"Notes; American edition, Baltimore, 1800.

"* 3d American edition, M. L. Davis, New York, 1801; pp. 392; portrait; map; two wood-cuts.

"* 1st hot-pressed do., Rawle, Philadelphia, 1801; pp. ii., 436, 56; portrait; map; two plans, and view of Natural Bridge.

"* 8th American do., Carlisle, Boston, 1801; pp. 364; portrait; map; two wood-cuts.

"* 9th American do., Sprague, Boston, 1802; 12mo, pp. 368; map.

"Another do., Trenton, N.J., 1803; 12mo, extra fine paper.

"Another do., New York, 1804; best ed.; pp. 392.

"Another do., Hogan and Thompson, Philadelphia, 1825; 12mo.

"Another do., Boston, 1832.

"* Last edition, Randolph, Richmond, 1853; 3 ff. pp. 275; map; four lithographs; one folding sheet of letter-press.

"It will be noticed that very little order seems to have obtained in numbering the editions. That called the 3d American appears to have been the 6th in succession; the 1st hot-pressed, the 7th; and so forth. Perhaps some of your readers may be able to contribute to the above list. Were there not any editions during Mr. Jefferson's second term as President?

E. B. O'C."

The last ed., above noticed, was printed from Mr. Jefferson's own copy, with his MS. annotations, intended apparently for a new issue. We may state that Mr. Randolph has now, (Jan. 1857,) or had a few weeks since, on sale, this copy of Mr. Jefferson's, which is priced at $100. Nor must we omit to notice Mr. Randolph's enterprise in republishing the History of the University of Virginia, as detailed in the Correspondence of Mr. Jefferson and Joseph C. Cabell, Richmond, 1856, 8vo. Of these letters of Jefferson's, all, with the exception of eight, are now given to the world for the first time. Ample information respecting the character of the Notes on Virginia will be found in the authorities referred to in the course of this article. As Stevenson's Catalogue of Voyages and Travels, however, is now rarely to be met with, it may be worth while to quote his opinion of the work:

"Notes on Virginia, by Thos. Jefferson. 1788, 8vo. Politics, commerce, manufactures, and navigation, are here treated of in a satisfactory and instructive manner, but with rather too much the air of philosophy."—P. 623.

In 1829 was pub., by Jefferson's grandson, Memoirs, Correspondence, and Private Papers of Thomas Jefferson, edited by Thomas Jefferson Randolph, 4 vols. 8vo, Charlottesville, Va.; reprinted in London and in Boston in the same year, and in New York in 1830; all in 4 vols. 8vo. But recently there has appeared a more important publication,—viz.: The Writings of Thomas Jefferson; being his Autobiography, Correspondence, Reports, Messages, Addresses, and other Writings, official and private; from the original manuscripts deposited in the Department of State. With Explanatory Notes, tables of contents, and a copious Index to each volume, as well as an Index to the whole, N. York, 1854, 9 vols. 8vo. By the Editor, H. A. Washington. This edit. is from the MSS. bequeathed to Thomas Jefferson Randolph, the author's grandson, and purchased by Congress in 1848. The reader is also referred—in addition to the histories of the Revolutionary period—to the following biographies of Jefferson: by Professor George Tucker, Phila. and Lon., 1837, 2 vols. 8vo; by Wm. Linn, Ithaca, N. Y., 1834, 12mo; by B. L. Rayner, Bost., 1834, 12mo; by H. A. Garland; by Theodore Dwight, 1839, 12mo. See also Observations on the Writings of Thomas Jefferson, by H. Lee, of Virginia, N. York, 1832, 8vo, 1839, 8vo, 1845, 8vo, with addit. notes by C. C. Lee, of Powhatan, in answer to George Tucker's Remarks in his Life of Jefferson; The Youth of Jefferson, a Chronicle of College Scrapes at Williamsburg, in Virginia, 1855, 12mo. It is worthy of observation that Jefferson's Manual of Parliamentary Practice (trans. into French by L. A. Pichon, Paris, 1814, 8vo) is still in use, and referred to as an authority at Washington and elsewhere, and an edit. has been pub. within the last three or four years. It is incorporated in Sutherland's excellent Congressional Manual, of which the 2d edit. appeared in 1846, Phila., 18mo. It may be expected that we should not conclude a notice, however hasty and imperfect, of the writings of Thomas Jefferson, without cautioning the reader against the pernicious influence of those portions of his lucubrations which assail the divine authority of the Scriptures. But, indeed, it is hardly conceivable that any intelligent and candid mind could be perverted by the crudities and self-contradictory sophisms which distinguish the theological speculations of the "Sage of Monticello." The effect produced on our own mind—when as yet very young and inexperienced in the inconsistencies of mental physiology—by the perusal of a portion of Jefferson's famous letters to William Short was that of astonishment that a mind apparently so [illegible] and obtuse in metaphysics could evince vigour and [illegible] in political philosophy. That remarkable exhibition of theologia dogmatica, Jefferson's Plutarchian contrast between his own creed and that of the Found[illegible] of Christianity, would amuse us by its egotism, did it not shock us by its irreverence. But, with whatever mortification a spectacle so humiliating may be regarded by the infidel, Christianity has nothing to fear even from much more formidable opposition.

A graphic sketch of Mr. Jefferson's appearance, manners, and conversation, will be found in a letter of Judge Joseph Story to Mr. Fay, dated Washington, May 30, 1847, (see Story's Life and Corresp., i. 151-152:) and an account of equal interest will be published in a few days in the Private Correspondence of Daniel Webster, vol. i. 364–373. Mr. Webster was so thoughtful as to preserve an extended memoranda of Mr. Jefferson's remarks; and they will well repay perusal. Perhaps we cannot make a better use of a portion of the small space to which we are confined in this article than by devoting it to Mr. Webster's summing up of the evidence in favour of Jefferson's claim to the authorship of the Declaration of Independence:

"The merit of this paper is Mr. Jefferson's. Some changes were made in it at the suggestion of other members of the committee, and others by Congress while it was under discussion. But none of them altered the tone, the frame, the arrangement, or the general character, of the instrument. As a composition, the Declaration is Mr. Jefferson's. It is the production of his mind, and the high honour of it belongs to him clearly and absolutely. To say that he performed his great work well would be doing him injustice. To say that he did excellently well, admirably well, would be inadequate and halting praise. Let us rather say that he so discharged the duty assigned him, that all Americans may well rejoice that the work of drawing the title-deed of their liberties devolved upon him."—A Discourse in Commemoration of the Lives and Services of John Adams and Thomas Jefferson; delivered in Faneuil Hall, Boston, Aug. 2, 1826: Webster's Works, 1854, i. 125, 127.

To the same effect another distinguished orator, and on a like occasion, remarks:

"On the seventh of June, the resolution of independence was moved by Richard Henry Lee. On the eleventh, a committee of five was chosen to announce this resolution to the world; and Thomas Jefferson and John Adams stood at the head of this committee. From their designation by ballot to this most honorable duty, their prominent standing in the Congress might alone be inferred. In their amicable contention and deference each to the other of the great trust of composing the all-important document, we witness their patriotic disinterestedness and their mutual respect. This trust devolved on Jefferson, and with it rests on him the imperishable renown of having penned the Declaration of Independence. To have been the instrument of expressing, in one brief, decisive act, the concentrated will and resolution of a whole family of States, of unfolding, in one all-important manifesto, the causes, the motives, and the justification of this great movement in human affairs, to have been permitted to give the impress and peculiarity of his own mind to a charter of public right, destined—or, rather, let me say, already elevated—to an importance, in the estimation of men, equal to any thing human, ever born on parchment, or expressed in the visible signs of thought,—this is the glory of Thomas Jefferson."—Edward Everett: Eulogy on Adams and Jefferson, 1st of Aug. 1826). Everett's Orations and Speeches, 1853, i. 131-149.

From an historical sketch of the public life of Jefferson, by an eminent orator, still (1857) in the vigorous exercise of his remarkable faculties at the ripe age of almost four-score, we extract a few lines which will be accepted in whole, or with more or less reservation, as the political judgment of our readers may incline.

"After Washington and Franklin, there is no person who fills so eminent a place among the great men of America as Jefferson. Whether we regard his important services in the Revolutionary contest, or his subsequent assertion of the principles upon which the separation was undertaken - both while he filled a subordinate station in Washington's presidency, thwarted by his colleagues, as well as at variance with his chief, and while he administered himself the government of that free and prosperous country,—no reasonable doubt can be entertained, that to his enlightened views and to the firmness of his character it is indebted for much of that freedom and prosperity."—Lord Brougham: Review of George Tucker's Life of Jefferson, Edin. Rev., 1837; and in Brougham's collected Contrib. to the Edin. Rev., Lon. and Glasg., 1850, iii. 443–482. See Tucker, George.

Jeffrey, Francis, Lord, 1773–1850, a native of Edinburgh, the eldest son of George Jeffrey, Under-Clerk in the Court of Sessions, was sent to the University of Glasgow in 1787, and removed in 1791 to Queen's College, Oxford, where he remained but one session. In 1794 he was admitted an advocate at the Scotch Bar, where his services were so seldom called into requisition that he declared, so late as 1803, he had never yet made £100 in any one year by his profession. At the Speculative Society, in Edinburgh, he became acquainted with a number of young men of decided abilities, and, like himself, anxious aspirants after fame and fortune; and with two of these—Sydney Smith and Henry Brougham—he formed a literary intimacy which resulted in the establishment of the Edinburgh Review, originated by Smith, but confided to the editorial care of Jeffrey after the publication of the first three numbers. This responsible post was held by Jeffrey from July, 1803, to June, 1829, when he withdrew from the chair of the critic to occupy the post of Dean of the Faculty of Advocates, an office of distinction at the Scottish Bar. In 1830, Mr. Jeffrey was appointed Lord-Advocate; in February, 1831, he took his seat in Parliament, where he continued for more than three years, and in 1834 succeeded Lord Craigie in the Court of Session,—which position gave him the honorary title of Lord Jeffrey. He so demeaned himself in his high office as to secure the favour of all classes with whom he was brought into contact, and many a poor author who had writhed under the galling pen of the critic considered himself compensated by the courteous accents and bland manners of the judge.

"His great courtesy to the bar, and his singular patience, might be taken as models of judicial demeanour. But who shall tell the almost magic charm that he imparted to the dull routine of a Court of Justice? That he touched nothing which he did not adorn was the least of his praise. How many sat daily there, listening to the wonderful words of that now remarkable sage, replete with wisdom, eloquence, and legal lore,—catching those bright jewels which he scattered as profusely over the musty pages of a trumpery Record as if he were engaged on some immortal work! Let our young barristers who crowded that court-room tell how the dull shafts of legal argument came back from his quiver tipped with silver,—how strangely and wonderfully the bright flashes of his mind lighted up the darkest and dingiest recesses of the most technical walks of jurisprudence,—how known truths were decked, and dim, misty paths of logic were illumined, by his genius,—and how he seemed to have summoned the aid of all the Muses to assist at the solemnities of Themis. We may see great lawyers and great judges in our day, but we shall never look upon his like again."—North British Review, xiii. 283.

We should not omit to state that in 1820 Jeffrey was elected Lord-Rector of the University of Glasgow, a grateful tribute from his Alma Mater.

Of the personal appearance of Lord Jeffrey we have the following portrait:

"In person the subject of our memoir was of low stature; but his figure, which he tried to set off to the best advantage, was elegant and well proportioned. His features were continually varying in expression, and were said to have baffled our best artists. The face was rather elongated, the chin deficient, the mouth well formed, with a mingled expression of determination, sentiment, and mockery. The eye was the most peculiar feature of the countenance: it was large and sparkling, but with a want of transparency."—Sketches of the Scottish Bar.

It was in 1815 that Jeffrey "set up his rustic household-gods" at Craigcrook, near Edinburgh, where he continued to pass his summers until the year of his death. There he entertained his numerous guests in a manner of which Lord Cockburn has given us a graphic picture:

"No unofficial house in Scotland," says his Lordship, "has had a greater influence on literary or political opinion. Beautiful though the spot, as he has kept it, is, its deepest interest arises from its being the residence of such a man. Nothing can efface the days they have passed there from the recollection of his friends. Their rural festivities are dignified by his virtues and talents, by all our Edinburgh eminence, and by almost every interesting stranger. The Craigcrook Saturdays during the summer session!"—Lord Cockburn's Memorials of his Time, 1856.

Lord Jeffrey was married twice,—first, in 1801, to Catherine, daughter of the Rev. Dr. Wilson, of St. Andrew's; and secondly, in 1813, to Charlotte, daughter of Charles Wilkes, of New York, and grand-niece of the celebrated John Wilkes, of London.

The history of the Edinburgh Review is one of the most interesting pages in the annals of English Literature; and ample details respecting this periodical, and its influence upon letters, will be found in the authorities quoted from or referred to in this article, and in other works familiar to many of our readers. It was successful from the commencement; and in the space of six years the circulation had increased from 750 to about 9000. In 1813 the number of each copy printed was 12,000 to 13,000. The radical changes both in opinion and statutes introduced by its influence, at an early or later day, were remarkable indeed:

"To appreciate the value of the Edinburgh Review, the state of England at the period when that journal began should be had in remembrance. The Catholics were not emancipated—the Corporation and Test Act were unrepealed—the Game-Laws were horribly oppressive. Steel-Traps and Spring-Guns were set all over the country—Prisoners tried for their lives could have no Counsel—Lord Eldon and the Court of Chancery pressed heavily upon mankind—Libel was punished by the most cruel and vindictive imprisonments—the principles of Political Economy were little understood—the Law of Debt and of Conspiracy were upon the worst possible footing—the enormous wickedness of the Slave-Trade was tolerated—a thousand evils were in existence, which the talents of good and able men have since lessened or removed; and these effects have been not a little assisted by the honest boldness of the Edinburgh Review."—Rev. Sydney Smith, June, 1839: Preface to his Works.

"Previous to 1802, the literary periodicals of Great Britain were repositories of miscellanies relating to art, poetry, letters, and gossip,—partly original and partly selected,—huddled together without system, and making up a medley as varied and respectable as a first-class weekly newspaper of the present day. The criticisms of books were jejune in the extreme, consisting chiefly of a few smart witticisms and meagre connecting remarks, stringing together ample quotations from the work under review. They rarely ventured into deep water on philosophical subjects, and as seldom pushed out upon the tempestuous sea of political discussion. Perhaps one or two journals might plead a feeble exception to the general rule, but the mass were 'weary, stale, flat, and unprofitable.' The Edinburgh Review appeared. It bounded into the arena without the countenance of birth or station, without the imprimatur of the universities or literary clubs. Its avowed mission was to erect a higher standard of merit and secure a bolder and a purer taste in literature, and to apply philosophical principles and the maxims of truth and humanity to politics, aiming to be the manual of the scholar, the monitor of the statesman. As in its advent it had asked permission of no one to be, so, as to its future course, it asked no advice as to what it should do. Soliciting no quarter, promising no favours, its independent bearing and defiant tone broke the spell which held the mind of a nation in fetters. Its first number revived the discussion of great political principles. The splendid diction and searching philosophy of an essay on the causes and consequences of the French Revolution [written by Jeffrey] at once arrested the public eye, and stamped the character of the journal. Pedants in the pulpit, and scribblers of Rosa-Matilda verses in printed albums, saw, from other articles in the manifesto, that exterminating war was declared on their inanities and sentimentalities. The new journal was perused with avidity, and produced a sensation in all classes of readers, exciting admiration and envy, love and hatred, defiance and fear. It rapidly attained a large circulation, steadily rose to the highest position ever attained by any similar publication, reigned supreme in an empire of its own creation for a third of a century, accomplishing vast good mingled with no inconsiderable evil."—Stanton's Reforms and Reformers of Great Britain and Ireland.

"The commencement of the Edinburgh Review was the discovery of a new world in criticism, to which all authors were liable to be transported as criminals, and there dealt with according to laws made on the spot, and executed by those who made them. The speculation answered well, the adventurers grew rich and renowned, and their ambition increased with their wealth and celebrity."—James Montgomery: Lects. on General Lit., Poetry, &c.

But let us hear something on the other side:

"All were the better of a journal to which every one with an object of due importance had access, which it was in vain either to bully or to despise, and of the fame of which even its reasonable haters were inwardly proud. . . . Certainly it was not for want of warning that what were said to be its errors were persevered in. Its enemies, for several years, found great comfort in its abuse, which they vented in streams of pamphlets that make curious reading now. Instead of practising the moderation and candour the absence of which from the review is their great complaint, they almost uniformly exceed, by a hundredfold, most of the offences which they ascribe to it. But they are generally kind enough to admonish the wicked editor of the disgrace into which he is falling in the sight of all good men, and of the speedy extinction of his abominable work."—Lord Cockburn: Life of Lord Jeffrey, vol. i., 1852.

"It was not the principles of the Edinburgh Review, but the spirit, that was looked at with jealousy and alarm. The principles were by no means decidedly hostile to existing institutions, but the spirit was that of fair and free discussion: a field was open to argument and wit; every question was tried upon its own ostensible merits, and there was no foul play. The tone was that of a studied impartiality, (which may be called trimming,) or of a sceptical indifference. This tone of impartiality and indifference, however, did not at all suit those who profited or existed by abuses, who breathed the very air of corruption. They knew well enough that 'those who are not for them are against them.'"—Hazlitt's Spirit of the Age: Mr. Jeffrey.

"I hope you read the Edinburgh Review: it is far the best of our periodical publications. It is charged with severity; but the accusation is most loudly made by bad writers and their stupid admirers. For my part I am not displeased to see the laws of the republic of letters enforced with some rigour against delinquents who have too long enjoyed a scandalous impunity."—Sir James Mackintosh: Letter to M. Gentz, Feb. 5, 1804; in Mackintosh's Life, by his Son.

In connexion with Lord Cockburn's remarks, doubtless many amusing instances of indignant reviewed authorship will recur to the memory of our readers. Lord Byron's case we have already considered at large, and we now notice, in passing, the philosophical wrath of Wordsworth, who classed Robespierre, Buonaparte, and Jeffrey together as the three most formidable enemies of the human race who had appeared in his remembrance, and the schoolboy petulance of Southey, who says that Jeffrey's review of Madoc (Edin. Rev., Oct. 1805) "is very unfair and very uncivil."—Letter to Mrs. Southey, Oct. 16, 1805.

"To Jeffrey as an individual I shall ever be ready to show every kind of individual courtesy; but of Judge Jeffrey, of the Edinburgh Review, I must ever think and speak as a bad politician, a worse moralist, and a critic, in matters of taste, equally incompetent and unjust."—Letter to Walter Scott, Dec. 8, 1807; Southey's Life and Corresp.

Is there any thing in the world more ridiculous than the wailings of an author over the wounds which the arrows of criticism have inflicted upon his literary offspring? From the days of the "enemy" of the patient Job, was there ever yet a man who "wrote a book," and saw that book in the hands of the executioner, who was not laughed at by the "sympathizing" public" for his lamentations or his revilings? We shall do well to remember these amiable comments of ours when our own leviathan of a volume is passing "under the saws and harrows" of the Philistines.

Southey, indeed, had, long before the date of either of the remarks just quoted, expressed an unfavourable opinion of the Edinburgh periodical:

"Their philosophy appears in their belief in Hindoo chronology; and when they abuse Parr's style, it is rather a knock at the dead lion, old Johnson. A first number has great advantages; the reviewers say their say upon all subjects, and lay down the law, that contains the Institutes; by-and-by they can only comment."—Letter to C. W. W. Wynn, Dec. 22, 1802.

"The Edinburgh Review will not keep its ground. It consists of pamphlets instead of critical accounts."—Letter to S. T. Coleridge, March 14, 1803: Southey's Life and Corresp.

"But the "Edinburgh Review" has "kept its ground;" and many of its brilliant papers are, and always will be, read twenty times where Madoc, or any other work of Southey's, is or will be read once.

Lord Jeffrey's contributions to the Edinburgh Review extend over a period of almost half a century,—the first, (the first article in the first No., to which he contributed five papers,) Mounier sur la Révolution de France,—bearing date October, 1802, and the last—Watt or Cavendish?—given to the world January, 1818. The 98th No., pub. June, 1829, was the last he edited; and the review of the Memoirs of Lady Fanshawe, which appeared in October, 1829, was the last article he furnished as a regular contributor. His only papers after this date were Naval Tactics, April, 1830; Memoirs of Sir J. Mackintosh, October, 1835; Wilberforce's Correspondence, October, 1840; Watt or Cavendish? January, 1848. A list of his articles—200 in all—will be found in the Appendix to Lord Cockburn's Life of the Author. His biographer, and other friends, had often urged him, but in vain, to designate his articles; but at last, in December, 1840, Lord Cockburn found him in a yielding mood, and number after number of the Review was brought under examination, until the whole had been subjected to a rigid scrutiny. The results we have already stated. In 1843, he consented, at the request of the publishers of the Review, to make a selection from his contributions for the purpose of republication, and in this year appeared Contributions to the Edinburgh Review, by Francis Jeffrey, 4 vols. 8vo, £2 8*s.*; 2d edit., 1846, 3 vols. 8vo, £2 2*s.*; 3d ed., 1853, 1 vol. 8vo, pp. 1005, £1 1*s.*, with a general Index.

The contents of these edits. are the same. Of the 199 articles which had been contributed to the Review, (the 200th was pub. in Jan. 1848,) we have in this collection only 79, which are thus classified:—I. General Literature and Literary Biography, 10 articles; II. History and Historical Memoirs, 10 articles; III. Poetry, 22 articles; IV. Philosophy of the Mind, Metaphysics, and Jurisprudence, 6 articles; V. Novels, Tales, and Prose Works of Fiction, 8 articles; VI. General Politics, 6 articles; VII. Miscellanies, 17 articles. At the close of the collection are added Notice of the Honourable Henry Erskine, from The Edinburgh Courant, Oct. 16, 1817; Notice and Character of Professor Playfair, from an Edinburgh paper of Aug. 1819; Notice and Character of James Watt, from the Scotsman, Sept. 4, 1819. It is proper to state that the article entitled BEAUTY, contributed by Jeffrey to the Supplement to the Encyclopædia Britannica in 1824, (but prepared, Lord Cockburn says, in 1816,) is an enlargement of his review of Alison's Nature and Principles of Taste, pub. in the Edinburgh Review, May, 1811. In Jeffrey's collected Contributions to the Edinburgh Review, the article Beauty appears in its complete form as pub. in the Encyclopædia Britannica. We quote two rather antagonistic opinions upon this essay:

"Of all the treatises that have been published on the theory of taste, it is the most complete in its philosophy and the most delightful in its writing; and it is as sound as the subject admits of."—Lord Cockburn: Life of Lord Jeffrey, vol. i.

"Such works of the kind are more questionable in the principle, or more loose in the arrangement and argument."—Lyall's Age of Bacon, Philosophical Strictures, &c., Lon., 1856, 18–14.

There are still 121 of Jeffrey's contributions to the Edinburgh Review uncollected. This should be so no longer. Those subjects of his criticism who would have been aggrieved by the republication of the strictures of the reviewer have almost all passed away, and, if their reputation is so frail as to be affected by a little good-humoured ridicule, it is not worth preservation.

Our curious friends will be gratified to know that the authors of many of the articles in the Edinburgh Review will be found in the London Gentleman's Magazine for 1845, Pt. 1, 497–500, (articles in vols. i.–xv.;) ibid., Pt. 2, 585–589, (articles in vols. xvi.–xxxvii.)

A list of the authors of many of the contributions to the Quarterly Review will be found in the Gent. Mag. for 1844, Pt. 1, 137–141, (articles in vols. i.–xix.;) ibid., Pt. 1, 577–580, (articles in vols. xxi.–xxxix.;) 1845, Pt. 1, 599–602, (articles in vols. xli.–lix.; 1847, Pt. 2, 34–37, (articles in vols. lxi.–lxxviii.)

An interesting history of the Review and its contributors will be found in Lord Cockburn's Life of Lord Jeffrey. See also a paper on the originators of the Quarterly, in Gent. Mag., 1844, Pt. 1, p. 246; and see our life of WILLIAM GIFFORD, in this Dictionary.

We have already intimated that the formidable critic was a most agreeable companion,—that the lion of the Review was the lamb of the dinner-table and evening circle. Sometimes, however, even Jeffrey's politeness was not proof against boredom. There was "a time with him when patience ceased to be a virtue." Of one of these instances of human frailty we have an amusing account by Lady Holland:

"The reigning bore at this time in Edinburgh was ——; his favourite subject, the North Pole. It mattered not how far south you began, you found yourself transported to the North Pole before you could take breath. No one escaped him. My father declared he should invent a slip button. Jeffrey fled from him as from the plague, when possible, but one day his arch-tormentor met him in a narrow lane, and began instantly on the North Pole. Jeffrey, in despair, and out of all patience, darted past him, exclaiming 'Hang the North Pole!' My father met him shortly after, boiling with indignation at Jeffrey's contempt of the North Pole. 'Oh, my dear fellow,' said my father, 'never mind; no one minds what Jeffrey says, you know; he is a privileged person; he respects nothing—absolutely nothing. Why, you will scarcely believe it, but it is not more than a week ago that I heard him speak disrespectfully of the equator.'"—Memoir of the Rev. Sydney Smith.

We may be permitted, in passing, to observe that, of Lord Jeffrey's 200 papers in the Edinburgh Review, almost if not quite every one is either quoted from or referred to in this Dictionary. This article is already sufficiently long, but we feel unwilling to close it without at least a few quotations,—without a few reviews of the great reviewer:

"He was not so much distinguished by the predominance of any one great quality as by the union of several of the finest. Rapidity of intellect, instead of misleading, as it often does, was combined in him with great soundness; and a high condition of the reasoning powers with an active and delightful fancy. Though not what is termed learned, his knowledge was various; and on literature, politics, and the philosophy of life, it was deep. A taste exquisitely delicate and largely exercised was one of the great sources of his enjoyment, and of his unmatched critical skill."—LORD COCKBURN: Life of Lord Jeffrey.

"He is thoroughly acquainted with the progress and pretensions of modern literature and philosophy; and to this he adds the natural acuteness and discrimination of the logician with the habitual caution and coolness of his profession. . . . The characteristics of Mr. Jeffrey's general style as a writer correspond, we think, with what we have stated as the characteristics of his mind. He is a master of the foils: he makes an exulting display of the dazzling fence of wit and argument. His strength consists in a great range of knowledge, an equal familiarity with the principles and the details of a subject, and in a glancing brilliancy and rapidity of style. Indeed, we doubt whether the brilliancy of his manner does not resolve itself into the rapidity, the variety and aptness of his illustrations. His pen is never at a loss, never stands still; and would dazzle for this reason alone, like an eye that is ever in motion. Mr. Jeffrey is far from a flowery or affected writer: he has few tropes or figures, still less any odd startling thoughts or quaint innovations in expression: but he has a constant supply of ingenious solutions and pertinent examples; he never proses, never grows dull, never wears an argument to tatters; and, by the number, the liveliness, and facility of his transitions, keeps that appearance of vivacity, of novel and sparkling effect, for which others are too often indebted to singularity of combination or tinsel ornaments."—Hazlitt's Spirit of the Age.

No one denies all this: but less partial critics can see defects as well as beauties; and less partial critics therefore must be allowed to give an opinion in the premises:

"What then is wanting to enable him to fill the judgment-seat of criticism with honour to himself and with profit to others? He wants imagination. He not only has little imagination of his own, but he does not perceive that no work of genius can exist without it; that it is the preserving soul which makes works immortal. Wherever he has met with it, he looks upon it with the eye of contempt, and casts it from him, as the Arabs did the Oriental pearls in the wilderness. This is the chief secret of the scorn which he has heaped on the chief poets of the day: his reviews of Scott, Wordsworth, Southey, Coleridge, and Montgomery, all exhibit the original deficiency of the critic: they are not judged by their pens; he cannot judge them: they have risen beyond his reach, into the atmosphere of imagination. To his upturned and wondering eyes, such flights are folly, and he thinks that genius, like Antæus, must die when it forsakes the ground. Had Jeffrey possessed imagination, he would never have penned the insulting reviews to which I allude. His criticisms did great injury to the cause of literature: his sarcastic strictures tamed down the elastic and bounding spirit of man; poets wrote with the fear of the critic upon them, and dreaded the universal laugh of the world. Birds seldom sing well when the kite is in the air, and bards dreaded the Judge Jeffrey of our day as much as political offenders dreaded the Judge Jeffreys of James the Second. By criticisms such as this, true genius is defrauded of its fame for a time, and elegant and polished mediocrity prospers and flourishes. Where are many of the writers he has praised? gone to oblivion, with all their point and their glitter. Where are some of the writers he has traduced and abused? sitting on the highest pinnacles of fame."—Allan Cunningham's Biog. and Crit. Hist. of the Lit. of the Last Fifty Years, 1833

"Such being the nature of true Poets and true poetry, and such the light in which they are regarded by the race whom they elevate,—what, pray, it may be asked, did Mr. Jeffrey mean t'other day, by saying that all the Poets of this Age are forgotten? [See Edin. Rev., No. 95.] There are few people whom we love and admire more than Mr. Jeffrey,—though we believe he does not know it; but why will he, in his elegant and graceful way, speak such nonsense? Scott, Byron, Southey, Coleridge, Wordsworth, Moore, are, he assures us, already all forgotten—or nearly so,—fading away,—mere specks on the distant horizon of men's clouded memories! Why, our dear sir, you might just as well affirm that the stars are forgotten, because thousands of coachfuls of people, coming and going to and from evening parties, are not at the time aware that the heavens are full of them, that shepherds are watching by them on the hills, and sailors sailing by them on the seas, and astronomers counting them in observatories and occasionally discovering one that had been invisible to the moleseyes of men since the creation. Yet in all the nonsense Mr. Jeffrey ever spoke, or may speak, you always may find some grains of sense: for who doubts his sagacity and his genius? Not one of our great or good living Poets is forgotten at this hour by Mr. Jeffrey himself, nor any of those critiques of his own, either, in which he did noble justice to some of them and ignoble injustice to others, according to the transient or permanent moods by which his taste, feeling, and judgment were swayed. Nor are his critiques themselves likely to be forgotten,—soon or ever; for many of them belong, we verily believe, to our philosophical literature. But they hold the tenure of their existence by the existence of the poetry which they sought to illustrate or obscure: from the 'golden urns of those Poets' did he 'draw light,'—the light in which he is himself conspicuous; and, were it extinguished, his literary life would be a blank."—Professor Wilson: Blackw. Mag., Feb. 1830; and in his Essays Critical and Imaginative, Edin. and Lon., 1856, i. 355, 356. See also Blackw. Mag., June, 1828; or Essays, i. 245.

"Our very ideas of what is poetry," says Sir Walter Scott of Jeffrey, "differ so widely, that we rarely talk upon these subjects. There is something in his mode of reasoning that leads me greatly to doubt whether, notwithstanding the vivacity of his imagination, he really has any feeling of poetical genius, or whether he has worn it all off by perpetually sharpening his wit on the grindstone of criticism. . . . I should be glad for his own sake that he took some opportunity to retrace the paths of his criticism; but, after pledging himself so deeply as he has done, I doubt much his giving way, even unto conviction."—Sir Walter Scott to Joanna Baillie, Jan. 17 and April 4, 1812; Lockhart's Life of Scott.

"But, with my friend Jeffrey's pardon, I think he loves to see imagination best when it is bitted and managed, and ridden upon the grand pas. He does not make allowance for starts and sallies and bounds, when Pegasus is beautiful to behold, though sometimes perilous to his rider."—Scott's Diary, Jan. 1, 1827: ubi supra.

"The celebrated editor of this work, [Edinburgh Review,] with little imagination, little genuine wit, and no clear view of any great and central principles of criticism, has contrived to dazzle, to astonish, and occasionally to delight, multitudes of readers, and, at one period, to hold the temporary fate of authors at his will. His qualifications are all singularly adapted to his office. Without deep feeling, which few can understand, he has a quick sensibility, with which all sympathize: without a command of images, he has a glittering radiance of words which the most superficial may admire: neither too hard-hearted always to refuse his admiration, nor too kindly to suppress a sneer, he has been enabled to appear most witty, most wise, and most eloquent, to those who have chosen him for their oracle."—Sir N. Talfourd: Crit. and Miscell. Writings.

"Jeffrey, who took the lead in this great revolution in literature, was a very remarkable man, but more so from the light, airy turn of his mind, and the felicity of illustration which he possessed, than from either originality of thought or nervous force of expression. His information was far from extensive: he shared in the deficiency of his country at that period in classical knowledge; he was ignorant of Italian and German; and his acquaintance with French literature was chiefly confined to the gossiping memoirs of the day, and, with that of his own country, to the writings of the Scotch metaphysicians or the old English dramatists. But these subjects he knew thoroughly: within these limits he was thoroughly master. He was fitted by nature to be a great critic. A passionate admirer of poetry, alive to all the beauties and influences of nature, with a feeling mind and a sensitive heart, he possessed at the same time the calm judgment which enabled him to form an impartial opinion on the works submitted to his examination, and the correct taste which, in general, discovered genius and detected imperfections in them."—Sir Archibald Alison: Hist. of Europe, 1816–52, chap. v. Lippincott & Co., Philadelphia. We have already noticed this excellent work in our article on Richard Arnald, p. 69. Several years have elapsed since we penned that commendation, but the Comprehensive Commentary still stands without a rival for the purpose for which it is intended. Since writing the above, we were pleased to find the following weighty endorsement of our eulogy:

"This compilation exhibits a combination of all that is valuable in the deservedly-esteemed commentaries of Henry and Scott on the entire Bible and of Doddridge on the New Testament. The notes are compiled from the various critics enumerated on the title-page, and, in general, the selection is made with judgment."—Horne's Bibl. Bib.

We must object, however, to the phrase "all that is valuable," &c. What is there in Henry, Scott, or Doddridge, entirely without value? Among Dr. J.'s other publications is, 2. Explan. Bible Atlas and Scripture Gazetteer, 1849, 4to.

Jenyns, Soame, M.P., 1703–04–1787, the son of Sir Roger Jenyns, and educated at St. John's College, Cambridge, was noted as a politician, an essayist, an infidel, and subsequently as a champion of Christianity. He was for nearly forty years Member of Parliament, for twenty-five years a Commissioner of the Board of Trade, and for a longer term than either of these a noted wit and conversationist. The following is a list of his works: 1. Art of Dancing, a Poem, 1730. Anon. 2. Epistle to Lord Lovelace, 1735. 3. Poems, 1752; and with the Origin of Evil, 1761, 2 vols. 12mo. See No. 4. These poems originally appeared in Dodsley's Collection. They were added to the 2d and 3d edits. of Dr. Johnson's English Poets. 4. Free Inquiry into the Nature and Origin of Evil, 1757. With his Poems, 1761, 2 vols. 12mo. Ridiculed by Dr. Johnson in the Literary Gazette:

"Johnson's most exquisite critical essay in the Literary Magazine, and indeed anywhere, is his review of Soame Jenyns's Inquiry into the Origin of Evil."—Boswell's Life of Johnson, q. v.

And see The Idler, No. 89, Dec. 29, 1759. The Review was so much liked that Johnson republished it in a pamphlet. It has been styled on high authority the best of his writings: but who shall decide questions of this nature? A review of the Origin of Evil, and other works of its author, will be found in Green's Diary of a Lover of Literature. Of the first-named, Green remarks:

"Extremely ingenious and wretchedly unsatisfactory. . . . With all its paradoxical ingenuity, there appear to me only two truly original thoughts in this work."—Ipswich, 1810, p. 33.

5. Thoughts, &c. on the Present High Price of Provisions, 1767.

"A very flimsy publication."—McCulloch's Lit. of Polit. Econ., 1845, 193, q. v.

6. Miscellanies, 1770, 8vo. 7. View of the Internal Evidence of the Christian Religion, 1776, 12mo; 10th ed., 1796, 8vo, and since. The last ed. is included in the vol. entitled Christian Evidences, pub. by H. G. Bohn, and edited by Rev. J. S. Memes, LL.D., 1849, r. 8vo. (This valuable book should be in every library.) The examination of the Holy Scriptures dissipated Jenyns's infidelity, and his anxiety to save others from skepticism produced this and other theological essays. Jenyns's View excited much controversy, and was attacked by several of the clergy, who disapproved of some of its sentiments. Even the sincerity of the author was called in question and he was charged with intending to injure Christianity, which he pretended to defend. But we have good evidence of Jenyns's honesty, and also of his piety. We quote some commendations of his View:

"A work of very considerable shrewdness and ingenuity, in which many striking views of Christianity are adduced in support of its heavenly origin."—Orme's Bibl. Bib.

"I confess myself to have been powerfully impressed by Mr. Jenyns's leading arguments in defence of Christianity."—Green's Diary, ubi supra.

"The work, brief and unpresuming enough, nevertheless did religion more good service than many of much higher pretensions. The argument was of a popular kind: it derived force, too, as coming from one who was a layman and a wit."—Lon Quar. Rev.

"The force of the argument addressed to the feelings of ingenious thinkers, and adapted to the reach of every understanding, is greater than mere scholars are willing to allow, and was never represented to so much advantage as in the beautiful little Treatise entitled A View of the Internal Evidence of Christianity."—Mr. Mainwaring, of Cambridge: Dissertation

We next quote some opinions more qualified in their tone:

"The book is very ingenious: perhaps he brings rather too much ingenuity into his religion. I know, however, an instance in which this little work has converted a philosophical infidel, who had previously read all that had been written on the subject without effect."—Hannah More.

What deplorable carelessness of expression is here! So far from this "philosophical" gentleman's having read "all that had been written on the subject," we will venture to say that he had never either read or heard of the one-tenth part that had been written on the subject. Nothing is more common than the observation, "This is the only book on the subject," or, "This is the best book on the subject." The first assertion may be said to be never true; and if the last is ever correct, say one in ten thousand instances, how is it to be proved? Let us avoid such childish extravagance of assertion. A man of true learning is rarely guilty of so great a fault.

"Dr. Mayo having asked Johnson's opinion of Soame Jenyns's View of the Internal Evidence of the Christian Religion,—Johnson 'I think it a pretty book; not very theological, indeed; and there seems to be an affectation of ease and carelessness, as if it were not suitable to his character to be very serious about the matter.'"—Boswell's Life of Johnson.

"As a whole, it is admitted to be the best treatise in its particular range, yet given to the world, but in some respects, differing according to the source whence the censure comes, the disapproval of its individual doctrines and reasonings is almost as universal."—Dr. Memes: Christian Evidences.

A list of the principal pamphlets elicited by Jenyns's View will be found in Chalmers's Biog. Dict., xviii. 320, n. 8. Disquisitions on Several Subjects, 1782, 8vo. See a review of this vol. in Green's Diary of a Lover of Lit., Ipswich, 1810, 226–227, and another in the London Retrospective Rev., Lon., 1820, ii. 291–304.

"We venture to assert that there are few books in the language of the same size [pp. 182] as the little volume before us containing more acute and ingenious reasoning, abounding in more lively illustration or more elegant and polished composition."—Retrosp. Rev., ubi supra.

9. The Works of Soame Jenyns, 1790, 4 vols. 8vo; 1793, 4 vols. 8vo. Includes Pieces never before published, and biography of the author by Charles Nelson Cole. See Green's Diary of a Lover of Lit., Ipswich, 1810, 222–226; Orme's Bibl. Bib. 10. Tracts on the Holy Trinity, the Creeds, &c. &c., 1814, 8vo. Jenyns also wrote some political essays. He perpetrated a satirical epitaph upon Dr. Johnson—shortly after the death of the latter—in which Boswell was remembered:

"Boswell and Thrale, retailers of his wit,
Will tell you how he wrote, and talk'd, and cough'd, and spit."

For this offence Boswell took terrible vengeance in an Epitaph on Jenyns. See Croker's Boswell's Johnson, Lon., 1848, p. 106. See also pp. 68, 392, 509, 590, 593; Life by Cole, prefixed to Jenyns's Works.

"His Poetry does not rise above mediocrity: indeed, it scarcely deserves the name: but the style of his prose is smooth and lucid, his turns of thought are neat and unexpected; and when he sports in irony, in which he apparently delights to indulge, he is uncommonly playful and airy. . . . Jenyns has evidently a predilection for paradoxical opinions: and why, he might reasonably urge in his defence, should a man address the Public who has nothing new to offer to it?"—Green's Diary of a Lover of Lit., Ipswich, 1810, 226.

As a political writer, Jenyns was the champion of principles which are now very generally disowned by Englishmen. He defended both the right and the expediency of taxing the American Colonies, (see his tract on American Taxation,) and in his reflections on Parliamentary Reform he ridicules the idea of an independent Parliament. Professor Smyth, in speaking of the unavoidable influence of party predilections and the necessity of party co-operation, remarks:

"Read the works of Soame Jenyns and of Locke. Would not both of these men, for instance while they retained their integrity, have been seen always on the opposite sides of any question that could affect the constitution and government of a free country?"—Lects on Mod. Hist., Lect. 24.

Cumberland, in his Memoirs, gives us a graphic picture of Soame Jenyns, which is declared by Lord Jeffray to be excellent, and a portion of which we had intended to quote; but, as our article has now grown to a length which forbids this, we must refer the reader to the Memoirs, or to Lord Jeffrey's review of that work in Edin. Rev. for April, 1806, and in his Contrib. to the Edin. Rev., Lon., 1853, 911–917.

Jephson, Robert, 1736–1803, a native of Ireland, a Captain in the army, and a member of the Irish House of Commons, pub. a number of dramatic pieces, of which the tragedies of Braganza, 1775, 8vo, and the Count of Narbonne, 1781, 8vo, were the most popular. He also pub. a collection of poems called Roman Portraits, 1797, 4to. The illustrative notes in this vol. are from the pen of Mr. Malone. See Malone's Life of W. Gerard Hamilton; Biog. Jerdan, William, b. 1782, for thirty four years (1817–50) editor of the London Literary Gazette, is a native of Kelso, Roxburghshire, Scotland. Mr Jerdan wrote the Biographical Memoirs for Fisher's National Portrait Gallery of Illustrious and eminent Persons, has pub. some translations from the French, &c., and been connected with several journals. An account of his literary labours will be found in his Autobiography, Lon., 1852–53, 4 vols. p. 8vo. See also Men of the Time, Lon., 1856; Noctes Ambrosianæ, May, 1828; Fraser's Mag., i. 695, with a portrait. This portrait was the first of the Gallery of Illustrious Literary Characters, all drawn by Daniel Maclise, now R.A: see Maginn's Fraserian Papers, by Dr R. S Mackenzie, New York, 1857, lxvi. The letter-press which accompanied each plate was nearly all written by Maginn.

"They are marked by the same originality and vigour of expression, the same richness of imagery and illustration, the same large views and catholic spirit, and the same depth and fervour of devotional feeling, which so remarkably distinguished the preceding Series, and which rendered it a most valuable accession to our theological literature."—From Dr Jeremie's Preface.

"We would recommend them to our readers, not only for their force and subtlety of thought, brilliancy of fancy, and exuberant eloquence of words, but for that spirit of love—that profound and glowing devotion—by which they are animated, and with which no one can come into sympathizing contact without feeling himself elevated and refined."—North British Review.

Jerningham, Sir Wm. Papers rel. to the Baronies of Stafford, 1807, 4to. Privately printed.

Jerrold, Douglas, 1803–1857, a native of Sheerness, in Kent, after being a midshipman in the Royal Navy, and subsequently a printer, had his fate decided for authorship by the success of the drama of Black-Eyed Susan, written before he was of age. This piece was followed by The Rent-Day, Nell Gwynne, The Bubbles of the Day, Time Works Wonders, The Catspaw, Retired from Business, Cupid, The Prisoner of War, The Heart of Gold, &c. As a contributor to Punch, and as editor of The Heads of the People, the Illuminated Magazine, the Shilling Magazine, and Lloyd's Weekly, Mr. Jerrold has won new laurels in another department of authorship. We append an alphabatical list of his productions, as pub. in vol. form. 1. Bubbles of the Day, a Comedy; 2d ed., 1845, 8vo. 2. A collective ed. of the works of this popular author was pub. in 8 vols. 12mo, 1851–54; reviewed in the Lon. Athenæum, 1854, 1293–1295. See also Men of the Time, Lon., 1856; N. York Eclec. Mag., xi. 443, with portrait. The Athenæum commends Mr. Jerrold's works in high terms:

"A reperusal of them serves to confirm our original opinion that their object is to advance the good of mankind: that to this object there has been a devotion of rare skill, undoubted originality, imperturbable good temper, concealed, perhaps, occasionally under apparent fierceness of phrase and a force and flash of wit at once dazzling and delightful. A body of works more original, either in the artistic construction or in the informing spirit, has not been added to the national literature of our time."—Lon. Athen., 1854, 1293; The Writings of Douglas Jerrold.

The Wit and Opinions of Douglas Jerrold, edited by William Blanchard Jerrold, and originally pub. in the London National Magazine, appeared in book-form in 1858; and the Life and Letters of Douglas Jerrold, edited by W. B. Jerrold, were announced same year. See also Douglas Jerrold's Portfolio of Well-Known Portraits, drawn by Kenny Meadows, with a Biographical and Critical Essay by E. L. Blanchard, 1857, p. 8vo; the obituary notice of Jerrold in Lon. Gent. Mag., July, 1857, 91–94; and the London Athenæum, 1858.

"Jerrold was truly a man of a large heart, as well as of a great original genius. He never lost an opportunity of labouring in any act of benevolence that his sense of duty set before him; and his last words were those of affection towards all with whom he has been associated in friendship,—to him a sacred relation."—*Lon. Jewel, Edward. The Stomach, &c., Lon., 1678, 4to.

Jewel, or Jewell, John, D.D., 1522–1571, a native of Devonshire, admitted of Merton College, Oxford, 1535, was in 1539 chosen scholar of Corpus Christi College, and subsequently became Reader of Humanity and Rhetoric in his college. In 1546 he professed himself a convert to the doctrines of the Reformation, and his zeal in disseminating his opinions led to his expulsion from his college. On the accession of Queen Mary in 1554, he fled to the Continent, and remained abroad until the year after Elizabeth ascended the throne; in 1560 he was consecrated Bishop of Salisbury, and in 1562 gave to the world, in elegant Latin, the most famous of his writings,—Apologia Ecclesiæ Anglicanæ. His unwearied labours in the discharge of the duties of his episcopate, and his unremitting devotion to study, brought on a state of physical exhaustion, which resulted fatally on the 22d of Sept. 1571, in the fiftieth year of his age. He was noted for his wonderful powers of memory, profound learning, and exemplary piety. A collective edition of his works, which consist principally of treatises in defence of the Church of England against Romanism, was pub. in 1609, fol.; 1611, fol.; 1631, fol., 1711, fol. See edits. of separate publications in Watt's Bibl. Brit. There are two recent edits. of his collected works,—viz: edited for the Parker Society by the Rev. John Ayre, Camb., 1845–50, 4 vols. sm. fol., £1 10s.; edited by R. W. Jelf, D.D., Oxf., 1847–48, 8 vols. 8vo, £3 12s. Of his Apology, and other pieces pub. separately, there have been many editions. His Challenge Sermon, preached at St. Paul's Cross, March 30, 1560, is considered one of the best specimens of his eloquence. See Life prefixed to the octavo edit. of the Apology, 1685; reprinted in Wordsworth's Eccles. Biog.; Burnet's Hist. of the Reformation, Holingshed's Chronicle; Biog. Brit.; Bliss's Wood's Athen Oxon.; Fuller's Abel Redivivus; his Church History; Strype's Life of Cranmer, of Parker; Prince's Worthies of Devon; Chalmers's Biog. Dict.; Lowndes's Brit. Lib., 271, 598, 1037, 1038, 1039, 1269; C. W. Le Bas's Life of Jewel, 1835, 12mo. (Reviewed in British Critic, xviii. 38.) Jewel's Apology came out, Strype says, "to the abundant establishment of this reformed church upon antiquity."

"Jewel's Apology is an account of the grounds of our separation from the Church of Rome as maintained after the separation had finally taken place. It was publicly received and allowed, and has also a claim to the attention of the reader, both for its clearness of [illegible] and elegance of language."—BISHOP RANDOLPH: Enchiridion Theologicum

"[illegible] of our best books." BISHOP BURNET.

Will especially reward perusal." — DR. KENNETH.

This short book is written with spirit; the style is terse, the [illegible] pointed, the authorities much to the purpose; so that effects are not surprising. This treatise is written in Latin; his [illegible] of the Apology, a much more diffuse work, in English. Upon the merits of the controversy of Jewell with the Jesuit Harding, who [illegible] the defence unbecoming, I am not competent to give any [illegible] in length and learning it far surpasses our earlier polemical literature."—Hallam's Lit. Hist. of Europe, 4th ed., Lon., 1854, i. 561.

To the controversy with Harding we have already referred: see HARDING, THOMAS, and authorities there cited.

"The Church of England may be best studied in the writings of Jewell, as regards its separation from the Romanist."—BISHOP WARBURTON.

"For the answer to any question respecting the genuine sense of the documents of the Church of England, I consult no other author-ity." — ARCH. JACKSON, D.D. Dean of Christ Church.

"Jewell is eminent for his extensive learning, his sound views, and his Christian eloquence. All his works are valuable. . . . The finest Christian eloquence, deep learning, sound wisdom, and evangelical piety mark the writings of this Reformer." — Bickersteth's N.

"[illegible] contemporary of Archbishop Parker, Bishop Jewell, Bishop [illegible] united a more glowing style and [illegible] whose [illegible] Jewell was indeed the most accomplished scholar who [illegible] appeared in the reformed Church of England."—Cubitt-ende's Lectures on the Church of England.

"One of the greatest lights that the reformed Church of England hath produced." — WOOD: Athen Oxon.

"Jewell's character cannot be too highly revered, or too respectfully spoken of." — DR. BLISS: ubi supra.

"The Jewel of Bishops the worthiest Divine that Christendom hath bred for some hundred of years."—RICHARD HOOKER, author of the Ecclesiast. Polity.

"It may be [illegible] his surname, nomen omen; Jewel his name and precious his virtues: so that, if the like ambition led us Englishmen, who [illegible] foreigners, spontaneously to render our surnames in Greek or Latin, he may be termed Johannes Gemma, or better account than Gemma Prisius entitleth himself thereunto."—Fuller's Worthies of Devonshire.

Jewett, Charles. Temperance Lectures, Poems, Reviews, &c., Bost., 12mo.

Jewett, Charles Coffin, a learned American bibliographer and linguist, was born Aug. 12, 1816, graduated at Brown University, 1835; appointed Prof. of Modern Languages at Brown Univ., and Assistant Secretary of the Smithsonian Institution. Mr. Jewett resides in Boston. 1. Catalogue of the Library of Brown University, Providence. 1843, 8vo, pp. 560. 2. Facts and Considerations relative to Duties on Books, 1846, 8vo, pp. 24. 3. Catalogues of Libraries and their publications by means of separate stereotyped Titles; with Rules and Examples, 1852, 8vo; 1853, 8vo, pp. 96, 2d ed. Contributions to the Proceedings of the American Association for the Advancement of Science, Hunt's Merchants' Magazine.

Cicero beautifully calls the library "the Soul of the House:" Professor Jewett, with a noble ambition, has zealously striven to provide such a soul for this great Republic, by his intelligent labours in connexion with the Smithsonian Institution, at Washington. We trust that he will yet see that magnificent temple adorned—not only with "goodly stones," (which sometimes preach any thing but profitable "sermons,") but—with the recorded learning of all ages, and the teachings of wisdom of every clime. A great National Library would be, indeed, a National Honour, a National Blessing, and a priceless boon, alike to the present generation, and to the countless millions who are to take our places, enter into our labours, and control the destinies of our country when we are no more!

Jewett, Isaac A. Passages in Foreign Travel, Bost., 1838, 2 vols. 12mo.

Jewett, J. R. Narrative of Captivity and Suffering at Nootka Sound, Hartford, 12mo.

Jewett, J. L., has edited Ollendorff's New Method of Learning French, Spiers's French Dictionary, &c., and contributed vocabularies of French words to De Fivas's Classic French Reader, and to Rowan's Modern French Reader.

Jewett, Milo P., late minister of the Presbyterian Church, and Professor in Marietta College, Ohio, was born in 1808, at St. Johnsbury, Vermont; graduated at Andover Theolog. Seminary, 1838. The Mode and Subjects of Baptism, Bost.; 12 edns. pub. Highly commended by the Rev. J. R. Graves, editor of Tennessee Baptist.

Mr. Jewett was among the first to introduce the Common-School System into Ohio and Alabama.

Jewsbury, Miss Geraldine E., a native of Manchester, England, and a younger sister of the late Mrs. Fletcher, formerly Maria Jane Jewsbury, has given to the world a number of novels: 1. Zoe: the History of two Lives, Lon., 1845, 3 vols. p. 8vo.

"We should imagine Miss Jewsbury better qualified to succeed in essays and speculative papers, than in descriptions of character as it is, or society as it has been."—Lon. Athen., 1845, 114.

"This novel made a sensation in its day, but its reputation was rather of an equivocal kind."—Lon. Times, 1855, where will be found a brief notice of Nos. 1, 2, 3, and 6.

2. The Half-Sisters, 1848, 2 vols. p. 8vo; 1851, 12mo.

"Displays, like its precursor, very considerable intellectual powers, a shrewd observance of character, and a general talent, or more strength than refinement, and, indeed, wanting only some polish to its roughness to raise it much higher in the intellectual scale."—Lon. Lit. Gaz., 1848, 194-196. See No. 1.

7. The Sorrows of Gentility, 1856, 2 vols. p. 8vo.

"A remarkably good novel; well written, amusing, sensible, and firm to its purpose."—Lon. Examiner.

Jewsbury, Maria Jane, 1800?-1833, a native of Warwickshire, but a resident of Manchester the principal part of her life, was married in 1833 to the Rev. William Fletcher, whom she accompanied, shortly after her marriage, on a religious mission to India. She fell a victim to cholera soon after her arrival at Bombay. Miss Jewsbury contributed many articles to the Lon. Athenæum and other periodicals, which have never been collected. She pub. the following vols.: 1. Phantasmagoria: or, Sketches of Life and Literature. 2. Letters to the Young: 5th ed., 1843, fp. 8vo. 3. Lays of Leisure Hours. 4. Three Histories; new ed., 1844, fp. 8vo. The last-named work is a great favourite.

"Her enthusiasm was ardent, her piety steadfast, and her great talents would have enabled her to be eminently useful in the path to which she had been called. . . . In one quality—quickness in the motions of her mind—she was, in the author's estimation, unrivalled."—WORDSWORTH, the poet, an intimate friend of Miss Jewsbury.

"Miss Jewsbury the elder was one of our coadjutors in the long-past days of our struggle. . . . Quicker impulses, sounder conclusions, an imagination more fanciful, purposes more noble, or a more eager thirst after wisdom and goodness for their own sakes, have rarely distinguished any of the honourable and honoured line of authoresses. . . . There is no forgetting Miss Jewsbury whenever the gifted women of England are brought under notice."—Lon. Athenæum, 1845, 114.

John of Beverley, the founder of the Abbey of Beverley, d. 721, is said by Bede to have written some Homilies and Epistles; but there is no work extant bearing his name. See Wright's Biog. Brit. Lit., Anglo-Saxon Period, and authorities there cited.

John of Beverley, a Carmelite professor of divinity at Oxford about 1390, was the author of some questions on the Master of the Sentences, and some controversial pieces.

John of Brompton, Abbot of Jervaux, in Yorkshire, in 1193, is the reputed author of a Chronicle of English History, 588-1198; but it is very doubtful whether it is properly ascribed to him. See Wright's Biog. Brit. Lit., Anglo-Norman Period, and authorities there cited.

John of Cornwall, flourished 1170, was the author of three theological treatises, the principal one of which—relating to the humanity of Christ—is known by the title of Eulogium, and was given to the world about 1169 or '70. See Wright's Biog. Brit. Lit., Anglo-Norman Period, and authorities there cited.

John de Hauteville, flourished 1184, was the author of a poem entitled Architrenius, and is supposed, without probability, to have written some other poetical pieces. See Wright's Biog. Brit. Lit., Anglo-Norman Period, and authorities there cited.

John of Gaddesden. See GADDESDEN, JOHN OF.

John of Salisbury, 1120?-1180, a native of Salisbury, studied at Oxford and Paris, opened a school in the latter place, subsequently lived in England as secretary to Theobald, Archbishop of Canterbury, and to his successor, Thomas à Becket, and, in 1176, was made Bishop of Chartres by the recommendation of Louis of France. His placipal works are his Polyeraticus de nugis curialium et vestigiis philosophorum; a metrical treatise entitled Enthetieus de dogmate philosophorum; the Metalogicus; his epistles, and a life of Thomas à Becket.

"As a writer, John of Salisbury is estimable for his great erudition, and for the general correctness of his style."—Wright's Biog. Brit. Lit., Anglo-Norman Period, q. v. for a notice of this writer and editions of his works.

Since the publication of Mr. Wright's invaluable work, a new edition—and the best—has appeared,—viz.: Opera Omnia, nunc primum in unum collegit, et cum codicibus manuscriptis contulit J. A. Giles, Oxon., 1848. 5 vols. 8vo.

"John of Salisbury was the intimate friend of Thomas à Becket. He appears to have been an unsparing and just censurer both of friends and foes. His Polier teus is a work on the follies of courtiers and philosophers."—Clarke's Sacred Literature.

Chronicles of Eug. de Monstrelet, 1809, 5 vols. 4to, 25 copies, large paper, in fol.; 2d ed., 1810, 12 vols. 8vo, plates in 4to; 1840, 2 vols. imp. 8vo. Col. Johnes also pub. a trans. of St. Palaye's Memoirs of the Life of Froissart, 1803, 8vo, and A Cardiganshire Landlord's Advice to his Tenants. We have already devoted so much space to Froissart, (and some to Monstrelet,) that no comments should be expected here. See BERNERS, JOHN BOURCHIER, Lord. For particulars respecting Col. Johnes, his mansion, and his splendid library, see A Tour to Hafod, by Sir James Edward Smith, 1810, sup. r. fol., price 12 guineas; Dibdin's Bibliographical Decameron, and his Library Companion; Green's Diary of a Lover of Lit.; Gen. Lit. In 1807, the splendid mansion of Col. Johnes, with much of its valuable contents, was destroyed by fire: the loss amounted to £70,000. The energetic Bibliomaniac, however, was not to be discouraged, and built and adorned a new edifice. Evelyn would have been delighted with the colonel, for he planted above three millions of trees on his Cardiganshire estates.

Johnson, Samuel, 1649–1703, a native of Warwickshire, educated at Trinity Coll., Cambridge, Rector of Corringham, Essex, 1670, and subsequently chaplain to Lord William Russell, distinguished himself by his courageous opposition to the despotism of James II. and this monarch's efforts to extend Popery in Great Britain. He pub. several controversial treatises and sermons, of which a collective ed., with his life, was pub. in 1710, fol.; in 1713, fol.; and again in 1737, fol. In 1682, he pub. Julian the Apostate, intended to disprove the doctrine of passive obedience to the government. This work was (as we have already seen, p. 841 of this Dictionary) answered by Dr George Hickes, in his Jovian, 1683, 8vo. But it was more effectually answered by the powers that be, for the zealous partisan was sentenced to pay a fine of 500 marks, and was thrown into prison until he should discharge it. Nothing daunted by this, Johnson again took up his pen, and in 1686, at the instigation of Hugh Speke, a fellow-prisoner, drew up an Address to the Protestants in the King's Army, (then encamped on Hounslow Heath,) urging them not to obey illegally-commissioned officers.

"For both these publications, his spirit was, doubtless, deserving of the highest applause."—Sir James Mackintosh: Review of the Causes of the Revolution of 1688.

The government thought otherwise: "Julian Johnson" (for so he was now called) was sentenced to stand three on the pillory, and to be whipped from Newgate to Tyburn. This barbarous sentence was carried into execution, and three hundred and seventeen stripes failed to make the patriot wince. After the Revolution, he was compensated by King William for his sufferings. At least he received a present of £1000, a pension of £300 a year for two lives, and his son was taken into the public service.

"His morals were pure, his religious feelings ardent, his learning and abilities not contemptible, his judgment weak, his temper acrimonious, turbulent, and unconquerably stubborn."—T. B. Macaulay: Hist. of England, vol. i.

John Dryden, whose impure muse and time-serving spirit could neither understand nor respect a man of Johnson's purity and dauntless courage, disgraced himself by endeavouring to ridicule "Ben Jochanan," as he called the author of Julian, but we have ample testimonies of the excellence of the latter:

"I never knew a man of better sense, of a more innocent life, or of greater virtue, than Mr. Samuel Johnson."—John Hampden to the Duchess of Mazarine.

The works of Johnson are by no means to be despised, even in our day.

"A very remarkable writer. I do not know where I could put my hand upon a book containing so much sense and sound constitutional doctrine as this thin folio of Johnson's."—S. T. Coleridge.

He pub. several controversial tracts in favour of Episcopacy, 1733, &c.; a System of Morality, 1746; a Compendium of Logic, 1752; a Sermon, an English Grammar, and a Catechism, 1765; a Hebrew Grammar, 1767; and some theolog. treatises. See his Life, by Rev. Dr. Thos. B. Chandler, 1805; again, Lon., 1824, 8vo.

Johnson, Samuel, LL.D., Sept. 18, 1709–Dec. 13, 1784, one of the most distinguished writers of any age or country, was a native of Lichfield, where his father carried on the business of a bookseller with more respectability than profit. After a course of preparatory instruction in Mr. Hunter's academy in his native town, and at Mr. Wentworth's school at Stourbridge, he was in his nineteenth year (1728) entered of Pembroke College, Oxford, where he remained for three years, returning home without a degree in 1731. In 1732, he became usher to a school in Market-Bosworth, but found this appointment so distasteful that in a few months he threw it up, and removed to Birmingham, where he found partial employment as contributor to a newspaper published by a Mr. Warren, a bookseller of that place. It was for this gentleman that he composed his first published work—an abridged translation into English from the French of Father Lobo's Voyage into Abyssinia. His reward for this performance was the inconsiderable sum of five guineas. In 1736, he was married to Mrs. Porter, the widow of a Lichfield trader,—a lady of vulgar manners, loud voice, fluid complexion, and nearly double his age, and with eight hundred pounds sterling in the funds. The newly-married pair thought that this small fortune could not be better employed than in the fitting up of an academy at Edial, near Lichfield; and accordingly the public was soon advised of the opening of an institution which, fortunately for the cause of letters, was destined soon to be closed. Three pupils only—David Garrick and his brother being two—"thronged the doors" of this respectable seminary. Disgusted with the indifference or incredulity of his townsmen, the dominie determined to try a better market for his talents and learning, and in 1737, accompanied by one of his pupils,—he who in after-years so long trod the stage without a peer,—he took the highroad for London, and from that day became an author by profession. Three years before this period—that is, in 1734—he had unsuccessfully sought an engagement as contributor to The Gentleman's Magazine; but he was now more fortunate in his efforts, and from March, 1738, to 1754, was a regular coadjutor to honest Edward Cave, in whose life in this Dictionary we have already referred to this probable connexion. At times, indeed, the poor scholar was reduced so low in his finances as to be obliged to live upon fourpence halfpenny per day, and then roam the streets at night with Savage, or some other brother in misfortune, for want of a lodging.

In 1738, Johnson was employed upon a translation of Father Paul Sarpi's History of the Council of Trent, which was discontinued by Dodsley and Cave in consequence of a rival translation by another Samuel Johnson. It was in May of this year, 1738, that our author gave to the world London, a Poem, in imitation of the Third Satire of Juvenal; a production which was so immediately successful, that, to quote the quaint language of a critic in the Gentleman's Magazine, it became "remarkable for having got to the second edition in the space of a week." It so happened that London appeared in the same day with Pope's Satire of 1738, and the youthful author had no reason to regret the coincidence, for people said, "Here is an unknown poet greater even than Pope."

Pope set young Richardson to work to find out who this formidable rival was. Richardson reported that he had discovered only that "his name was Johnson, and that he was some obscure man." "He will soon be deterred," replied Pope. This was not the only instance in which he displayed a commendable generosity to the rising star, for from the perusal of London alone he recommended him to Earl Gower when Johnson (in the next year) sought a degree "to qualify him for the mastership of a charity-school."

Of this and of some later portions of Johnson's life we find some notices contributed by ourselves some years since to Putnam's Magazine, (New York, April, 1854,) and from these memoranda we shall not hesitate to quote when it suits our purpose.

The similarity between London and Pope's satirical vein is very observable. The Vanity of Human Wishes essays a more dignified strain. Garrick accounts for this in his own facetious manner:

"When Johnson lived much with the Hervey's, and saw a good deal of what was passing in life, he wrote his London, which is lively and easy; when he became more retired, he gave us his Vanity of Human Wishes, which is as hard as Greek: had he gone on to imitate another satire, it would have been as hard as Hebrew."

And yet, flippant little David, thy old schoolmaster wrote a hundred lines a day of this poem, if it is all Greek to thee. Hard as it was to thee, it softened a greater man to tears, for Walter Scott tells us,

"The deep and pathetic morality of The Vanity of Human Wishes has often extracted tears from those whose eyes wander dry over pages professedly sentimental."

Ay, it drew tears from the eyes of the author himself! George Lewis Scott describes a very interesting little family-gathering at Thrale's, when Dr. Johnson read aloud his satire: whilst recounting the difficulties of the poor, struggling scholar, he "burst into a passion of tears." Poor fellow! he remembered those days when he subscribed himself impransus. No longer subject to the pangs of hunger, he now had all that heart could wish,—plenty, "honour, love, obedience, troops of friends;" but his mind reverted to those bitter days of penury when he wandered in the streets for want of a lodging, and, in the garb of poverty, devoured his dinner, furnished by the hand of charity, behind the curtain at good Mr. Cave's! How had his condition changed! We need not marvel at those outpourings of a grateful heart which gush forth in his quiet hours of meditation and solemn seasons of prayer. The great Being on whose guidance and protection he had confidently relied in the day of destitution and hour of trial had not disappointed his hopes. He had "brought him to great honour, and comforted him on every side." This he deeply felt, and, however at times arrogant and harsh to his fellow men, he ever, as Bishop Horne well says, "walked humbly before the Lord his God."

Johnson had no little difficulty in finding a publisher for London, but at last Dodsley ventured to purchase it for the magnificent sum of ten guineas! The author speaks of this as no inconsiderable price for it:

"I might, perhaps," he says, "have accepted of less, but that Paul Whitehead had a little before got ten guineas for a poem, and I would not take less than Paul Whitehead."

In 1744, the reputation of the young author was greatly increased by the publication of the Life of Richard Savage, and this admirable biography was followed in 1746 by a Plan of the Dictionary of the English Language; in 1749, by the representation of the tragedy of Irene, and the publication of The Vanity of Human Wishes; and in 1750–52, by the issue of the Rambler. The Dictionary was given to the world in 1755; the Idler dates from April 5, 1758, to April 5, 1760; Rasselas was pub. in 1759; the edition of Shakspeare, with Notes, in 1765; The False Alarm in 1770; Thoughts on the late Transactions respecting Falkland Islands, 1771; A Journey to the Western Islands of Scotland, and The Patriot, in 1774; Taxation no Tyranny, in 1775; and the Lives of the English Poets, his last production of any importance, (and which he had commenced in 1777,) in 1779–81. The Poets in this collection commence with Cowley, and, with the exception of Blackmore, Watts, Pomfret, and Yalden, were chosen by the booksellers, whose original design went no further than the preparation of Biographical Prefaces to the selection of British poetry which they were about giving to the world. This meagre project was happily enlarged by the skill and taste of the editor. The lives of Savage, Cowley, Milton, Gray, Dryden, and Pope, are considered the best in point of literary workmanship. The ed. of The Poets to which they were originally prefixed, 1779–81, was in 60 vols. sm. 8vo, price, £7 10s. A 2d ed. was pub. in 1790, in 75 vols. 12mo.

A chronological and detailed list of Johnson's writings —which we think it unnecessary to quote in this place— will be found in the Appendix to Boswell's Life of Johnson,—a work which has made the life of the great lexicographer so familiar to general readers that some brevity on our part may well be excused. In 1762, a pension of £300, conferred by George III., placed the author of the Rambler in circumstances of comparative affluence, and enabled him to pass his remaining days without being subjected to that harassing literary drudgery for which few men were so ill qualified, and still fewer would have so bravely endured. We must not forget to mention, before leaving this division of our subject, that in 1755 Johnson received the degree of M.A. from the University of Oxford; the title of Doctor of Laws from Trinity College, Dublin, in 1762; and the same compliment from Oxford in 1775.

The only complete edition of Johnson's Works is that pub. at Oxford, by Talboys and Wm. Pickering, in 1825, in 11 vols. 8vo,—The Oxford Classic Edition. The contents are as follows: Vol. I. Life; Poems; Rasselas; Letters; II., III. Rambler; IV. Adventurer; Idler; V. Miscellaneous Pieces; VI. Reviews; Political Tracts; Lives of Eminent Persons; VII. Lives of the Poets: Cowley, Denham, Milton, Butler, Rochester, Roscommon, Otway, Waller, Pomfret, Dorset, Stepney, J. Philips, Walsh, Dryden, Smith, Duke, King, Sprat, Halifax, Parnell, Garth, Rowe, Addison, Hughes, and Sheffield; VIII. Lives of the Poets: Prior, Congreve, Blackmore, Fenton, Gay, Granville, Yalden, Tickell, Hammond, Somervile, Savage, Swift, Broome, Pope, Pitt, Thomson, Watts, A. Philips, West, Collins, Dyer, Shenstone, Young, Mallet, Akenside, Gray, and Lyttelton; IX. Journey to the Hebrides; Vision of Theodoric; The Fountains, a Fairy Tale; Prayers and Meditations; Sermons; Index to vols. i.–ix.; X., XI. Parliamentary Debates, 1740–43.

We are now to consider the distinguished subject of our notice: 1, as a Poet; 2, as an Essayist; 3, as a Lexicographer; 4, as a Critic. We shall also briefly review—5, the peculiarities of his style; 6, his appearance, manners, and conversation; 7, his moral and religious character.

1. Dr. Johnson as a Poet.

"Read Johnson's Vanity of Human Wishes.—all the examples and mode of giving them sublime, as well as the latter part, with the exception of an occasional couplet. I do not much admire the opening. I remember an observation of Sharpe's, (the Conversationist, as he was called in London, and a very clever man,) that the first line of his poem was superfluous, and that Pope (the very best of poets, I think) would have begun at once, only changing the punctuation,—

"'Survey mankind from China to Peru.'

"The former line, 'Let observation,' &c. is certainly heavy and useless. But 'tis a grand poem—and so true! true as the tenth of Juvenal himself. The lapse of ages changes all things,—time—language—the earth—the bounds of the sea—the stars of the sky, and every thing about, around, and underneath' man, except man himself, who has always been, and always will be, an unlucky rascal. The infinite variety of lives conducts but to death, and the infinity of wishes lends but to disappointment."—Lord Byron: Ravenna Diary. Jan. 9, 1821.

James Ballantyne remarks of Sir Walter Scott,—a comment of whose upon the pathos of The Vanity of Human Wishes we have already quoted:

"He had often said to me, that neither his own nor any modern popular style of composition was that from which he derived most pleasure. I asked him what it was. He answered, Johnson's; and that he had more pleasure in reading London, and the Vanity of Human Wishes, than any other poetical composition he could mention; and I think I never saw his countenance more indicative of high admiration, than while reciting aloud from these productions." —Lockhart's Scott.

Lockhart tells us that the last line of MS. that Scott sent to the press was a quotation from The Vanity of Human Wishes.

"Yet," continues Lockhart, "it is the cant of our day—above all, of its poetasters—that Johnson was no poet. To-be-sure, they say the same of Pope,—and hint it occasionally even of Dryden."

"Juvenal has been translated by Dryden: but the mere English reader will derive the best conception of the manner of this noble satirist from the admirable imitations of Dr. Johnson, which are beyond all praise. Mr. Murphy and Mr. Lewis have likewise lately published imitations of this poet, which possess much merit, though certainly far inferior to the spirited productions of Johnson."—Dr. Drake.

"Perused Johnson's London and Vanity of Human Wishes. His numbers are strong in sense, and smooth in flow, but want that varied grace and inextinguishable spirit which constitute the essential charm of Pope's."—Green's Diary of a Lover of Lit., Ipswich, 1810, 65.

"Dr. Johnson's London, a Satire, is a noble poem. But his great moral genius was constrained in composition by the perpetual parody on his powerful prototype, Juvenal. To have shown so much genius and so much ingenuity at one and the same time, to have been so original even in imitation, places him in the highest order of minds. But his range was here circumscribed; for he had to move parallel with the Roman,—finding out in every passage corresponding and kindred sins,—and in order to preserve—which he did wondrously—the similitude—

'To bridle in his struggling muse with pain,
Which long'd to launch into a nobler strain.'"

Professor Wilson: Blackw. Mag., June, 1824; and his Critical and Imaginative, Edin. and Lon., 1856, 1, 320.

"That his tragedy [Irene] was a great failure on the stage, been already related; that it is of extreme dulness, of a monotony altogether insufferable, and therefore tires out the reader's patience quite as much as it did the auditor's, is true; that most of his lesser pieces are only things of easy and of fairly-successful execution is likewise certain, with perhaps the exception of his verses on Robert Levett's death, which have a sweetness and tenderness seldom found in any of his compositions. But, had he never written any thing after the Imitations of Juvenal, his name would have gone down to posterity as a poet of great excellence,—one who only did not reach equal celebrity with Pope, because he came after him, and did not assiduously court the muse.

"In truth, these two pieces are admirable, both for their matter, their diction, and their versification. . . . Of Johnson's Latin verses it remains to speak, and they assuredly do not rise to the level of his English, nor indeed above mediocrity. The translation of Pope's Messiah, however, a work of his boyhood, gave a promise not fulfilled in his riper years."—Lord Brougham: Lives of Men of Letters of the Time of George III.

2. Dr. Johnson as an Essayist.

Under the head of essays, we may, without much violence to strict classification, add Johnson's political pamphlets, his Parliamentary Debates, and his tale of Rasselas, to the periodical papers of the Rambler, the Idler, &c. The first number of the Rambler was pub. on Tuesday, March 20, 1749–50, and the last on Saturday the 17th (14th, in fact) March, 1752, 208 numbers in all, issued every Tuesday and Saturday, without the loss of a single publication-day. Would that all authors who seek to advance the interests of religion and morality were as conscientious as the author of The Rambler, in imploring the aid of divine grace, "without which nothing is strong, nothing is holy." "Grant, I beseech thee," supplicates the pious writer, "that in this undertaking thy Holy Spirit may not be withheld from me, but that I may promote thy glory, and the salvation of myself and others." The Rambler excited but little attention at first. Croker seems to question Payne's assertion to Chalmers Richardson essay, No. 97, was the "only paper which had a prodigious sale and was popular." But the ladies will side with Payne, when they discover by inspection what "No. 97" is about. We shall not inform them, and indeed we scarcely forbid any of our female readers to turn to this mysterious paper. If in this Blue-Beard prohibition we meet with the same measure of obedience which was accorded to the gentleman just named, we ought not to be surprised. The good Doctor was sorely put to it to find a name for his child. He told Sir Joshua Reynolds,

"What must be done, sir, will be done. When I began publishing that paper I was at a loss how to name it. I sat down at night upon my bedside, and resolved that I would not go to sleep till I had fixed its title. The Rambler seemed the best that occurred, and I took it."

The Doctor wrote the whole of the 208 papers, with the exception of four billets in No. 10, by Miss Mulso, (afterwards Mrs. Chapone;) No. 30, by Mrs Catherine Talbot; No. 97, by Richardson; and Nos. 44 and 100, by Elizabeth Carter. Of Johnson's 204, thirty only were "worked up" from previously-prepared materials. After a time, the Rambler gained the public ear, and, this secured, the public voice soon followed. Cave, the publisher of the paper, received a number of commendatory letters; newspaper-verses appeared in its praise, and James Elphinston (see p. 535 of this Dictionary) superintended an Edinburgh edition, which followed the London issue. Richardson wrote to Cave that Johnson was the only man who could write them; which Cave admitted, but claimed that, good as they were, they were very slow of sale. Opulent Mrs. Rambler, who had never been suspected of very exquisite literary sensibilities, was among these effusions of the "gude man's," and rewarded his lady with the very handsome speech,—"I thought you well of you before, but I did not imagine you could have written any thing equal to this."

Notwithstanding the tardy sale at first, the author had the satisfaction of surviving ten editions in London alone. We must not conceal the fact that some unreasonable beings complained of the crudite dignity of the style, and declared that the author (a true 'Yankee trick' it would now be called) used the hard words in the Rambler in order to render his Dictionary—of which the Prospectus had been issued a short time before—indispensably necessary.

Edmund Burke, who, like most truly great men, excelled in wit and humour, said that Johnson's ladies—his Misellas, Lorimas, Properantias, and Rhodoclias—were all "Johnsons in petticoats." This is much of a piece with Goldsmith's telling Johnson that if he were to compose a work in which little fishes had to converse, he would make them all talk like great whales!

In his contributions to the Adventurer, the Doctor uses the stilts less: he walks more,—perhaps occasionally runs. Yet majestic diction was as natural to a man who thought in rounded periods as was a disjointed chaos of the parts of speech to many of his critics. So far from the elaborate verbal architecture, anxiously built up and painfully cemented, which the reader supposed, the Ramblers were written just as they were wanted for the press: indeed, at times the first half was in type before the remainder was on paper.

Boswell relates an amusing anecdote relative to the Italian edition of the Rambler:

"A foreign minister, of no very high talents, who had been in the company for a considerable time, quite overlooked, happened luckily to mention that he had read some of his Rambler in Italian, and admired it much. This pleased him [Johnson] greatly. He observed that the title had been translated Il Gionle Errante, though I have been told it was rendered, more ludicrously, Il Vagabondo, and finding that this minister gave such a proof of his taste he was all attention to him, and on the first remark which he made, however simple, exclaimed, 'The ambassador says well, his Excellency observes;' and then he expanded and enriched the little that had been said in so strong a manner that it appeared something of consequence. This was exceedingly entertaining to the company who were present and many a time afterwards it furnished a pleasant topic of merriment. 'The ambassador says well' became a laughable term of applause when no weighty matter had been expressed."

It deserves to be noticed that the 110th number of the Rambler (on Repentance) was the means of deciding the Rev James Compton, of the English Benedictine Monks at Paris, to leave that body and embrace the Protestant faith. How many devotees of the Greek Church it would have converted we have, unfortunately, no means of knowing. Yet the author thought at one time that it was about having the opportunity presented to it. Somehow or other he heard that the Empress of Russia had ordered a translation of the Rambler into the Russian language.

"So," says the author, with a complacent smile, "I shall be read on the banks of the Wolga. Horace boasts that his fame would extend as far as the banks of the Rhone, now, the Wolga is farther from me than the Rhone from Horace."

Whether this was the work of some wicked wag, or not, we cannot tell, but we believe that the Russian edition of the Rambler is even scarcer than any "liber rarissimus" which tantalizes the "bellus bibliomanus" in the "choice catalogues of Thomas Thorpe."

We have seen how greatly the Rambler was admired in the select circles which gave law to the Republic of Letters of that day. The Doctor fully endorsed all that was said in praise of his essays, and observed, not without truth, of his Rambler, that he "had laboured to refine our language to grammatical purity, and to clear it from colloquial barbarisms, licentious idioms, and irregular combinations, and that he has added to the elegance of its construction and the harmony of its cadence."

But it is not to be supposed that the voice of admiration was the only one to be heard:

"The Rambler," remarks a celebrated literary and fashionable lady of the day, "to certainly a strange monotonous" he always plods on the beaten road of his predecessors, following the Spectator with the same pace as a packhorse would do a trotter; in the style that we get to laughter in a paper. These writers may, perhaps, be of service to the public which is saying a great deal in their favour. There are numbers of both sexes who never read any thing but such productions, and cannot spare time from doing nothing to go through a sixpenny pamphlet. Such gentle readers must be puzzled by a moral hint which though repeated over and over from generation to generation they never heard in their lives. I should be glad to know the name of this laborious author."—Lady Mary Wortley Montagu: Works, Lon., 1803, 5 vols. 8vo; vol. iv p. 259.

"As an essayist, a merits more consideration, than as a poet and dramatist. His Ramblers are in everybody's hands. About them opinions vary, and I rather believe the style of these essays is not now considered as a good model. This he corrected in his more advanced age, as may be seen in his Lives of the Poets, where he declares, though occasionally elaborate and highly metaphorical, is not nearly so inflated and ponderous as in the Ramblers."—Memoirs of Rich and Cum ordered: Samuel Johnson.

"His Ramblers are in every body's hands," says Cumberland; but his Memoirs were pub. in 1806, and now, in 1856,—half a century later,—this can no longer be said;—nor, indeed, could it have been truly said, for many years past.

"Where is the man who, having turned his thirtieth year, peruses Rasselas or the Rambler?"—Dibdin's Lib. Comp., ed. 1825, 647–648.

"Nobody now reads the Rambler or the Idler, and the colossal reputation of Johnson rests almost entirely upon his profound and caustic sayings recorded in Boswell."—Sir Archibald Alison: Essays. Pol. Histor and Morel., Edin. and Lon., 1850, ii. 421.

But Sir Archibald certainly speaks in haste: the Rambler and Idler are still read, and will always be read, and that to the great profit of the readers. We should not omit to notice, in passing, that Sir Archibald pays a high compliment to the essays of Johnson. See Hist. of Europe, 1850–52, chap. v.

In the whole course of our "Johnsonian readings" we have met with nothing upon this subject which pleased us better, as a lucid exposition of the truth upon this subject, than the following remarks of a learned American divine,—one of the most profound thinkers, and certainly one of the best writers, of the age:

"It has been asked, with emphasis, 'Who now reads the Rambler?' And it is indubitable that this book, which once exerted so mighty an influence on the English language and people, has given place, at least in general reading, to works of far inferior merit and interest. The reason seems to be, that its object is wellnigh accomplished. It commenced with a standard of morals and language elevated far above the prevailing style of morals and of writing. It has elevated both, and has brought the English language and notions of morality to its own level. Nor is it wonderful that men should regard with less interest a work which now is seen to have no very extraordinary elevation. It is a component part of English literature, having fixed itself in the language, the style, and the morals of the English people, and taken its place as an integral, almost undistinguished, part of the national principles of writing and morality. The result is that, while the benefits of the Rambler may be diffusing themselves, unperceived, to almost all the endearments of the fireside and virtues of the community, the book itself may be very imperfectly known and unfrequently perused. Johnson may be almost forgotten, except in praise; but his mighty power is yet sending forth a mild influence over lands and seas, like the gentle movements of the dew and the sunbeam."—Rev. Albert Barnes: Christian Spectator, 1832; and in his Miscell. Essays and Reviews, N. York, 1856, i. 126.

To the same effect writes Sir James Mackintosh:

"Some heaviness and weariness must be felt by most readers at the perusal of essays on life and manners, written like the Rambler; but, it ought never to be forgotten that the two most popular writers of the eighteenth century, Addison and Johnson, were such efficacious teachers of virtue that their writings may be numbered among the causes which in an important degree have contributed to preserve and to improve the morality of the British nation."—Mackintosh's Life, Lon., 1835, 2 vols. 8vo.

"The publication of the Rambler, though not very successful during its progress, stamped the character of the author as one of the first moral writers of the age, and as eminently qualified to write, and even to improve, the English language."—Sir Walter Scott: Life of Samuel Johnson, Miscell. Prose Works, Abbotsford ed., Edin. and Lon., 1850, iii. 206.

"It would not be easy to name a book more tiresome—indeed, more difficult—to read, or one which gives moral lessons in a more frigid tone, with less that is lively or novel in the matter, in a language more heavy and monotonous. The measured pace, the stant balance of the style, becomes quite intolerable, for the no interesting truth to be inculcated up ote from common observation, nor is there any attack carried on against difficult positions, nor any satirical warfare maintained either with opinions or with persons."—Lord Brougham: Lives of Men of Letters of the Time of George III., Lon. and Glasg., 1855, 347.

Mr. Hazlitt is, if possible, still more severe in his strictures on the Rambler. We can quote but a few lines of his critique:

"After closing the volumes of the Rambler, there is nothing that we remember as a new truth gained to the mind—nothing indelibly stamped upon the memory; nor is there any passage that we wish to turn to, as embodying any known principle observation with such force and beauty that justice can only be done to the idea in the author's own words.'—On the Periodical Essayists.

We cannot resist the temptation of quoting, by way of contrast to the above, a line or two from the enthusiastic commendation of the author of Clari:

"I am inexpressibly pleased with them. . . . I hope the world tastes them; for its own sake I hope the world tastes them. . . . I would not, for any consideration, that they should be laid down through discouragement."—Samuel Richardson to Cave, Aug. 9, 1750.

Perhaps Rasselas, which is quite as much of an essay, or, rather, series of essays, as it is a novel, is even still more neglected than the Rambler. The fervid eulogy of Johnson's greatest biographer is well known, but we must find room for it in our pages:

"This tale, with all the charms of Oriental imagery, and all the force and beauty of which the English language is capable, leads us through the most important scenes of human life, and shows us that this stage of our being is full of 'vanity and vexation of spirit.' The fund of thinking which this work contains is such that almost every sentence of it may furnish a subject of long meditation. I am not satisfied if a year passes without my having read it through; and at every perusal my admiration of the mind which produced it is so highly raised that I can scarcely believe I had the honour of enjoying the intimacy of such a man."—Boswell.

We give some other opinions upon this once-celebrated production. Hazlitt is less enthusiastic:

"Rasselas is the most melancholy and debilitating moral speculation that ever was put forth."—On the Periodical Essayists.

Dr. Young, on the contrary, calls Rasselas "a mass of sense."

"The work can scarce be termed a narrative, being in a great measure void of incident: it is rather a set of moral dialogues on the various vicissitudes of human life, its follies, its fears, its hopes, its wishes, and the disappointment in which all terminate. The style is in Johnson's best manner, enriched and rendered sonorous by the triads and quaternions which he so much loved, and balanced with an art which, perhaps, he derived from the learned Sir Thomas Browne."—Sir Walter Scott: Life of Johnson.

"In his Rasselas we have much to admire, and enough to make us wish for more. It is the work of an illuminated mind, and offers many wise and deep reflections, clothed in beautiful and harmonious diction. We are not, indeed, familiar with such personages as Johnson has imagined for the characters of his fable; but, if we are not exceedingly interested in their story, we are infinitely gratified with their conversation and remarks."—Cumberland's Memoirs: Samuel Johnson.

"No prig shall ever persuade me that Rasselas is not a noble performance in design and in execution. Never were the expenses of a mother's funeral more gloriously defrayed by a son than the funeral of Samuel Johnson's mother by the price of Rasselas, written for the pious purpose of laying her head decently and honourably in the dust."—Christoper North: Noctes Ambrosianæ, April, 1829

The admirer of Johnson will be grateful to us for extending our quotations from Professor Wilson. Always eloquent, the enthusiastic Christopher strikes even a higher chord than is his wont when the author of the Rambler becomes his glowing theme:

"He had noble faculties and noble feelings; a hate, high as heaven, of wickedness; a scorn, as high, of all that was base or mean; wide knowledge of the world, of London, of life; severe judgment; imagination not very various perhaps, but very vivid, and, when conjoined with such an intellect, even wonder-working, in realms that seemed scarcely of right to belong to the solemn sage. Witness the Happy Valley of Rasselas, and, indeed, all that as-yet-unsurpassed story, where, on the wings of fancy and feeling, you are wafted along over the earth, yet never lose sight of its flesh-and-blood inhabitants, working and weeping, yet not unhappy, still, in their toils and their tears, and dying but to live again, in no cold, glittering, poetic heaven, but in the abodes of bliss, seen by the eyes of nature through religion, builded in the skies."—The Man of Ton, a Satire; in Blackw. Mag., June, 1828; and in Wilson's Essays Critical and Imaginative, Edin. and Lon., 1856, i. 231.

"The reader who first attempts the Abyssinian Candide feels that he has imposed on himself a task rather than found a pleasure, or even a relaxation. The manner is heavy and little suited to the occasion; the matter is of a very ordinary fabric, if it is safe and wholesome; there is nothing that shines except the author's facility of writing in a very artificial style, as soon as we are informed, by external evidence, of the whole having been written in a few nights. He, perhaps, had some kind of misgiving that it was not a successful effort, for he had never looked at it till two and twenty years after it was written, when, a friend happening to have it, who was travelling with him, Johnson read it with some eagerness."—Lord Brougham: Lives of Men of Letters, &c.

The noble critic just quoted considers Johnson's political pamphlets and his occasional tracts as far superior to his moral essays; and he especially commends Taxation no Tyranny, and the review of Soame Jenyns's Treatise on the Origin of Evil. The last-named production has already come under our notice in our life of Soame Jenyns. The eloquence of the Parliamentary Debates was of so high an order that Dr. Francis declared that of Demosthenes to be inferior; and Voltaire did not scruple to affirm that the Greek and Roman orators had revived in the British Senate.

3. Dr. Johnson as a Lexicographer.

Before the appearance of Johnson's great work (in 1755) the English were sadly in want of a good lexicon of their language. The one in use—not without considerable merit—was that of Nathan Bailey, which we have already noticed in our life of that industrious philologist. English scholars, therefore, had to endure in silence the sarcasm of the Abbé le Blanc, who declared that such was the passion for the English tongue that the French had made it one of the learned languages, and that even their women studied it, and yet that there was not so much as a good dictionary, or, rather, a tolerable grammar. We shall not be expected, in the limited space to which we are confined, to enter into any consideration of the philological dispute of the day respecting the comparative merits of the dictionaries of Johnson, Webster, Richardson, and others. Like the valet de chambre in the Vicar of Wakefield who read so many magazines, though they quarrel among each other we dearly love them all, and keep the most important of them by our elbow. As regards orthography, we certainly do not—as every page of this volume testifies—follow the example of our countryman, whilst we should undoubtedly feel entitled to ridicule without mercy the stolidity of the tyro who should undertake to compare the meagre philological attainments of Dr. Johnson with the amazing erudition, in this department, of Dr. Noah Webster.

We had intended to quote some criticisms of Drs. Webster and Richardson on the execution of Johnson's Dictionary; but, as such quotations would involve the necessity of an impartial presentation of both sides of the question,—for which presentation we lack both space and time,—we shall content ourselves, and, we trust, our readers, with the citation of a few opinions which (with, perhaps, the exception of Lord Brougham's) are not to be considered as instituting any comparison between Johnson's Dictionary and the two which have only recently, in their perfected shape, been submitted to the public eye.

The Doctor, with his usual foresight, had adopted an excellent mode of discouraging all adverse criticism, by admitting in his admirable preface that "a few wild blunders and risible absurdities might for a time furnish folly with laughter and harden ignorance into contempt." Now, as no reviewer is particularly desirous of being considered either a fool or an ignoramus, we may well suppose that the Jeffreys of the day were contented to praise where they could and to be silent where they disapproved. We may remark, in this connexion, that it seems hardly worth while for us to repeat the old and well known story of Johnson's impertinent and unjust letter to the Earl of Chesterfield. It is not to be forgotten, however, that the Earl's suggestions upon the prospectus were all adopted by the author.

The Monthly Review for April, 1755, was enlarged "four pages extraordinary," and even then the usual catalogue of new books omitted, to make room for a copious notice of the Dictionary, in which some imperfections are rather hinted at than enumerated. Thomas Warton, in a letter to his brother, after admitting that "the preface was noble, and the history of the language pretty full," complains that "strokes of laxity and indolence were plainly to be perceived." "Laxity and indolence" there will always be in the works of man; but vigour and industry there were also, else the Dictionary had never seen the light. In our life of Wm. Adams, D.D., p. 37 of this Dictionary, we have quoted some remarks of Johnson upon this theme, to which the reader is referred. The book sold well, for a second edition was pub. within a year. This was a great triumph for the author, who declared that, of all his acquaintances there were only two who, upon the publication of the work, did not endeavour to depress him with threats of cens from the public, or with objections learned from those who learned them from his own preface.

The Doctor displayed no little ingenuity in the preliminary arrangement of his matériel. Bishop Percy tells us: "Boswell's account of the manner in which Johnson compiled his Dictionary is confused and erroneous. He began his task as he himself expressly described to me by devoting his first care to a diligent perusal of all such English writ e most correct in their language, and under every sente he meant to quote, he drew a line, and noted in the margin the first letter of the word under which it was to occur. He then delivered these books to his clerks, who transcribed each sentence on a separate slip of paper, and arranged the same under the word referred to. By these means he collected the several words and their different significations; and when the whole arrangement was alphabetically formed he gave the definitions of their meanings, and collected their etymologies from Skinner, Junius, and other writers on the subject."

Andrew Millar's exclamation of delight at the reception of the last sheet was less reverent than Johnson's pious rejoinder. We do not wonder at Millar's impatience. The "three years" stipulated for the undertaking proved to be more than seven, and the copyright-money (£1575) had long been in the hands of the lexicographer: we say the hands,—for little went into his pocket, after satisfying the demands of his six amanuenses and discharging other expenses incurred in the prosecution of the work.

But we promised a few quotations respecting the Dictionary, and it is quite time they were before the reader. In the same year (1755) of the appearance of the review of Johnson's Dictionary in the Monthly Review, another, by Dr. Adam Smith, the political economist, was pub. in the (old) Edinburgh Review. Sir James Mackintosh tells us that "This review of Johnson's Dictionary is chiefly valuable as a proof that neither of these eminent persons was well qualified to write an English dictionary. The plan of Johnson and the specimens of Smith are alike faulty. At that period indeed, neither the cultivation of our old literature, nor the study of the languages from which the English springs or to which it is related, nor the habit of observing the general structure of language, was so far advanced as to render it possible for this great work to approach perfection."—Preface to a Reprint in 1816 of the Edinburgh Review of 1755.

"His Dictionary, though distinguished neither by the philosophy nor by the erudition which illustrate the origin and history of words, is a noble monument of his power and his literary knowledge, and even of his industry, though it betrays frequent symptoms of that constitutional indolence which must so often have overpowered him in so immense a labour."—Mackintosh's Life, Lon., 1835. 2 vols. 8vo.

"That laborious and gigantic task, a dictionary of the language. How it is executed is well known, and sufficiently surprising, considering that the learned author was a stranger to the Northern [illegible] on which English is radically grounded, and that the [illegible] in grammar since made by Horne Tooke were then [illegible]."—Sir Walter Scott: Life of Johnson.

"Johnson, with great labour, [illegible] ings of every word, and quoted the authorities; but it would have been an improvement if he had given an accurate definition of the precise meaning of every word, pointed out the way in which it ought to be employed with the greatest propriety, showed the various deviations from the original meaning which custom had so far established as to render allowable, and fixed the precise limits beyond which it could not be employed without becoming a vicious expression. With this view it would have been necessary to exhibit the nice distinctions which take place between words nearly synonymous, and without which many words can only be defined in such a manner that they must be considered as exactly synonymous. We omit making quotations from Johnson in order to point out these defects; and shall content ourselves with giving a few examples to show in what manner, according to our idea, a dictionary of the English language ought to be compiled."—Encyc. Brit., edit. 7th. art. "Dictionary."

"Had Johnson left nothing but his Dictionary, one might have traced there a great intellect, a genuine man. Looking to its clearness of definition, its general solidity, honesty, insight, and successful method, it may be called the best of all Dictionaries. There is in it a kind of architectural nobleness: it stands there like a great solid square-built edifice, finished, symmetrically complete: you judge that a true Builder did it."—Carlyle's Hero-Worship.

"Of the Prefaces to his own or other men's works, it is not necessary to speak in detail. The most ambitious is that to the Dictionary, which is powerfully written, but promises more than it performs, when it professes to give a history of the English language: for it does very little more than give a series of passages from the writings in the Anglo-Saxon and English tongues of different ages. The Dictionary itself, with all its faults, still keeps its ground and has had no successor that could supplant it. This is owing to the admirable plan of giving passages from the writers cited as authorities for each word and the part of the design is very well executed. Hence the book becomes almost as entertaining to read as useful to consult. The more difficult task of definition has been less happily performed: but far better than the etymological part, which neither shows profound knowledge nor makes a successful application of it. The compiler appears to have satisfied himself with one or two authorities, and neither to have chosen them well nor consulted them with discrimination. Of any attempts at a deeper and more philosophical study, either as regards the structure or the grammar of our language, he cannot be said ever to have had the credit: but if he at any time was so far fortunate, Horne Tooke has very mercilessly stripped him of it."—Lord Brougham: Men of Letters &c.

There have been many edits. of Johnson's Dictionary, but we do not think it worth while to notice any save the best, that of the Rev. H. J. Todd, Lon., 1818, in 11 Pts., 1827, 3 vols. 4to; new edit., now (1856) in press, edited by Todd and Latham. Mr. H. G. Bohn has recently—in 1840, '50, and '54, all in imp. 8vo—pub. verbatim reprints of Johnson's own last folio edit.

4. Dr. Johnson as a Critic.

A comprehensive view of Dr. Johnson's critical writings would of course include many of his numerous contributions to the Gentleman's Magazine, the Universal Visitor, The Literary Magazine or Universal Review, The Poetical Calendar, The London Chronicle, The Critical Review, &c.; but these articles are almost all of them unknown to the general reader, and of many the evidence of authorship is by no means unquestionable. When reference is made to the critical writings of Johnson, it is understood that the Preface and Notes to Shakspeare, and the Lives of the British Poets, are in the mind of the speaker. To each of these works, therefore, we must devote a few lines. We say "a few lines:" and, indeed, did our space permit, we have little disposition to dwell upon Dr. Johnson as a commentator upon Shakspeare. We will fight manfully for the Preface, but after that the point of our lance acknowledges the influence of the attraction of gravitation, and bends earthward. Francis Douce, one of the most erudite of literary antiquaries, thus despatches the critical doctor in a few words, much to the purpose:

"The indefatigable exertions of Messrs Steevens, Malone, Tyrwhitt, and Mason, will ever be duly appreciated by the true and zealous admirer of Shakspeare's pages. If the name of a celebrated critic and moralist be not included on this occasion, it is because he was certainly unskilled, in the knowledge of obsolete customs and expressions. His explanatory notes, therefore, are, generally speaking, the most contemptible of any; but no future editor will discharge his duty to the public, who shall omit a single sentence of this writer's masterly preface, or of his sound and tasteful characters of the text of Shakspeare."

Again:

"No disparagement is meant to the memory or talents of one of the greatest of men, when a protest is entered against the text of Dr. Johnson."

We well remember our astonishment at Johnson's criticism upon Proteus's speech in the Two Gentlemen of Verona, where he charges Shakspeare with a blunder in making the enamoured young gallant say,

"'Tis but her picture I have yet beheld,
And that hath dazzled my reason's light."

"Why," says the Doctor, "he had an interview with Silvia, and yet talks of having only seen her picture!" The literal commentator did not make sufficient allowance for the rhetoric of lovers. That there should be much valuable matter, and many sensible observations, contained in such a body of notes by such a writer, is a matter of course. The errors and misconceptions which prove the critic's unfitness for his task afford another proof of what even wise men often forget,—that no amount of genius, no extent of general knowledge, will qualify an author for a particular field without particular preparation. The Monthly Review (vol. xxxiii., 1765) devotes no less than thirty pages to a notice (by no means complimentary) of Johnson's Shakspeare, and to this article, from which we had intended to quote, we must refer the reader. Johnson's edit. of Shakspeare appeared in 1765, 8 vols. 8vo. His principal predecessors as commentators on the great poet were: 1. Rymer, 1678; 2. Dennis, 1693; 3. Gildon, 1694; 4. Pope, 1725; 5. Theobald, 1726; 6. Peck, 1740; 7. Sir Thomas Hanmer, 1745: 8. Grey, 1746; 9. Warburton, 1747; 10. Upton, 1748; 11. Whalley, 1748; 12. Edwards, 1748; 13. Holt, 1749; 14. Charlotte Lennox, 1753–54; 15. Cooper, 1755; 16. Howard, 1756; 17. Capell, 1759; 18. Heath, 1765.

Before we leave this period—the date of the publication of Johnson's Shakspeare—we must refer the reader to the fierce attack of Kenrick (Goldsmith's malignant foe) upon the new editor, pub. in the Monthly Review for December, 1765. Warburton's savage assault upon Johnson, in revenge for his temerity in modestly questioning some of that commentator's critical canons or annotations, is exactly what might have been expected from that amiable and courteous (!) prelate. See Letters from a late eminent Prelate to one of his Friends, (Bishop Hurd,) 1808, pp. 272–273.

But it is quite time that we had turned our attention to the opinions of critics of a more modern period:

"The Preface to his Shakspeare, certainly, is far superior to his other introductory discourses, both fuller of matter and more elaborate. His remarks on the great dramatist are, generally speaking, sound and judicious; many of them may even, on a subject sufficiently hackneyed, be deemed original. The boldness with which his many critical objections were offered deserves not the less praise that Shakspeare's numberless and gross faults are easy to discern; because, in presence of the multitude, we might say even of the English nation at large, their obvious nature and considerable magnitude has never made them very safe to dwell upon. . . . The Preface is more to be commended than the work itself. As a commentator, he is certainly far from successful."—Lord Brougham: Lives of Men of Letters, &c.

"Johnson compares him who should endeavour to recommend this poet by passages unconnectedly torn from his works, to the pedant in Hieroeles who exhibited a brick as a sample of his house. And yet how little, and how very unsatisfactorily, does he himself speak of the pieces considered as a whole! Let any man, for instance, bring together the short characters which he gives at the close of each play, and see if the aggregate will amount to that sum of admiration which he himself, at his outset, has stated as the correct standard for the appreciation of the poet."—A. W. Schlegel's Lects. on Dramat. Art. and Lit., Black's Trans., Lon., 1846, 360. See also pp. 365, 399.

"Johnson's Preface is doubtless a great and masterly performance, evincing a mind of large general powers, and is executed throughout with uncommon dignity and effect. There are those who elevate it to the skies; but there is also a considerable number of well-read Shakspearians who are far from bowing with unqualified submission to the critical canons which it contains . . . Johnson's critical summary of the preponderating merits and demerits of each play should be always a concomitant of every edition of Shakspeare."—Dibdin's Lib. Comp., ed. 1825, 805.

"Johnson explained much well, but there is something magisterial in the manner wherein he dismisses each play like a boy's exercise, that irritates the reader. His criticism is frequently judicious, but betrays no ardent admiration for Shakspeare."—Hallam: Lit. Hist. of Europe, 4th ed., 1854, iii. 94.

No portion of Johnson's writings has been so warmly praised, and so severely censured, as the Lives of the English Poets. Sir Egerton Brydges, in the Preface to his edit. of Phillips's Theatrum Poetarum Anglicanorum, complains lamentably of the false taste of the age which considered the poetical school of Pope the highest in the Republic of Letters:

"Dr. Johnson," he continues, "whose Lives of the Poets are extremely valuable, from the knowledge of life they display, from their morality, and from that acuteness of investigation and vigor of expression which his astonishing powers of intellect threw on every subject in which he engaged, has yet contributed to authorize this degraded taste. For candor ought to confess that a feeling for the higher kinds of poetry was not among his excellencies. Is it possible for those to doubt it who recollect the opinion he has expressed of Milton's Lycidas, and of the Odes of Gray? Who remember that he has scarce mentioned the Fables of Dryden, and that he has hardly conferred even a cold extorted praise on the Ode to the Passions, by Collins? Who must admit, that, among the modern poets who have pretensions to excellence in that art, there are but two, except his favorite Pope, to whose merits he has done any tolerable justice? These are Thomson and Young: of whom he has spoken, of one with noble and discriminative praise; and the poetical character of the other he has celebrated with a warm and happy splendor of eloquence, which is perhaps the finest passage in all the efforts of his pen."—Ib., as before, and lvii.

☞ Read another article on Johnson, by Sir S. E. Brydges, in his Imaginative Biography, vol. ii. 251.

"Wherever understanding alone is sufficient for poetical criticism, the decisions of Johnson are generally right. But the beauties of poetry must be felt before their causes are investigated. There is a poetical sensibility, which in the progress of the mind becomes as distinct a power as a musical ear or a picturesque eye. Without a considerable degree of this sensibility, it is as vain for a man of the greatest understanding to speak of the higher beauties of poetry, as it is for a blind man to speak of colours. To adopt the warmest sentiments of poetry, to realize its boldest imagery, to yield to every impulse of enthusiasm, to submit to the illusions of fancy, to retire with the poet into his ideal worlds, were dispositions wholly foreign from the worldly sagacity and stern shrewdness of Johnson. As in his judgment of life and character, so in his criticism on poetry, he was a sort of Freethinker. He suspected the refined of affectation, he rejected the enthusiastic as absurd, and he took it for granted that the mysterious was unintelligible. He came into the world when the school of Dryden and Pope gave the law to English poetry. In that school he had himself learned to be a lofty and vigorous declaimer in harmonious verse; beyond that school his unforced admiration perhaps scarcely soared: and his highest effort of criticism was accordingly the noble panegyric on Dryden. His criticism owed its popularity as much to its defects as to its excellencies. It was on a level with the majority of readers, —persons of good sense and information, but of no exquisite sensibility,—and to their minds it derived a false appearance of solidity from the very narrowness which excluded those grander efforts of imagination to which Aristotle and Bacon confined the name of poetry."—Sir James Mackintosh: Memoirs of his Life and Writings, Lon., 1835, 2 vols. 8vo.

See also his Review of Rogers's Poems, in his Works, 1854, vol. ii. 505–506.

"Johnson seems to have conceived, like Milton, a theory that good writing, at least in verse, is never either to follow the change of fashion, or to sink into familiar phrase, and that any deviation from this rigour should be branded as low and colloquial."—Hallam's Lit. Hist. of Europe, 4th ed., 1854, iii. 486.

"Johnson strips many a leaf from every laurel; still, Johnson's is the finest critical work extant, and can never be read without instruction and delight. . . . The opinions of that truly great man, whom it is also the present fashion to decry, will ever be received by me with that deference which time will restore to him from all."—Lord Byron.

"One of his most pleasing as well as most popular works, The Lives of the British Poets, which he executed with a degree of critical force and talent which has seldom been concentrated."—Sir Walter Scott: Life of Samuel Johnson.

Sir Archibald Alison remarks that few now read

"The Lives of the Poets, interesting as they are, and admirable as are the criticisms on our greatest authors which they contain."—Essays, 1850, iii. 392.

"The merit of this work is very great, whether we regard the matter or the style; for the composition is far more easy and natural, far less pompous and stately, and the diction both more picturesque and more simple, than in any other of his writings. The measured period, the balance of sentences, and the diffuseness arising from this desire of symmetry, is still in a good degree retained: but it is far less constant, and therefore palls less on the appetite, than in any of his former works."—Lord Brougham: Lives of Men of Letters, &c.

"Johnson decided literary questions like a lawyer, not like a legislator. He never examined foundations where a point was already ruled. His whole code of criticism rested on pure assumption, for which he sometimes quoted a precedent or an authority, but rarely troubled himself to give a reason drawn from the nature of things. He took it for granted that the kind of poetry which flourished in his own time, which he had been accustomed to hear praised from his childhood, and which he had himself written with success, was the best kind of poetry. . . . The judgments which Johnson passed on books were in his own time regarded with superstitious veneration, and in our time are generally treated with indiscriminate contempt."—T. B. Macaulay: Crit. and Hist. Essays, Lon., 1854, i. 390, 392; from the Edin. Rev., Sept. 1831.

The incorrectness of this assertion must be obvious to the reader who has perused the opinions just quoted; and it is easy for us to add to the evidence already presented of Mr. Macaulay's very grave error. As regards ourselves, we profess to fairly present each, but to embrace neither, side of these literary controversies.

The opinion of Christopher North will doubtless have great weight with many readers:

"North: 'Johnson's mind was a furnace: it reduced every thing to its elements. We have no truly great critical intellect since his time.'

"Buller: 'What would he have thought of our modern reviewers?'

"North: 'Why, not one of the tribe would have dared to cry mew, had he been alive. The terror of him would have kept them as mum as mice when there's a cat in the room. If he had detected such a thing as Jeffrey astir, he would have crushed every bone in his body with one worry.'

"Buller: 'I can believe it all. Even Gifford would have been annihilated.'

"North: 'Like an ill-natured pug-dog flung into a lion's cage.'"—Noctes Ambrosianæ, April, 1822.

"He had his prejudices, and his partialities, and his bigotries, and his blindnesses, but on the same fruit-tree you see shrivelled pears or apples on the same branch with jargonelles or golden pippins worthy of Paradise. . . . Show me the critique that beats his on Pope and on Dryden,—nay, even on Milton; and hang me if you may not read his Essay on Shakspeare even after having read Charles Lamb or heard Coleridge, with increased admiration of the powers of all three, and of their insight through different avenues, and, as it might seem, almost with different bodily and mental organs, into Shakspeare's 'old exhausted' and it worlds.' He was a critic and a moralist who would have been wholly wise had he not been partly constitutionally insane."—CHRISTOPHER NORTH: Noctes Ambrosianæ, April, 1829.

"There is an amiable desire shown to give merit its reward; nor do the author's prejudices interfere with this just course, except in a very few instances of political feelings warping his judgment, or indignation at impiety blinding him to literary excellence, or of admiration for religious purity giving slender merits an exaggerated value in his eyes. The justness of his taste may be in all other cases admitted; great critical acuteness is everywhere exercised; extensive reading of ancient and modern poetry is shown; and occasionally philosophical subjects are handled with considerable happiness both of thought and of illustration."—LORD BROUGHAM: Lives of Men of Letters, &c.

"Johnson has himself done great good by exposing great faults in great authors. His criticism on Milton's highest work is the most valuable of all his writings. He seldom is erroneous in his censures, but he never is sufficiently excited to admiration of what is purest and highest in poetry."—W. SAVAGE LANDOR.

In another part of his writings, Landor concurs in a censure frequently urged against Johnson of injustice to Milton on account of party prejudices. This subject must be glanced at before we leave our theme.

"Dr. Johnson's Lives of the Poets are necessarily a prominent ornament of every library, as they have been the common theme of admiration of all countries. The style and the reflections are the chief charm of this popular work. Many of the facts must be cautiously admitted. Not that Johnson designedly falsified; but he always wanted time, diligence, and patience in the collection of his materials; and he rejoiced to find the fact as he wished to find it, without sufficiently weighing it in the balance of impartiality. He hugged every thing which he thought might throw a shade on a republican, a whig, or a dissenter, and spared no pains in executing such a picture in his most powerful and overwhelming colours."—Dibdin's Lib. Comp., ed. 1825, 521, n.

We shall now introduce some brief extracts from the graceful pen of the distinguished author of the History of Ferdinand and Isabella:

"Johnson's work, as every one knows, is conducted on the most capricious and irregular plan. . . . Besides these defects of plan, the critic was certainly deficient in sensibility to the more delicate, the minor beauties of poetic sentiment. He analyzes verse in the cold-blooded spirit of a chemist, until all the atoms which constituted its principal charm escapes in the decomposition. By this kind of process, some of the finest fancies of the Muse the lofty dithyrambics of Gray, the ethereal effusions of Collins, and of Milton too, are rendered sufficiently vapid."

This accomplished critic proceeds to point out what he esteems to be defects in the Doctor's taste in composition, and the graver objections to his work arising from the effects of religious and political prejudices, and then continues:

"With all this, there is no one of the works of this great and good man in which he has displayed more of the strength of his mighty intellect, shown a more pure and masculine morality, more sound principles of criticism in the abstract, and more acute delineation of character, and more gorgeous splendour of diction."

Johnson's Life of Milton, however, does not escape Mr. Prescott's severe animadversions:

"A production more discreditable to the author is not to be found in the whole of his voluminous works, equally discreditable, whether regarded in an historical light or as a sample of literary criticism. . . . His life of Milton is a humiliating testimony of the power of political and religious prejudices to warp a great and good mind from the standard of truth, in the estimation not merely of contemporary excellence, but of the great of other years, over whose frailties Time might be supposed to have drawn his friendly mantle."—Prescott's Miscellanies, ed. 1855, 247, 248, 277, 278, and in North Amer. Review for October, 1829.

John Foster warms with equal indignation at the same theme:

"There are parts of the Lives of the Poets which every lover of literary or moral justice would be glad to see stamped with an indelible brand of reprobation, with a disgrace so signal and pernicious as to be a perpetual warning against the perversion of criticism and private history by political and religious bigotry and personal spleen."—Criticism on the English Poets: Foster's Essays, Lon., 1856, i. 145, and in Edec. Rev., March, 1808.

Foster then proceeds to specify the instances of Milton and Gray: he is eloquent, and we would fain quote more of his flowing rhetoric; but this must not be.

Even Dr. Drake, one of Johnson's warmest admirers, does not venture to enter a plea of "Not Guilty" on Johnson's behalf:

"No man can entertain a higher idea of Johnson's intellectual powers, as a lexicographer, a teacher, and a moralist, than myself; but poetical criticism was not his province; and though in point of style his Lives be superior, perhaps, to any of his preceding compositions, they are infinitely more disgraced by the inexcusable partialities of the man."—Drake's Literary Hours, vol. i. 22.

Cumberland, Johnson's old friend, writing long after the Doctor's death, is disposed to treat the indignant outcry elicited by these strictures of the latter with very little respect:

"He was an acute and able critic: the enthusiastic admirers of Milton and the friends of Gray will have something to complain of, but criticism is a task which no man executes to all men's satisfaction. . . . A work of merit, which abounds in beauties far more numerous than its defects, and much more pleasing to contemplate."—Cumberland's Memoirs: Samuel Johnson.

Dr. Channing is more lenient to Johnson than many of Milton's apologists are disposed to be:

"We could find no pleasure in sacrificing one great man to the manes of another. . . . He did not and he could not appreciate Milton. We doubt whether two other minds, having so little in common as those of which we are speaking, can be found in the higher walks of literature. Johnson was great in his own sphere, but that sphere was comparatively of 'the earth,' while Milton's was only inferior to that of angels. It was customary, in the day of Johnson's glory, to call him a giant, to class him with a mighty but still an earth-born race. Milton we should rank among seraphs."

Channing proceeds in this truly-eloquent strain for some lines, and then applies the contrast to the reader's own judgment, by demanding,

"How could Johnson be just to Milton?"—Remarks on the Character and Writings of John Milton.

Johnson here escapes far more easily than he generally does when arraigned for this oft-urged offence, and this mitigation of punishment will be demurred at by many of the champions of the immortal Milton. But we have a higher defence to plead, (or rather to adduce, for we plead nothing on either side;) nothing less than an entire acquittal of the alleged culprit:

"That he had strong prepossessions against Milton's political opinions cannot be doubted, but it is by no means incorrect to affirm, as has been by some generally affirmed, that this feeling made him unfair to that great poet's merits. No one can read his criticism on Paradise Lost, without perceiving that he places it next to the Iliad, and in some respects on an equal, if not a higher, level. The praise of it in The Rambler is equally ample. His objections are not at all groundless; and, although to the lesser pieces he may not be equally just, it is certain that, except to the Lycidas, he shows no very marked unfairness, while, in observing the faults of the others, he largely commemorates their beauties."—LORD BROUGHAM: Lives of Men of Letters, &c.

As regards the literary merits of Johnson's review of PARADISE LOST, perhaps many scholars, of all classes of opinions, will acknowledge a participation, to some extent, in the enthusiasm which animates the glowing eulogy of Dibdin:

"Who that reads Johnson's criticisms on certain portions of the Paradise Lost is not convinced that he is reading one of the most masterly performances of the human intellect? exhibiting an extent and power of conception, a vigour and felicity of diction—such as one knows not where to find equalled in any modern production."—Lib. Comp., ed. 1825, 521.

Before leaving this part of our subject we must not omit to notice an edit. recently issued (Lon., 1854, 3 vols. 8vo) of Johnson's Lives of the British Poets, with Notes, corrective and explanatory, by Peter Cunningham. This the collector of a "Johnsonian Library" must immediately procure. A new impression of Hazlitt's ed. of the Lives of the Poets was also pub., Lon., 1854, 4 vols. fp. 8vo. We may add that he will find a valuable guide to Johnsoniana in the list furnished by Lowndes (containing about sixty books) in the Bibliographer's Manual, 1032–1033. See also Index to Blackw. Mag., vols. i.–l.

5. DR. JOHNSON'S STYLE OF COMPOSITION.

In this department of our subject also we shall have something to produce on both sides of the question:

"To Johnson may be attributed the establishment of our present refinement, and it is with truth he observes of his Rambler, 'That he had laboured to refine our language to grammatical purity, and to clear it from colloquial barbarisms, licentious idioms, and irregular combinations;' and that he has added to the elegance of its construction and to the harmony of its cadence."—Disraeli's Miscell. of Lit., Style, ed. Lon., 1840, 7.

"Johnson and Addison were the first who again familiarized us with more glowing and sonorous diction, and made us feel the tameness and poorness of the sermon style of Addison and Swift."—LORD JEFFREY: Contrib. to the Edin. Rev., Lon., 1853, 77, and in Edin. Rev., Sept. 1816.

We know not where we can better quote Lord Jeffrey's description of Johnson as "that great master of reason," (Edin. Rev., xv. 175,) and Sir Archibald Alison's assertion (Hist. of Europe, 1789–1815, chap. ix.) that Dr Johnson was "the strongest intellect and the most profound observer of the eighteenth century."

"The distinguishing excellence of Johnson's manner, both in speaking and writing, consists in the apt and lively illustrations by example with which in his vigorous mind, he enforces his just and acute remarks on human life and manners in all their modes and representations; its character and charm of his style, in a happy choice of dignified and appropriate expressions, and that masterly mediation of phrase by which he contrives to bolt the prominent idea strongly on the mind."—Green's Diary of a Lover of Lit., Ipswich, 1810, 9–10.

"At length rose the Colossus of English Philology, SAMUEL JOHNSON, having silently and unremittingly formed his style upon the basis of that of Sir Thomas Browne,—a name in every respect to be held in grateful remembrance. But Johnson as a philologist, is almost an original: and doubtless among the very foremost in the ranks of the literature of his country. And yet I know not how it is, but as years creep on we do not read his pages with that devoted enthusiasm which we did in our college days: for who reads the man who, having earned his thirtieth year, penned either Rasselas or the Rambler?"—Dibdin's Lib. Comp., ed. 1825, 617–618.

"His writings will live forever, still more and more studied and admired, while Britons shall continue to be characterised by a love of elegance and sublimity, of good sense and virtue."—Bishop Horne.

"Johnson's first style was naturally energetic; his middle style was turgid to a fault; his latter style was softened down and harmonized into periods more tuneful and more intelligible."—Cumberland's Memoirs.

"A love of hard and learned words prevailed throughout; and a fondness for balanced periods was its special characteristic. But there was often great felicity in the expression, occasionally a pleasing cadence in the rhythm, generally an epigrammatic turn in the language, as well as in the id[illegible] even where the workmanship seemed most to surpass the material, and the word-craft to be exercised needlessly and the diction to run to waste, there was never any feebleness to complain of, and always something of skill and effect to admire. The charm of nature was ever wanting, but the presence of great art was undeniable. Nothing was seen of the careless aspect which the highest of artists ever gi[illegible] paces,—the produce of elaborate but concealed pains; yet the strong hand of an able workman was always marked; and it was observed, too that he had disdained to hide from us the far less labour which he had much more easily bestowed. There is no denying that some of Johnson's works, from the meagreness of the material and the regularity of the monotonous style, are exceedingly little adapted to reading. They are flimsy, and they are dull; they are pompous, and though full of undeniable—indeed, self-evident—truths, they are somewhat empty; they are, moreover, wrapped up in a style so disproportioned in its importance, that the perusal becomes very tiresome, and is soon given up. This character belongs more especially to the Rambler, the object of such unmeasured praises among his followers, and from whom he received the title of the Great Moralist."—Lord Brougham: Lives of Men of Letters, &c.

The reader will find a continuation of his lordship's remarks in our notice of the Rambler in a preceding page. The noble critic places the Life of Cowley at "the head of all" the author's writings, and (as we have already intimated) considers the review of Soame Jenyns's Inquiry into the Origin of Evil "one of his happiest performances."

"The third period [in the progress of English style] may be called the Rhetorical, and is distinguished by the prevalence of a school of writers of which Johnson was the founder. The fundamental character of this style is that it employs undisguised art where classical writers appear only to obey the impulse of a cultivated and adorned nature. . . .

"As the mind of Johnson was robust, but neither nimble nor graceful, so his style, though sometimes significant, nervous, and even majestic, was void of all grace and ease, and, being the most unlike of all styles to the natural effusion of a cultivated mind, had the least pretensions to the praise of eloquence. During the period, now near a close, in which he was a favourite model, a stiff symmetry and tedious monotony succeeded to that various music with which the taste of Addison diversified his periods, and to that natural imagery which his beautiful genius seemed, with graceful negligence, to scatter over his composition."—Sir James Mackintosh: Memoirs of his Life, 1835, 2 vols. 8vo.

"What most distinguishes Dr. Johnson from other writers is the pomp and uniformity of his style. All his periods are cast in the same mould, are of the same size and shape, and, consequently, have little fitness to the variety of things he professes to treat of. His subjects are familiar, but the author is always upon stilts. He has neither ease nor simplicity, and his efforts at playfulness in part remind one of the lines in Milton:

'The elephant
To make them sport wreathed his proboscis lithe.'" Hazlitt on the Periodical Essayist.

"All his books are written in a learned language; in a language which nobody hears from his mother or his nurse; in a language in which nobody ever quarrels, or drives bargains, or makes love, in a language in which nobody ever thinks. . . . Mannerism is pardonable, and is sometimes even agreeable, when the manner, though vicious, is natural. Few readers, for example, would be willing to part with the mannerism of Milton or Burke. But a mannerism which does not sit easy on the mannerist—which has been adopted on principle, and which can be sustained only by constant effort—is always offensive. And such is the mannerism of Johnson."—T. B. Macaulay: Crit and Hist Essays, Lon. 1854, I. 398–399; and in Edin. Rev., Sept 1831.

"The Doctor's taste in composition,' remarks Mr Prescott, in his notice of Johnson's Lives of the Poets, just quoted from, "to judge from his own style, was not of the highest order. It was a style, indeed, of extraordinary power, suited to the expression of his original thinking, bold, vigorous, and glowing with all the lustre of polished antithesis. But the brilliancy is cold, and the ornaments are much too florid and overcharged for a graceful effect."—Miscellanies, 1855, 248.

"No man," remarks one of the greatest masters of the English tongue, "contemplates with greater tenderness than we do the frailties of Dr. Johnson; none respects more the sound parts of his moral system, or admires more the vigor of the elephantine step with which he sometimes tramples down insolent error and presumptuous sophistry. But let no young man who wishes to learn to write well study his style."—Edward Everett: N. Amer. Rev., xli. 3–4.

It was formerly greatly the fashion to copy, or to endeavour to copy, the "Johnsonian style." Mr. Macaulay declared (review of Croker's Boswell, Edin. Rev., Sept. 1831) that Johnson's "peculiarities have been imitated by his admirers, and parodied by his assailants, till the public has become sick of the subject."

A critic in the same periodical (for Oct. 1856) remarks that

"It is not easy for those who have not inspected contemporaneous literature,—especially its second-rate productions,—to conceive to what an extent Johnson's style was imitated by his admirers."—Vol. xciii. 353.

Sir James Mackintosh observes, as late as 1831, that "From the corruptions introduced by Dr. Johnson, English style was only then recovering."

Disraeli says:

"Such was the influence of the elaborate novelty of Johnson, that every writer in every class servilely copied the Latinised style, ludicrously mimicking the contortions and re-echoing the sonorous nothings, of our great lexicographer. The novelist of domestic life, or the agriculturist in a treatise on turnips, alike aimed at the polysyllabic force and the cadenced period. Such was the condition of English style for more than twenty years."—Miscell. of Lit.: Style; ed. Lon., 1840, 8.

"At present," says Hazlitt, in his Sixth Lecture on the English Poets, delivered at the Surrey Institution in 1818, "we cannot see a lottery-puff or a quack advertisement pasted against a wall, that is not perfectly Johnsonian in style."

"His brilliant style," says Mr. Prescott, "has been the imitation of every schoolboy, and of some children of larger growth, since the days of the Rambler. But the nearer they come to it the worse. The beautiful is turned into the fantastic, and the sublime into the ridiculous."—Miscellanies, 1855, 271–272, and in N. Amer. Review, Oct. 1839.

Dr. Southey regarded these imitators with as little complacency. "Look," he exclaims, in a letter to Henry Taylor, Dec. 31, 1825, "at the imitations of Gibbon and Johnson!"

The too frequent use of words derived from the Latin and Greek is often alleged against Johnson's compositions, and, we think, with reason. But the objector often carries his charge too far. The use of such derivatives in moderation and with propriety is to be encouraged rather than censured. Those who display their ignorance of the language by accusing Johnson of word-making will have to revive their knowledge of early English vocabularies. Let those who are so fond of Anglo-Saxon "undefiled" amuse themselves occasionally with a page or two of Aldhelm, Ceolfrid of Wearmouth, or Felix of Croyland. Let them read to their families, for weekday entertainment, King Alfred's Orosius, and wind up the devotions of the Sabbath with the royal translator's Psalms of David, or the good Alfric's Paschal Homily.

6. Dr. Johnson's Appearance, Manners, and Conversation.

To James Boswell, the famous biographer of Johnson, our acknowledgments have already been made in the article devoted to the consideration of his literary character. The reader will there find many tributes to the merits of a work which can never lose its popularity, and will always keep fresh in the minds of men the characters of the author and his illustrious subject. Boswell's account of his first interview with the formidable lexicographer is too amusing to be omitted. It occurred in the back-parlour of Tom Davies, the actor and bookseller, (celebrated for his learning and his handsome wife,) whom we have already registered on the 482d page of this Dictionary.

"Mr. Davies recollected several of Johnson's remarkable sayings, and was one of the best of the many imitators of his voice and manner while relating them. He increased my impatience more and more to see the extraordinary man whose works I highly valued, and whose conversation was reported to be so peculiarly excellent.

"At last, on Monday, the 16th of May, [1763,] when I was sitting in Mr. Davies's back-parlour, after having drunk tea with him and Mrs. Davies, Johnson unexpectedly came into the shop; and Mr. Davies having perceived him through the glass door in the room in which we were sitting advancing towards us, he announced his awful approach to me, somewhat in the manner of an actor in the part of Horatio, when he addresses Hamlet on the appearance of his father's ghost: 'Look, my lord, it comes!' I found that I had a very perfect idea of Johnson's figure, from the portrait painted of him by Sir Joshua Reynolds after he had published his Dictionary, in the attitude of sitting in his easy-chair in deep meditation; which was the first picture his friend did for him, which Sir Joshua very kindly presented to me, and from which an engraving has been made for this work. Mr. Davies mentioned my name, and respectfully introduced me to him. I was much agitated, and, recollecting his prejudice against the Scotch, of which I had heard much, I said to Davies, 'Don't tell where I came from.' 'From Scotland,' cried Davies, roguishly. 'Mr. Johnson,' said I, 'I do indeed come from Scotland, but I cannot help it.' I am willing to flatter myself that I meant this as light pleasantry to soothe and conciliate him, and not as a humiliating abasement at the expense of my country. But, however that might be, this speech was somewhat unlucky; for, with that quickness of wit for which he was so remarkable, he seized the expression 'come from Scotland,' which I used in the sense of being of that country, and, as if I had said that I could not help being a Scotchman, retorted, 'That, sir, is what many a man would be glad to help.' This stroke [illegible] and, when we had sat down, I felt myself not a little embarrassed, and apprehensive of what might come next. He then addressed himself to Davies: 'What do you think of Garrick? He has refused me an order for the play for Miss Williams, because he knows the house will be full, and that an order will be worth three shillings.' Eager to take any opening to get into conversation with him, I ventured to say, 'O, not thank Mr. Garrick would grudge sect a trifle to you.' 'Sir,' said he, with a stern look, 'I have known David Garrick longer than you have done; and I know no right you have to talk to me on the subject.' Perhaps I deserved this check; for it was rather presumptuous in me, an entire stranger, to express any doubt of the justice of his animadversion upon his old acquaintance and pupil. I now felt myself much mortified, and began to think that the hope I had long indulged of obtaining his acquaintance was blasted. And, in truth, had not my ardour been uncommonly strong and my resolution uncommonly persevering, so rough a reception might have deterred me forever from making any further attempts. Fortunately, however, I remained upon the field, not wholly discomfited, and was soon rewarded by hearing some of his conversation, of which I preserved the following short minute, without marking the questions and observations by which it was produced."—Boswell's Life of Johnson, Croker's ed., Lon., 1848, r. 8vo, 133–134. See the note to p. 133 for a vindication of Garrick, or rather, for evidence of his liberality.

The acquaintance thus commenced was sedulously cultivated by Boswell; and until his great friend's demise, more than twenty years after this first interview,

"The worship of Johnson was his grand, ideal, voluntary business. Does not the frothy hearted yet enthusiastic man doffing his advocate's wig, regularly take post, and hurry up to London, for the sake of his sage chiefly, as to a Feast of Tabernacles the Sabbath of his whole year?"—Carlyle's Review of Boswell's Johnson.

How faithfully he did service in embalming the droppings of wisdom which fell from those reverend lips, we have many evidences, and none more amusing than that related by Miss Burney:

"When in that presence," says the fair narrator, "he was made-servant, if not contemptuous, of every one else. In truth when he met with Dr. Johnson, he commonly forbore even answering any thing that was said, or attending to any thing that went forward, lest he should miss the smallest sound from that voice to which he paid such exclusive though merited homage. But the moment that voice burst forth, the effect which it excited on Mr. Boswell amounted almost to pain. His eyes goggled with eagerness, he leant his ear almost on the shoulder of the doctor and his mouth dropped open to catch every syllable that might be uttered; nay, he seemed not only to dread losing a word, but to be anxious not to miss a breathing; as if hoping from it latently, or mystically, some information."

The great man was not so much conciliated by this extraordinary deference as to always endure Boswell's curiosity tamely. On one occasion, when Boswell had been for some time persisting in questioning him with, "What did you do, sir?" "What did you say, sir?" &c., Johnson at last lost all patience, and exclaimed, "I will not be put to the question, sir! Do you not consider, sir, that these are not the manners of a gentleman? I will not be baited with what and why. What is this? What is that? Why is a cow's tail long? Why is a fox's tail bushy?" "Why, sir," pleaded Boswell, "you are so good that I venture to trouble you." "Sir," rejoined Johnson, "my being so good is no reason why you should be so ill."

"He was, if we are to give any credit to his own account or to the united testimony of all who knew him, a man of the meanest and feeblest intellect. Johnson described him as a fellow who had missed his only chance of immortality by not having been alive when the Dunciad was written. Beauclerk used his name as a proverbial expression for a bore. He was the laughing-stock of the whole of that brilliant society which has owed to him the greater part of its fame. . . . Every thing which another would have pondered, every thing the publication of which would have made another man hang himself, was matter of gay and clamorous exultation to his weak and diseased mind. What silly things he said, what bulls, what retorts he provoked, how at one place he was troubled with evil presentiments which came to nothing, how at another place, on waking from a drunken doze, he read the Prayer-Book and took a hair of the dog that had bitten him, how he went to see men hanged and came away maudlin, how he added two hundred pounds to the fortune of one of his babies because he was not scared at Johnson's ugly face, . . . how his father, and the very wife of his bosom, laughed and fretted at his foolories,—all these things he proclaimed to all the world, as if they had been subjects for pride and congratulation rejoicing. All the caprices of his temper, all the illusions of his vanity, all his hypochondriac whimsies, all his castles in the air, he displayed with a cool self-complacency, a perfect unconsciousness that he was making a fool of himself, to which it is impossible to find a parallel in the whole history of mankind. He has used many people ill; but assuredly he has used nobody so ill as himself. . . . Of all the talents which ordinarily raise men to eminence as writers, Boswell had absolutely none. There is not in all his books a single remark of his own on literature, politics, religion, or society, which is not either commonplace or absurd. His dissertations on hereditary gentility, on the slave-trade, and on the entailing of landed estates, may serve as examples. To say that these passages are sophistical would be to pay them an extravagant compliment. They have no pretence to argument or even to meaning. He has reported innumerable observations made by himself in the course of conversation. Of these observations we do not remember one which is above the intellectual capacity of a boy of fifteen. He has printed many of his own letters, and in those letters he is always reeling or twaddling."—Essays, 1854. i. 370, 371, 372, 373.

This is an admirably-drawn portrait, and, unfortunately for the subject, those who have been inclined to think it too highly coloured will perhaps be less disposed to question the faithfulness of the artist after reading some of Boswell's Letters to the Rev. W. J. Temple, just brought to light in a most remarkable manner, (if we are to believe the story,) and pub. in 1857. See reviews of these Letters in Edin. Rev., April, 1857; Lon. Gent. Mag., Feb., 1857; Lon. Athenæum, Dec. 27, 1856; the Spectator, Times, &c. But really we think Mr. Macaulay is here guilty of something which borders on caricature: Boswell was certainly not quite such a born and perennial fool as his critic makes him appear. Schlosser is disposed to ridicule the avidity with which the English devour

"Those oracular sayings which Boswell has collected as if they were pearls and diamonds. Boswell has by far outstripped the collectors of all the trifles, personal anecdotes, and miserable nothings which refer to Göthe, and the English have, as thankfully and with as much curiosity, swallowed every triviality about this much-admired and worshipped critic and artist in taste and literature, as the Germans every trifling anecdote about their greatest poet and prose-writer."—Schlosser's Hist of the Eighteenth Cent., &c., Davison's Trans., Lon., 1844, vol. ii. 68.

But who can marvel that all who love the English tongue and English Republic of Letters are in love with this inimitable biography, when it must be admitted that—to quote the language of one of the greatest of modern writers—

"Considering the eminent persons to whom Boswell's Life of Johnson relates, the quantity of miscellaneous information and entertaining gossip which it brings together, it may be termed, without exception the best piece-table book that ever was written."—Sir Walter Scott.

But we are forgetting to give some description of the Appearance of the great man, as promised in our last heading. Miss Burney's pencil shall be again called to our aid

"He is, indeed, very ill-favoured! Yet he has naturally a noble figure,—tall, stout grand, and authoritative, but he stoops horribly; his back is quite round; his mouth is continually opening and shutting, as if he were chewing something; he has a singular method of twirling his fingers and twisting his hands; his vast body is in constant agitation, see-sawing backwards and forwards; his feet are never a moment quiet, and his whole great person looked often as if it were going to roll itself, quite voluntarily, from its chair to the floor."

Perhaps no one has better described the dress of this strange-looking giant than the famous satirical poet of the day:

> "Methinks I view his full, plain suit of brown,
> The large grey bushy wig, that graced his crown;
> Black worsted stockings, little silver buckles,
> And shirt that had no ruffles for his knuckles
> I mark the brown great-coat of cloth he wore,
> That two huge Patagonian pockets bore,
> Which Patagonians cwoudrons to unfold!)
> Would hardly both his Dictionaries hold."—Peter Pindar.

We shall have more to quote respecting Johnson's appearance before we have finished this article. Let us now turn to his Conversation, in the descriptions of which his Manners will, of course, come more or less under notice! In our introductory quotation, indeed, (from Miss Burney,) Johnson's manners, or want of manners, occupy a prominent place.

"Boswell's Life of Johnson has given a wrong impression of him in respect to When we see four large volumes written upon a man's conversation through a period of forty years, and his remarks of a certain class made at the time we naturally take the idea that Johnson was the central point of society for all that period. That idea is never was in good society.—at least in those circles where men of letters mix with the fashionable world. His brutal, indecent manners excluded him from it, of course. He met good society at Thrale's, at the Literary Club and at Sir Joshua Reynolds's. Gibbon was asked why he did not talk more in the presence of Dr Johnson. 'Sir,' replied the historian, taking a pinch of snuff, 'I have no pretensions to the ability of contending with Dr Johnson in brutality and insolence.'"—Sir James Mackintosh's Conversations with Alexander H. Everett: N. Amer. Rev., xxxv. 445–446, 8.

Yet, notwithstanding the apparent severity of these strictures, no one had a higher opinion of Johnson's conversational abilities and moral worth than Sir James entertained, as we shall show on a future page.

Johnson himself had a satisfactory way of accounting for the absence of invitations to the tables of the great. "Lords and ladies," he remarked, "don't like to have their mouths stopped." But the truth is, as Lord Brougham very correctly remarks,

"That in those days no one was, generally speaking, admitted into patrician society merely for the intrinsic merits of his writings or his talk without having some access to it through his rank or his political or professional eminence. . . . It is equally erroneous to suppose that Johnson's rough exterior, or his uncouth and even unpleasant habits, could have prevented his fame and his conversation from being sought after to adorn aristocratic parties in later times. All these petty obstacles would have been easily got over by the vanity of having such a person to show, and, indeed, by the real interest which the display of his colloquial powers would have possessed among a more refined and better-educated generation."—Lives of Men of Letters, &c.

Horace Walpole was one of the principal leaders of fashion during the whole of Johnson's literary reign; and it is certain that he would never have subjected his aristocratic domains to the Gothic invasion of the lexicographer. The portrait which he has left us of Johnson is as little complimentary as that drawn by Sir James Mackintosh:

"With a lumber of learning and some strong parts," says Horrich, "Johnson was an odious and mean character. By principle a Jacobite, arrogant, self-sufficient, and overbearing by nature, ungrateful through pride, and of feminine bigotry, he had prostituted his pen to party, even in a dictionary, and had afterwards, for a pension, contradicted his own definitions. His manners were sordid, supercilious, and brutal: his style ridiculously bombastic and verbose; and, in one word, with all the pedantry, he had all the gigantic littleness, of a country schoolmaster."—Memoirs of the Reign of George III, vol. ii. 325.

But much of the effect of the dark colours of this picture is lost upon the reader when he remembers Johnson's pertinacious opposition to Sir Robert Walpole's administration; and especially his admission to Sir George Staunton,—which Horace had probably heard,—that, when he made parliamentary speeches for the Gentleman's Magazine, he "always took care to put Sir Robert Walpole in the wrong, and to say every thing he could against the electorate of Hanover." Johnson admitted very frankly that he did not forget his politics when composing these celebrated parliamentary speeches. When commended, long afterwards, for having "dealt out reason and eloquence with an equal hand to both parties," "That is not quite true," said Johnson: "I saved appearances tolerably well; but I took care that the Whig dogs should not have the best of it." With reference to Walpole's sketch of Johnson, just quoted, we may add that the celebrated Heroic Epistle in which Johnson is satirized was ascribed to Walpole, and also to Mason, or to both combined. Lord Chesterfield's description of Johnson, in a letter to his lordship's son, will at once recur to many of our readers. Boswell, and other contemporaneous chroniclers, certainly record many instances of colloquial brusquerie—to use the mildest term—on the part of the lexicographer, which could not have been altogether grateful to the feelings of even the humblest of the great man's admirers. Of these we had intended to quote some specimens, but our limited space forbids. One amusing incident, however, must not be omitted. In our life of Oliver Goldsmith we quoted George Colman's glowing tribute to the kindness of heart and manner which so pre eminently distinguished that wayward son of genius. The same excellent story teller—certainly one of the best of modern days—has left us the following far less flattering picture of Goldsmith's "guide, philosopher, and friend:"

"My boyish mind had anticipated an awful impression when I was first brought unwittingly into the presence of the stupendous Johnson. I knew not then that he had 'a love for little children,' calling them 'pretty dears and giving them sweetmeats,' as Boswell hath since, in the simplicity of his heart, narrated. It was my hapless lot, however, to be excluded from the objects of this proposition. Perhaps, at my age, of about fourteen, I might have been too old, or too ugly; but the idea of Johnson's carrying bonbons to give to children of any age is much like supposing that a Greenland bear has a pocket stuff'd with tartlets for travellers.

"On the day of my introduction he was asked to dinner at my father's house, in Soho-square, and the erudite savage came a full hour before his time. I happened to be with my father, who was beginning his toilette, when it was announced to him that the Doctor had arrived. My sire, being one of the tributary princes who did homage to this monarch, was somewhat flurried, and, having dressed himself hastily, took me with him into the drawing-room.

"On our entrance we found Johnson sitting in a fauteuil of rose-coloured satin, the arms and legs of which, of the chair, remember, not of the Doctor) were of burnish'd gold, and the contrast of the man with the seat was very striking: an unwash'd coalheaver in a rifacimento could not be much more misplaced than Johnson thus deposited. He was dress'd in a rusty suit of brown cloth dittos, with black worsted stockings; his old yellow wig was of formidable dimensions; and the learned head which sustained it roll'd about in a seemingly paralytic motion, but, in the performance of its orbit, it inclined chiefly to one shoulder, whether to the right or left I cannot now remember,—a fault never to be forgiven by certain of the Twaddlers, who think these matters of the utmost importance. He deign'd not to rise on our entrance, and we stood before him while he and my father talk'd. There was soon a pause in the colloquy; and my father, making his advantage of it, took me by the hand, and said, 'Doctor Johnson, this is a little Colman.' The Doctor bestow'd a slight, ungracious glance upon me, and, continuing the rotary motion of his head, renew'd the previous conversation. Again there was a pause:—again the anxious father, who had fail'd in his first effort, seized the opportunity for pushing his progeny, with, 'This is my son, Doctor Johnson.' The great man's contempt for me was now roused to great wrath; and, knitting his brows, he exclaim'd, in a voice of thunder, 'I see him, sir!' He then fell back in his rose-colour'd satin fauteuil, as if giving himself up to meditation, implying that he would not be further plagued either with an old fool or a young one.

"The gigantick Johnson could not be easily thrown out at window, particularly by my undersized sire; but he deserved to be 'quolted down stairs, like a shave-great shilling;' not exactly, perhaps, for his brutality to the boy, but for such an unprovoked insult to the father of whose hospitalities he was partaking. This, however, is only one among the numerous traits of grossness already promulgated, in which the Bolt Court philosopher completely falsified the principles of the Roman poet:

'In genius didicisse fideliter artes,
Emollit mores, nec sinit esse feros.'

"After this rude rebuff from the Doctor, I had the additional felicity to be placed next to him at dinner. He was silent over his meal; but I observed that he was, as Shylock says of Launcelot Gobbo, 'a huge feeder;' and, during the display of his voracity, (which was worthy of Bolt Court.) the perspiration fell in copious drops from his visage upon the table-cloth. The clumsiness of the bulky animal, his strange costume, his uncouth gestures, yet the dominion which he usurped withal, rendered his presence a phenomenon among gentlemen: it was the incursion of a new species of barbarian,—a learned Attila, King of the Huns, come to subjugate polish'd society. Oliver Goldsmith, several years before my luckless presentation to Johnson, proved how 'doctors differ.'"

Read the conclusion of this anecdote on page 693 of this Dictionary; commencing with,

"I was only five years old when Goldsmith took me on his knee," &c

No one has made a better excuse for Johnson's occasional roughness, and even boorishness, than Sir Walter Scott; and to his pages (in his Life of Johnson) we must refer the reader:

"He was, in a word, despotic," remarks Sir Walter; "and despotism will occasionally lead the best dispositions into an unbecoming abuse of power. It is not likely that any one will again enjoy, or have an opportunity of abusing the singular degree of submission which was rendered to Johnson by all around him."

The colloquial monarch, ruling in his "pride of place," has been well described by Lord Brougham:

"He loved to fill a chair, surrounded with a circle well known to him, and ex cathedra to deliver his judgments. It cannot be said that this was any thing like a high style of conversation. It had nothing in it like full or free discussion; it had even little like free interchange of sentiments or opinions. It was occasionally enlivened by wit, often er broken by a growl or a sneer from him, and from him alone. But his part of it was always arrogant and dictatorial; nor, after men's curiosity had once been gratified by assisting at one of these talks, did any but the small number of his familiar and admiring friends often desire to repeat the experiment. His talk was most commonly for victory, rather than directed to the clearing up of rational doubt or the ascertaining of important truth; nor, unless upon the serious subject of religion, and upon some of the points involved in the Whig and Tory controversies, did he [illegible] ch side he [illegible]ed, dogmatized, laughed boisterously, or sneered rudely."—Lives of Men of Letters, &c

His wonderful conversational abilities have been the theme of unceasing eulogy from this day to our own, and cannot fail to excite the admiration of our latest successors.

"When animated by the cheering attention of friends whom he liked, he would give full scope to those talents for narration, in which I verily think he was unrivalled both in the brilliancy of his wit the flow of his humour, and the energy of his language."—Cumberland's Memoirs.

"I do not care on what subject Johnson talks, but I love better to hear him talk than anybody: he either gives you new thoughts or a new colouring."—ORME, the historian of India.

"The most triumphant record of the talents and character of Johnson is to be found in Boswell's Life of him. The man was superior to the author. When he laid aside his pen, which he regarded as an encumbrance, he became not only learned and thoughtful, but acute, witty, humorous, natural, honest, hearty, and determined: 'the king of good fellows and wale of old men.' There are as many smart repartees, profound remarks, and keen invectives to be found in Boswell's 'inventory of all he said,' as are recorded of any celebrated man. The life and dramatic play of his conversation forms a contrast to his written works. His natural powers and undisguised opinions were called out in convivial intercourse. In public he practised with the foils: in private he unsheathed the sword of controversy, and it was the Ebro's temper."—Hazlitt on the Periodical Essayists.

"There was a pith about old Samuel which nothing could stand up against. His influence was not so much that of an author as a thinker. He was the most powerful intellect in the world of books. He was the Jackson of the literary ring—the judge—the emperor—a giant—acknowledged to be a Saul amongst the people. Even David Hume would have been like a woman in his grasp; but, odd enough, the two never met."—CHRISTOPHER NORTH: Noctes Ambrosianæ, April 2, 1822.

"Boswell's Life of Johnson is so replete with the sayings and thoughts of the intellectual giant, whom it was so much his object to elevate, even above his natural Patagonian stature, that it may be regarded as a sort of autobiography, dictated by the sage, in his moments of abandon, to his devout worshipper. It is not going too far to say that it is among the most popular books in the English language. Johnson's reputation now mainly rests on that biography."—SIR ARCHIBALD ALISON: Essays, 1850, ii. 392; and in Blackw. Mag., Sept. 1849.

"Johnson, as Mr. Burke most justly observed, appears far greater in Boswell's books than in his own. His conversation appears to have been quite equal to his writings in matter, and far superior to them in manner. When he talked, he clothed his wit and his sense in forcible and natural expressions. As soon as he took his pen in hand to write for the public, his style became systematically vicious. . . . The reputation of those writings which he probably expected to be immortal is every day fading; while those goodnatured effusions manner, and that careless table-talk, the memory of which, he probably thought, would die with him, are likely to be remembered as long as the English language is spoken in any quarter of the globe. —T. B. MACAULAY: Essays, 1854, iii. 398, 401; and in Edin. Rev., Sept. 1831.

"How much is Johnson raised in our estimation, not only as to intellect but personal character, by the industrious eavesdroppings of Boswell, sitting down, day by day, in his note-book, the fragments of his most loose and unweighed conversations!"—LORD JEFFREY: Essays, 1850, 960; and in Edin. Rev., Oct. 1835.

"His conversation, which was one of the most powerful instruments of his extensive influence, was artificial, dogmatic sentimentious, and poignant; adapted, with the most admirable versatility, to every subject as it arose, and distinguished by an almost unparalleled power of serious repartee. He seems to have considered himself as a sort of colloquial magistrate, who inflicted severe punishment from just policy. His course of life led him to treat those sensibilities, which such severity wounds, as fantastic and effeminate; and he entered society too late to acquire those habits of politeness which are a substitute for natural delicacy."—SIR JAMES MACKINTOSH: Memoirs of his Life, 1835, 2 vols. 8vo.

We have already recorded Sir James's opinion of Johnson's manners, and shall have occasion hereafter to adduce his testimony to the general excellence of his character. Sir Walter Scott remarks, with great truth:

"Of all the men distinguished in the other age Dr Johnson has left upon posterity the strongest and most impressive so far as person, manners, disposition, and conversation are concerned. We do but name him, or open a book which he has written and the sound and action recall to the imagination at once his merits, his peculiarities,—nay, the very nice influences of his tones, and the deep impressive tone of his voice . . . He is in mind's eye a personification as lively as that of Siddons in Lady Macbeth, or Kemble in Cardinal Wolsey."—Life of Johnson.

Perhaps no one has drawn so admirable a miniature from Boswell's full-length portrait of Johnson as Mr. Macaulay has presented to us:

"Johnson grown old, Johnson in the fulness of his fame and in the enjoyment of a competent fortune, is better known than any man in history. Every thing about him, even his wig, his figure, his face, his scrofula, his St Vitus's dance, his rolling walk, his blinking eye, the outward signs which too plainly marked his approbation of his dinner, his insatiable appetite for fish sauce and veal-pie with plums, his midnight draughts of tea, his trick of touching the posts as he walked, his mysterious practice of treasuring up scraps of orange-peel, his morning slumbers, his midnight disputations, his contortions, his mutterings, his grantings, his puffings, his vigorous acts and ready eloquence, his sarcastic wit, his vehemence, his insolence, his fits of tenderness, his queer nicknames, his queer antipathies, all are familiar to us as the objects by which we have been surrounded from childhood. As we close it [Boswell's Johnson] the club-room rises before us, and the table on which stands the omelet for Nugent and the lemons for Johnson. There are assembled those heads which have been seen on the canvas of Reynolds. There are the spectacles of Burke and the tall thin form of Langton, the comely face of Beauclerk and the beaming smile of Garrick. Gibbon tapping his snuff-box and Sir Joshua with his trumpet in his ear. In the foreground is that strange figure which is as familiar to us as the figures of those among whom we have been brought up, the gigantic body, the huge massy face seamed with the scars of disease, the brown coat, the black worsted stockings, the grey wig with the scorched foretop, the dirty hands, the nails bitten and jagged to the quick. We see the eyes and mouth moving with convulsive twitches, we see the heavy form rolling: we hear it puffing, and then comes the 'Why, sir!' and the 'What then, sir?' and the 'No, sir!' and the 'You don't see your way through the question, sir!'"—Essays, 1854, i. 375–376, 400–401; and in Edin. Rev., Sept. 1831.

Johnson's "inextinguishable thirst for tea" forms so prominent an item of his personal character, that we must permit our reader to behold the sage at one tea party at least; and this shall be at "Cumbey's" table, where the great man spent many a happy hour of social chat:

"At the tea-table he made considerable demands upon his favourite beverage, and I remember when sir Joshua Reynolds at my house reminded him that he had drank eleven cups: he replied, 'sir, I did not count your glasses of wine: why should you number up my cups of tea?' And then, laughing in perfect good humour, he added: 'Sir, I should have released the lady from any further trouble if it had not been for your remark: but you have reminded me that I want one of the dozen, and I must request Mrs. Cumbey to hand to round up my number.' When he saw the readiness and complacency with which my wife obeyed his call, he turned a kind cheerful look upon her, and said, 'Madam, I must tell you for your comfort, you have escaped much better than a certain lady did a while ago upon whose patience I intruded greatly more than I have done on yours: but the Lady asked me for no other purpose than to make a Zany of me, and set me gabbling to a parcel of people I knew nothing of: so, madam, I had my revenge of her: for I swallowed five-and-twenty cups of her tea, and did not treat her with as many words.' I can only say my wife would have made tea for him as long as the New River could have supplied her with water."—Cumberland's Memoirs.

Poor Jonas Hanway found to his cost that Johnson was as ready to take up the cudgels on behalf of his favourite beverage as he was to drink it. As Mr. Macaulay also refers to that famous tabby, the cat "Hodge," this respectable quadruped must not be forgotten in our sketch of the lexicographer. And, indeed, we know not a passage we could better select as an instance of the manner in which Boswell drew down the most trifling remarks which fell from the lips of his illustrious friend, than the one in which "Hodge" forms the principal subject of discourse:

"Nor would it be just under this head," says Boswell, "to omit the fondness which he showed for animals which he had taken under his protection. I never shall forget the indulgence with which he treated Hodge, his cat, for whom he himself used to go out and buy oysters, lest the servants, having that trouble, should take a dislike to the poor creature. I am, unluckily, one of those who have an antipathy to a cat, so that I am uneasy when in the room with one: and I own I frequently suffered a good deal from the presence of this same Hodge. I recollect him one day scrambling up Dr Johnson's breast, apparently with much satisfaction, while my friend, smiling and half whistling, rubbed down his back, and pulled him by the tail: and when I observed he was a fine cat, rather hyperbolically, we fear, Jeremy Boswell, saying, 'Why, yes, sir, but I have had cats whom I liked better than this;' and then, as if perceiving Hodge to be out of countenance, adding, 'But he is a very fine cat,—a very fine cat indeed.'"

We give another amusing extract from Boswell's invaluable record, which is also quoted (not quite accurately) by Lord Brougham, with a very appropriate introduction:

"'They, however, who only saw this distinguished person once or twice in society were apt to form a very erroneous estimate of his temper, which was not at all morose or sullen but rather kindly and sociable. He loved relaxation, he enjoyed merriment; he even liked children; he played pleasantly when his animal spirits were high, and indeed somewhat lumbering, but always free from its perfect heartiness. Nothing can be more droll than the scene of this kind of which Mr. Boswell has preserved the most into the humour of which he seems to have been incapable of entering. When some one was mentioned as having left his estate to his sisters, Johnson objected, that had not been gained by trade. 'If it had,' said he, 'he might have left it to the dog Towser, and let him keep his own name.' He then went on laughing immoderately at the bathos as he called it, himself, 'I dare say,' said he, 'he thinks he has done a mighty thing: he won't wait till he gets home to his seat: he'll call up the landlord of the first inn on the road, and, after a suitable preface on mortality and the uncertainty of life, will tell him that he should not delay making his will; and here, sir, will he say, is my will which I have just made, with the assistance of one of the ablest lawyers in the kingdom, and he will read it to him.' Johnson laughing all the time.) 'He believes he has made this will, but he did not make it: you, Chambers, made it for him. I trust you have had more conscience than to make him say being of sound understanding.—ha! ha! ha! I hope he has left me a legacy.' I do have his will turned into verse, like a ballad." Mr Chambers," says Boswell, "didn't by any means relish this pleasantry upon a matter of which para magna fuit, and soon changed topics till he got rid of me. Johnson couldn't stop his merriment but continued it all the way till he got without the Temple Gate, he then burst into such a fit of laughter, that he appeared to be almost in convulsion, and in order to support himself laid hold of one of the posts on the side of the footpavement and sent forth peals so loud that, in the silence of the night, his voice seemed to resound from Temple Bar to Fleet Ditch."—Lives of Men of Letters, &c.

It is easy to see, as Lord Brougham remarks, that "Boswell was incapable of entering into the humour of this scene," and the moral reflections with which he closes the graphic sketch just recorded are as amusing as any of its details:

"This most ludicrous exhibition of the awful, melancholy, and venerable Johnson happened well to counteract the feelings of sadness which I used to experience when parting with him for a considerable time. I accompanied him to his door, where he gave me his blessing."

7. DR. JOHNSON'S MORAL AND RELIGIOUS CHARACTER.

The attention of this great man was at an early age turned to the consideration of those important truths which only the foolish and the thoughtless dare to slight, and which demand a large share of the mind and heart of every accountable and immortal being.

"When at Oxford," remarks Johnson, "I took up Law's Serious Call to a Holy Life, expecting to find it a dull book, (as such books generally are,) and thus to laugh at it. But I found Law quite an overmatch for me; and this was the first occasion of my thinking in earnest of religion, after I became capable of rational inquiry."

"From this time forward" continues his biographer, "religion was the predominant object of his thoughts, though, with the just sentiments of a sincere Christian, he lamented that his practice of its duties fell far short of what it ought to be."

With his religious peculiarities of doctrine or observance we have here, of course, no concern; and, did their consideration legitimately enter into our province, we trust that we should feel no temptation to indulge in those unbecoming sneers at alleged superstitions and rigid ceremonials which have disgraced critics who imagined they were ridiculing the subject of their shallow wit.

"Few men," says Lord Brougham, "have perhaps ever lived, in whose thoughts religion had a larger and more practical share. . . . He was friendly, and actively so, in the greatest degree; he was charitable even beyond what prudential considerations might justify; as firmly as he believed the gospel, so constantly did he practise its divine maxim, 'that it is more blessed to give than to receive.' . . . His habitual piety, his sense of his own imperfections, his generally blameless conduct in the various relations of life, have been already sufficiently described, and have been illustrated in the preceding narrative. He was a good man, as he was a great man; and he had so firm a regard for virtue that he wisely set much greater store by his worth than by his fame."—Lives of Men of Letters, &c.

"He loved the poor as I never yet saw any one else love them, with an earnest desire to make them happy. In pursuance of these principles, he nursed whole nests of people in his house, where the lame, the blind, the sick, and the sorrowful found a sure retreat."—Mrs. Thrale.

"Though consciousness of superiority might sometimes induce him to carry it high with man, (and even this was much abated in the latter part of life,) his devotion once shown to the whole world how humbly he walked at all times with his God."—Bishop Horne.

"If, then, it be asked, who first, in England, at this period, breasted the waves and stemmed the tide of infidelity,—who, enlisting wit and eloquence, together with argument and learning, on the side of revealed religion, first turned the literary current in its favour, and mainly prepared the reaction which succeeded,—that praise seems must justly to belong to Dr. Samuel Johnson. Religion was with him no mere lip-service nor cold formality: he was mindful of it in his social hours as much as in his graver lucubrations; and he brought to it, not merely erudition such as few indeed possessed, but the weight of the highest character, and the respect which even his enemies could not deny him. It may be said of him that, though not in orders, he did the Church of England better service than most of those who at that listless era ate her bread."—Lord Mahon: Hist of England, vol vi.

"His moral principles (if the language may be allowed) partook of the vigour of his understanding. He was conscientious, sincere, determined; and his pride was no more than a steady consciousness of superiority in the most valuable qualities of human nature. His friendships were not only firm, but generous and tender beneath a rugged exterior."—Sir James Mackintosh: Memoirs of his Life, 1835.

Sir Walter Scott remarks (in his Life of Johnson) that, when Johnson died, "virtue was deprived of a steady supporter," and that all the deductions which can be made for his prejudices of opinion and "violence and solecisms in manners" still leave "his talents, morals, and benevolence alike irreproachable."

Hazlitt, (in his Lecture on the Periodical Essayists,) after summing up Johnson's many good qualities, and referring to his prejudices, concludes with:

"His were not time-serving, heartless, hyperitical prejudices; but deep, inwoven, not to be rooted out but with life and hope; which he found from old habit necessary to his own peace of mind, and thought so to the peace of mankind. I do not hate, but love, him for them. They were between himself and his conscience, and should be left to that higher tribunal

"'Where they in trembling hope repose —
The bosom of his Father and his God.'

"In a word, he has left behind him few wiser or better men."

"That, with all his corpseness and irritability he was a man of sterling benevolence, has long been acknowledged. But how gentle and endearing his department could be, was not known till the Recollections of Madame D'Arblay were published."—T. B Macaulay: Essays, 1854, iii. 309.

"The comparison which we have instituted (between Milton and Johnson) has compelled us to notice Johnson's defects; but we trust we are not blind to his merits. His stately march, his pomp and power of language, his strength of thought his reverence for virtue and religion, his vigorous logic, his practical wisdom, his insight into the springs of human action, and the solemn pathos which occasionally pervades his descriptions of life and his references to his own history, command our willing admiration."—Wm. Ellery Channing: Remarks on the Character and Writings of John Milton.

The accounts which have been handed down to us of the last days of Johnson's life form one of the most interesting portions of English literary annals. It was on the 13th of December, 1784, that he was called to the rest which remaineth for those who cast themselves in humble confidence and undoubting trust upon the promises of that Redeemer who is the saint's dependence and the sinner's hope. We may not doubt that to him the exchange was a happy one. Error there had been in his life; for who is there among the children of men who hath not transgressed? But there had been hearty repentance, deep contrition, and fervent faith. He had proved his faith, too, by works of charity and deeds of love. He had been literally "eyes to the blind and feet to the lame." He had "strengthened him that was ready to perish, and he had upholden the fallen." His bread had been "dealt to the hungry, and the poor and cast-out he had brought to his home." The promise was fulfilled to him, as it hath ever been to those who rely upon its merciful assurance: "In the time of trouble," God remembered him, and freed him from that "bondage" which had so long held him in "fear of death:" he resigned his soul into the hands of his Creator with filial confidence and triumphant hope.

Johnson, Samuel B., Lieut. U. States Navy, d. 1820. Letters from Chili, 1816.

Johnston, Alexander Keith, Geographer at Edinburgh in Ordinary to her Majesty, and one of the most useful writers of the day, was b. Dec. 28, 1804, at Kirkhill, in the county of Midlothian, Scotland. 1. The National Atlas of General and Physical Geography, Edin., imp. fol., 1843, £8 8*s.*; Index, 1848, 7*s.* 6*d.*; 2d ed., 1849, half-bound, £4 4*s.*; 3d ed., 1855, £4 14*s.* 6*d.*, plates and notes, half-Russia, £8 8*s.*

"As accurate in their geographical details as they are beautiful in their execution."—SIR DAVID BREWSTER.

Also highly commended in Alison's Hist. of Europe, by Professors Traill and Jamieson, by Dr. Whewell, Wm. Gailbraith, and other eminent authorities.

2. The Physical Atlas of Natural Phenomena, 1847–49, imp. fol., 30 maps, £10 10*s.*; reduced ed., 1849, imp. 4to, 25 maps, £2 12*s.* 6*d.*; new ed., 1851–56, 12 Pts. fol., at 21*s.* each; £12 12*s.* complete.

"Your Atlas will do more benefit to the knowledge of our planet, in all its relations, than all the monstrous Encyclopædiæ Cyclopædiæ, and Libraries of Useful Knowledge could effect."—BARON LEOPOLD VON BUCH: Berlin, 3d July, 1848.

"I appreciate it highly, but not more than the admirable execution of so difficult and arduous a work merits."—MARY SOMERVILLE, Chester Square, 4th May, 1848.

We have many more testimonies before us to the excellence of this work, but either of the three preceding is amply sufficient to give a character to The Physical Atlas.

The new edition includes many new maps, and is enriched by the contributions of the greatest living scientific men, by whose researches the domain of Physical Geography has been extended, including Sir R. Murchison, Prof. E. Forbes, Col. Sabine, Sir David Brewster, &c. A new and complete Geographical Map of the United States and British North America, compiled from the latest data, by Prof. Rogers, (of Boston,) with descriptive Illustrated Notes, is for the first time given, with much other matter relating to this Continent.

No library of any kind, public or private, clerical or lay, school or family, should be without the invaluable publications of Mr. Alexander Keith Johnston.

Johnston, Andrew. Notitia Anglicana; shewing, I. The Atchievements of all the English Nobility, &c., complete, Lon., 1724, 2 vols. 8vo. See Moule's Bibl. Herald., 318.

Johnston, Arthur, M.D., 1587–1641, a native of Caskieben, near Aberdeen, took his medical degree at Padua in 1610, resided abroad about twenty-four years, of which twenty were spent in France, returned home about 1632, and died at Oxford. He was one of the best Latin scholars of his age, and pub. several works in that language. An edit. of his works was pub., Middleb., in 1641. Of those the best known is his Latin version of the Psalms of David.

"Psalmorum Davidis Paraphrasis Poetica, et Canticorum Evangelicorum. Aberd., 1637, 12mo. Often reprinted. There formerly existed an animated dispute (already referred to by us in our life of George Buchanan) relative to the respective merits of Johnston's and Buchanan's versions of the Psalms. We give the opinions of several eminent critics:

"A sort of critical controversy was carried on in the last century, as to the versions of the Psalms by Buchanan and Johnston. Though the national bigotry may seem equally secure by the superiority of either, it has, I believe, been usual in Scotland to maintain the elder poet against all the world. I am nevertheless inclined to think that Johnston's Psalms, all of which are in elegiac metre, do not fall far short of those of Buchanan either in elegance of style or in correctness of Latinity. In the 137th with which Buchanan has taken much pains, he may be allowed the preference, but not at a great interval, and he has attained his superiority by too much diffuseness. Hallam's Lit. Hist. of Europe, 4th ed., Lon., 1854, iii. 95.

"Arthur Johnston is not so verbose, and has, of course, more vigour; but the choice of a couplet, which keeps the reader always in mind of the puerile epistles of Ovid, was singularly injudicious."—DR. BEATTIE: Dissertations Moral and Critical.

We may remark, with reference to Beattie's mention of Ovid that Buchanan was formerly called the Scottish Virgil, and Johnston the Scottish Ovid.

"The Johnston has many beautiful and even powerful lines, such as can scarcely be matched by his more popular competitor, the style of Johnston possessing somewhat of Ovidian ease, accompanied with strength and simplicity, while the tragic pomp and worldly parade of Seneca and Pope has more affected by Buchanan."—PROF. WM. TENNANT: Edin. Lit. Journ., iii. 289.

Auditor Benson pub. an ed. of Johnston's Version in 1740, 4to, 8vo, and 12mo; a Prefatory Discourse to it, 1740, 8vo; a Continuation to the Discourse in 1741, and a Supplement to it in the same year. In the last he instituted a Comparison between Johnston and Buchanan, and gives the preference to the former; but this opinion was controverted by George Ruddiman in A Vindication of Buchanan's Paraphrase, pub. in 1745, 8vo. See BENSON, WILLIAM. Lord Woodhouselee prefers Buchanan's version taken as a whole, but considers that Johnston has surpassed the former in some of the Psalms, for instance, 24th, 30th, 74th, 81st, 82d, 102d, and, above all, the 137th. See Mr. Hallam's remark just quoted respecting the 137th Psalm, Johnston's version.

Morhof commends Johnston's version in high terms:

"Arturus Johnstonus, in Psalmorum Versione, quemadmodum et in operibus suis, utique purus et tersus est, ut ego quidem nihil in illo desiderare possim."

Dr. Harwood gives us little information when he informs us that Johnston was "one of the most eloquent Latin poets." Johnston pub. in 1637, Amst., 2 vols. 12mo, a work which has reflected great honour upon the Scottish nation, viz.: Deliciæ Poetarum Scotticorum hujus ævi illustrium, to which he was a large contributor:

We find about an equal produce of each century, the whole number being thirty-seven. Those of Johnston himself, and some elegies by Scot of Scotstarvet, are among the best. The Scots certainly wrote Latin with a good ear and considerable elegance of phrase."—HALLAM: ubi supra.

"Would have done honour to any country."—DR. SAMUEL JOHNSON: Jour. to the West. Islands.

Johnston also pub. Elegia in Obitum R. Jacobi, Lon., 1625, 4to; Epigrammata, Aberd., 1632, 8vo; Parerga, 1632, 8vo; trans. of Solomon's Song into Latin Elegiac Verse, Lon., 1633, 8vo; Musæ Aulicæ, 1635, 8vo. His translations into Latin of the Te Deum, Creed, Decalogue, &c. were subjoined to his Psalms. Mrs. J. edited for a number of years a monthly magazine established at Edinburgh about 1830, to which she was a contributor, and she edited and contributed to the Edinburgh Tales, a weekly issue of stories and novelettes. These papers were bound up and sold together (1845-46) in 3 vols. r. 8vo, and a new ed., 3 vols. r. 8vo, bound in 1 vol., was pub. in 1850. The contributors to this agreeable collection were Mrs. Johnstone, Mrs. Marsh, M. Fraser Tytler, Mrs. Gore, Mrs. Crowe, John Mills, Miss Mitford, Mary Howitt, William Howitt, Thomas Carlyle, Sir T. Dick Lauder, &c. Mrs. Johnstone's Tales are, The Experiences of Richard Taylor; Young Mrs. Roberts's Three Christmas Dinners; Mary Anne's Hair; Governor Fox; Little Fanny Bethel; Frankland the Barrister; Mrs. Mark Luke, or West-Country Exclusives; Violet Hamilton, or The Talented Family; Mothering Sunday, or Old Usages; Andrew Howie, the Hand-loom Weaver: The Ventilator of the Old House of Commons; Blanche Delamere, The Weird of the Winrams, a Tale of the Persecuting Times; Nigheau Ceard, or the Tinker's Daughter.

Mrs. Johnstone's stories have acquired great popularity.

"Her characters are strictly drawn from life; and every act in which they are involved is at once simply and naturally leading to impress a useful lesson of worldly wisdom and judicious conduct."—Lon. Lit. Gaz.

"Mrs. Johnstone's Tales are a happy mixture of the genial and the prudential."—Leigh Hunt.

A copy of his verses is pub. in the Odcombian Banquet, prefixed to Tom Coryate's Crudities, 1611, 4to. Jones was an excellent mathematician, and understood the Greek and Latin languages. He was for some time an intimate friend of Ben Jonson, but the latter became his enemy, and ridiculed him in the character of Lantern Leatherhead, a hobby-horse seller, in his comedy of Bartholomew Fair, and wrote three satires against him,—An Expostulation with Inigo Jones; an Epigram to a Friend; and another inscribed to Inigo, Marquis Would Be. Mr. Gifford charges Jones with having thrown the first stone. The consideration of Jones's architectural taste and his works in this department does not come within the plan of our Dictionary. This work is included in the following: 2. A New and Full Method of settling the Canonical Authority of the New Testament, Lon., 1726, 2 vols. 8vo; vol. iii., 1727, 8vo; Clarendon Press, Oxford, 1798, 3 vols. 8vo; 1827, 3 vols. 8vo.

"Both these works, particularly the last, are very valuable. Jones examines all the eminent testimonies respecting the canon of the New Testament. He collects all the apocryphal books which have been thought canonical, and gives an English translation of them, and refutes their pretensions in a very able manner. It is acknowledged by all parties to be a book of authority."—Orme's Bibl. Bib.

"Mr. Jones has given us a complete enumeration of all the apocryphal books of the New Testament, and made a critical inquiry into each of these books, with an English version of those of them which are now extant, and a particular proof that none of them were ever admitted into the Canon; and he hath distinctly produced and considered every testimony relating to them that is to be found in any Christian writer or writers of the first four centuries after Christ."—Lelland's View of Deistical Writers

Jones, William, 1680–1749, a very eminent mathematician, the friend of Sir Isaac Newton, Halley, and Mead, the tutor of Lords Hardwicke and Mansfield, and—still greater distinction—the father of Sir William Jones, was a native of the island of Anglesey, North Wales, and a mathematical teacher in London. 1. "This work is well worthy of attentive perusal."—Dr. F. Vorse.

Mr. Jones also contributed several mathemat. papers to Phil. Trans., pub. a number of Sir Isaac Newton's papers (that might otherwise have been lost) under the title of Analysis per Quantitatum Series Fluxiones, ac Differentias; cum Enumeratione Linearum Tertii Ordinis, 1711, 4to; and, at the time of his death, had ready for the press an Introduction to the Mathematics,—more comprehensive than his Synopsis,—which was confided to Lord Macclesfield for publication, and was neglected or lost. To this gentleman Mr. Jones devised his mathematical library, which was said to be the best in England. The work unfortunately lost or destroyed was intended to serve as an introduction to the mathematical and philosophical works of Sir Isaac Newton. Jones, William, of Nayland, 1726–1800, a native of Northamptonshire, was educated at the Charter House and at University College, Oxford; Vicar of Bethersden, Kent 1764, subsequently Rector of Pluckley, (which he exchanged for Paston;) Perpetual Curate of Nayland, and, in 1798, Rector of Hollingbourn. "Jones of Nayland," or "Trinity Jones," as he is sometimes called, was eminent for learning, piety, and zeal, and his knowledge of music, of which he was an excellent composer. As a theologian, he belonged to the Hutchinsonian school, and was the means of converting his friend Bishop Horne to the same creed. He has the credit of having originated The British Critic. A collective ed. of his Theological, Philosophical, and Miscellaneous Works, with his Life, by Wm. Stevens, was pub. in 1801, 12 vols. 8vo; Theological and Miscellaneous Works, repub., with Life, by Wm. Stevens, 1810, 6 vols. 8vo; a vol. of his Serms., Practical, Doctrinal, and Explanatory, was pub. in 1829, 8vo; two posthumous vols. (8vo) of Serms. on various subjects and occasions, now first pub. from the original MSS., edited by the Rev. Henry Walker, appeared in 1830. There have been recent eds. of several of his works. A Life of Jones of Nayland was pub. in 1849, 8p. 8vo. Among the best-known of his publications are: 1. Answer to Bishop Clayton's Essay on Spirit, 1753: see CLAYTON, ROBERT. 2. The Catholic Doctrine of the Trinity Proved, &c., 1756. He subsequently published several other treatises in defence of the doctrine of the Trinity.

We have spoken of Mr. Jones as a proficient in music: he pub. several treatises on this subject, and his own anthems, in score, &c., were greatly admired. See his Life by Wm. Stevens, first printed in the Anti Jacobin Review, and subsequently prefixed to his works. (supra.)

'Of this faithful servant of God I can speak both from personal knowledge and from his writings He was a man of quick penetration, of extensive learning and the soundest piety and he had, beyond any other man I ever knew the talent of writing upon the deepest subjects to the plainest understandings' —BISHOP HORSLEY Charges

Jones, Sir William, Sept 28, 1746- April 24, 1794, one of the most illustrious characters on the page of history, was a native of London, and a son of the eminent mathematician of the same name whose remarkable attainments in his favourite science we have already commemorated The learning of the family was not confined to either of these persons for the mother of Sir William was also noted for her erudition as well as for the virtues and accomplishments more usual to her sex That the successful pursuit of knowledge detracted nothing from the latter more valuable recommendations we have the unequivocal testimony of her husband

'She was virtuous without ostentation generous without extravagance frugal but not niggardly In a few instances only I have but not said in mine but not communicated to her my reasons of her many cautions in her blameless duty to her parents dutiful and to her husband ever faithful living and obedient'

Thus did this excellent woman—as connected in the lines just quoted and in her future happy experience—secure the reward promised by inspiration and recorded by the wisest of men "Her children rise up and call her blessed her husband also and he praiseth her It was to the sole charge of such a mother that William Jones was left by the decease of his father when he had scarcely reached his third year. He early manifested an ardent thirst for knowledge, which his maternal instructor well knew how to turn into profitable channels

The mother of Sir William Jones having first planted the education of her son within whose breast nature had implanted such seeds that might live only for that son He set apart all his actions to excite curiosity the results of his future life would, I hope and you will know she constantly regulated her behaviour And we have his own acknowledgment that the maxim which produced the habit of study he was initiated in by his future attainments' —Disraeli on the Literary Character 1 Ed 1840 441

When he had completed his seventh year he was placed at Harrow School, under the tuition of Dr Thackeray and this rigid preceptor, so economical of his commendations in the presence of his best pupils, did not hesitate to declare in private that William Jones

'Was a boy of such a noble mind that if he were left penniless and friendless on Salisbury Plain he would nevertheless find the road to fame and riches'

This eulogium was endorsed by Dr Sumner Thackeray's successor in 1761, so that when Jones was entered at University College Oxford in the spring of 1764 great expectations were reasonably entertained of his future distinction His fond mother would not consent to a separation, which would have been equally distressing to the object of her devoted attachment and to the great joy of William now in his eighteenth year she accompanied him to Oxford During his short residence at this famous seat of learning to which he brought far more learning than the majority of graduates carry from it he applied himself so assiduously to his studies, that his health would probably have been undermined for life had he not taken care to vary the seclusion of the closet with the athletic exercises in which he was a distinguished proficient In these amusements whilst yet at Harrow —which Jones also pressed into the service of classic learning by giving them a dramatic character – his principal associates were William Bennet afterward Bishop of Cloyne and Samuel Parr, the equally famous Birmingham Doctor The fame of young Jones's erudition having reached the ears of Earl Spencer, he sent him an invitation to become an inmate of his family in the capacity of tutor to Lord Althorpe, then seven years of age This proposal was accepted, and in the summer of 1765 he removed to Wimbledon Park, where he found himself most pleasantly situated in the midst of kind friends, and with ample opportunities of pursuing his favourite researches into Oriental literature A Fellowship at Oxford conferred upon him in the course of the following summer was an agreeable addition to the substantial comforts which now rewarded the studious zeal for which he had been distinguished from his earliest years In 1767, and again in 1770, he visited the Continent with the Spencer family, and whilst there eagerly availed himself of the literary opportunities which the absence of engrossing occupations now permitted him freely to enjoy. On his return to England he determined to embrace the profession of the law, and we find him on the 19th of September, 1770, duly recorded as a student of the Temple, where he soon evinced the same ardour for the acquisition of legal knowledge which had previously stimulated his philological and other less abstruse investigations He was admitted to the Bar in 1774, and appointed a Commissioner of Bankrupts in 1776. As early as 1768 he had gained great reputation by a translation, made at the request of the King of Denmark, of the Life of Nadir Shah, from an Eastern MS into the French language. This, together with Pieces relative to the French translation & was pub. in 1770, London, 2 vols. 4to Dissertation sur la Littérature Orientale was pub in 1771, 8vo, and in the same year appeared his Grammar of the Persian Language, 4to. The 7th ed was pub 1809, 4to, and in this ed (and in that pub in 1804, also edited by Dr Charles Wilkins) the orthography is adapted to the mode of spelling adopted by Dr Wilkins in his improved ed of Richardson's Persian Dictionary The Grammar will be found in vol v of the 8vo ed of Jones's Works, (13 vols,) but the last and best eds are those by Professor Samuel Lee of Cambridge 1823 4to and 1828 4to. In 1772, 8vo, (2d ed 1777 8vo) he gave to the world Poems, consisting chiefly of Translations from the Asiatic Languages, in 1774 8vo, Poeseos Asiaticæ &c, or, Commentaries (in Latin) on the Asiatic Poetry, and in 1778, 4to, a trans, with Notes of the Speeches of Isæus from the Greek

'It is alm at impossible to overlook the excellence of this finished performance' Dr ADAM CLARKE

The last work was followed by a Latin Ode to Liberty, to which succeeded—the proximity is somewhat amusing a matter of fact Inquiry into the Legal mode of suppressing Riots In the next year –1781 8vo—appeared his learned Essay on the Law of Bailments, which is now more valued as a literary than as a legal production, and which - perhaps even an American and a layman may be permitted to remark –is far inferior to Judge Story's great work on the same subject Jones's Essay, however is not to be denied considerable merit and Judge Story wrote under a better comprehension of the subject as a branch of the Common Law than was attainable in the days of his predecessor The 2d ed of Jones's Essay, edited by John Balmanno was pub in 1798 the 3d, by J Nicholl in 1823 the 4th by W Theobald, in 1894 The Amer eds are the reprint of the 2d English ed., Pittsborough 1813 12mo of the 3d English ed, with edit Notes and References by W Hilliard N York, 1828 8vo, and an ed pub in Phila 1870, 8vo See Lon Monthly Rev 236 lxvi 298, 2 Amer Jur, 78, vii 137 8 N Amer Rev, 46, (by Judge Joseph Story,) xxxvi 408 (by Dr Chas Follen) Brit Leg Bibl 176 7 Leg Obs 117, Marvin's Leg Bibl, 129 Story's Miscell Writings 68 73 204, 259 We know of nothing that we can quote in this connexion so much to our purpose so strictly pertinent, as the glowing tribute of Mr Justice Story to the merits of his illustrious brother of the law

'The doctrine of bailments (which has at the foundation of the law of shipments) was almost struck out at a single heat by Lord Holt [Note The case of Coggs v Bernard 2 Ld Raym R 909, who had the good sense to incorporate into the English code that system which the text and the commentaries of the civil law had already built upon the continent of Europe What remained to give perfect symmetry and connection to all the parts of that system and to refer it to its principles has been accomplished in our times by the incomparable Essay of Sir William Jones, a man of whom it is difficult to say which is most worthy of admiration the splendour of his genius the rareness and extent of his acquirements or the unspotted purity of his life. Had he never written any thing but his Essay on Bailments he would have left a name unrivalled in the common law for philosophical accuracy, elegant learning and finished analysis Even cold and cautious as is the habit if not the structure of a professional mind it is impossible to suppress enthusiasm when we contemplate such a man —North American Review vi 46–47 Nov 1817, and in Story's Miscell Writings 1852, 67 68

In March, 1783, Mr. Jones was appointed a judge of the Supreme Court of Judicature at Fort William, and received the honour of knighthood, and about the same time—a happiness which perhaps he valued more than either of the instances of good fortune just named—he was married to Anna Maria Shipley, eldest daughter of the Bishop of St. Asaph. His friends were rejoiced to see his eminent merit not unsuitably rewarded, and Lord Ashburton congratulated him on having at once secured "two of the first objects of human pursuit,—those of ambition and love."

In April, 1783, Sir William Jones and his lady embarked for India, and arrived at Calcutta in the month of September. That ardour in the pursuit of knowledge which was one of his most distinguishing characteristics was not allowed to slumber in his adopted home. He called around him those who were likely to sympathize with his interest in the cause of learning, and in nine months after his arrival he had the satisfaction of establishing a society, the "Transactions" of which have added greatly to our knowledge of Asiatic literature and science. Before his departure he had exhibited his knowledge of an abstruse department of Oriental literature by his translations into English of an Arabian poem on the Mohammedan Law of Succession to the Property of Intestates, (1782, 4to,) and of The Moallakat, or Seven Ancient Arabian Poems, (1783, 4to;) and he now determined to qualify himself, by acquiring a knowledge of the Sanskrit, for the preparation of a digest of Hindu and Mohammedan Laws, similar to that which Justinian gave to his Greek and Roman subjects.* The year 1789 was made memorable in Anglo-India literary annals by the publication of the first volume of the Asiatic Researches, and the completion of Sir William Jones's translation of Sacontala, or The Fatal Ring, ['Sakoontala; or, The Lost Ring?] an ancient Indian drama by Kálidása. This was not published, however, until the appearance of the collective ed. of Sir William's Works, in 1799, 6 vols. 4to. In 1794, 8vo, (2d ed., 1797, 8vo,) he published, as an introductory to his larger work, a translation of the Ordinances of Menu, "who is esteemed by the Hindus the first of created beings, and not only the oldest, but the holiest, of legislators." Sir William had intended in the following year (1795) to follow Lady Jones, who had been compelled by ill health to return to England in 1793; but it was not so written. On the evening of the 20th of April, or about that date, exposure to the night air during a protracted ramble brought on an inflammation of the liver, which resulted fatally within a week. Thus died, far away from home, and separated from her whose presence could best have soothed the pangs of a dying hour, this illustrious Englishman, ere he had numbered forty-eight years, during one fourth of which he had enjoyed a reputation for scholarship unequalled by any one living. But he was not alone. His executor, Chief Lord Teignmouth closed his eyes in death, and the God whom he had long served in fervency of faith and humility of spirit did not forget him in the time of weakness and the hour of trial.

"His bodily suffering," says his lordship, "from the complexion of his features and the cast of his attitude, must have been severe, and his mind must have derived consolation from those sources where he had been in the habit of seeking it, and where alone, in our last moments, it can ever be found."

His remains were interred in the burial ground at Calcutta, but a stately monument to his memory arrests the thoughtful attention of the visitor to St Paul's Cathedral.

The testimony of Sir William Jones to the authenticity and inspiration of the Holy Scriptures, and the weight and value of the sanctions and the consolations by which they appeal to the mind and heart of man, is of peculiar value. Profoundly versed in the languages in which they were originally written, and skilled to a surprising extent in the peculiarities of Oriental literature, starting to discover, when a young man, with a skeptical bias against the claims of revelation,—the conclusion to which his mind was brought by his researches is thus told in his own words:

"I have regularly and attentively read the Holy Scriptures, and am of opinion that this volume independent of its divine origin contains more sublimity and beauty, more pure morality, more important history, and finer strains of poetry and eloquence than can be collected from all other books, in whatever language or age they may have been composed."

This will remind the reader very forcibly of the remark of the illustrious friend of Sir William Jones's father, Sir Isaac Newton:

"I find more sure marks of the authenticity of the Bible than in any profane history whatever."

With us, we confess, such evidence is irresistible, and certain it is that if the testimony of these great men, or of either of them, had leaned to the other side of the question, we should never have heard the last of it from unbelievers.

A collective ed. of the works of this eminent scholar was pub. by his friend Lord Teignmouth, in 1799, in 6 vols. 4to; to these were added two supplementary volumes, in 1801, and a Life by Lord Teignmouth in 1804, in all, 9 vols. 4to. The whole were reprinted in 1807, in 13 vols. 8vo, with the exception of the supplementary volumes, the contents of which were not written by Sir William, but consist of a reprint of such parts of the vols. of the Asiatic Researches pub. under his presidency as had not been inserted among his works. The contents of the 13 vols. of which Sir William Jones's works consist are as follows: I., II. Memoirs of the Author, by Lord Teignmouth. III. Lord Teignmouth's Discourse at a Meeting of the Asiatic Society, [on the decease of Sir William Jones.] Anniversary Discourses (XL) before the Asiatic Society, 1784–94. On the Hindus, the Arabs, the Tartars, the Persians, the Chinese, the Borderers, &c. of Asia; the origin and families of nations, Asiatic history, and the philosophy of the Asiatics. A dissert. on the orthography of Asiatic words in Roman letters. On the gods of Greece, Italy, and India. IV. On the Chronology of the Hindus. Antiquity of the Indian Zodiack. On the Literature of the Hindus; from the Sanscrit. On the second classical book of the Chinese. The lunar year of the Hindus. The musical modes of the Hindus. On the mystical poetry of the Persians and Hindus. Gitagovinda; or, The Song of Jayadeva. Remarks on the Island of Hanuman. Conversation concerning the city of Gwender. On the course of the Nile. On the Indian game of Chess. Indian grant of land. Inscriptions. Cure of the Elephantiasis, &c. Tales and Fables by Nizami, [translated.] V. The design of a treatise on the plants of India. On the Spikenard of the Ancients, with a suppl. by W. Roxburgh, M.D. On the fruit of the Mellon. Catalogue of Indian Plants. A Grammar of the Persian Language. A catalogue of the most valuable books in the Persian Language. Index to the Persian Grammar. [A Vocabulary.] The Rose of the Persian Language. VI. Poeseos Asiaticæ Commentariorum, libri vi., cum appendice subjicitur Limonum, seu mixtorum encomium liber. VII. Charges to the Grand Jury at Calcutta, 1785–92. Institutes of Hindu Laws; or, The Ordinances of Menu, according to the Gloss. of Calluca. VIII. Institutes of Menu, continued. The Mohammedan Law of Succession to Property of Intestates. The Mohammedan Law of Inheritance. An Essay on the Law of Bailments. An Inquiry into the Legal Mode of Suppressing Riots. Speech on the Reformation of Parliament. The Principles of Government. Character of Lord Ashburton. IX. The speeches of Isæus, &c., [translated] with Notes and Commentary. Sacontala, or The Fatal Ring, an Indian drama, by Calidas, trans. from the original Sanscrit. X. The Moallakat, or, Seven Arabian Poems, which were suspended on the Temple at Mecca. Poems consisting chiefly of translations from the Asiatic languages, to which are added two essays: 1. On the Poetry of the Eastern Nations. 2. On the Arts commonly called Imitative. Lettre à M. du P[erron], dans laquelle est compris l'Examen de sa traduction des Lettres attribuées à Zoroastre. XI. Histoire de Nadir Chah. XII. L'histoire Chah, continued. Traité sur la Poesie Orientale. Introduc. to the Hist. of Nadir Shah. A description of Asia. 2. A short history of Persia. XIII. Heet'opades of Vishnusarman. The Enchanted Fruit; or, The Hindu Wife: an Indian Tale, [in verse.] Hymns, to Ganésa, &c. Parvati, &c. [in verse.] The first Nemean ode of Pindar. Extracts from the last book of the Ramayan. Extracts from the Vedas. Fragments. Catalogue of Oriental Mss. presented to the Royal Society.

The above list of writings, especially when considered in connexion with the multiplied personal engagements of the author, certainly exhibits evidence of no ordinary literary industry. The admiration of the reader will be increased by an inspection of a table of the languages with which the mind of Jones was more or less familiar. 1 Greek. 2 Latin. 3 Italian. 4 French. 5 Spanish. 6 Portuguese. 7 Persian. 8. Arabic. 9 Persian. 10. Turkish. 11 German. 12 English. 13 Sanskrit. 14. Hindostanee. 15 Bengalee. 16 Thibetan. 17 Pali. 18 Phaluvi. 19. Deri. 20. Chinese. 21. Russian. 22. Runic. 23. Syriac. 24 Ethiopic. 25 Coptic. 26. Dutch. 27 Swedish. 28 Welsh.

But Sir William's circle of attainments was by no means limited to a knowledge of languages, or to the various subjects upon which he employed his fertile pen, as indicated in the preceding catalogue of his productions in chemistry, mathematics, botany, and music, he was also deeply versed.

"His maxim," says Lord Teignmouth, "to have acted on this maxim—that whatever had been attainable by him, and he was never observed to overlook or to neglect any opportunity of adding to his acquirements or his knowledge. When in India, his studies began with the dawn, and in seasons of intermission from public and private duty, continued the night or the day: meditation retraced and confirmed what reading had collected or investigation discovered. By a regular, pleasant, use of time to particular occupations, he pursued various objects without confusion; and undertakings which depended on his individual perseverance, he was never deterred by difficulties from proceeding to a successful termination."—Life of Sir William Jones.

The great success with which he pursued his investigations into the literature of the East has alighted the admiration of all who have carried the spirit of inquiry into the same department:

"There are few authors to whom Oriental literature is under more deep obligations than to Sir William Jones: few who, like him, have not merely pointed out original and important sources of knowledge, but contributed in no inconsiderable degree to render them accessible. He was equally remarkable for his ardour and industry in philological pursuits, from a very early period of his life, until its premature and lamented close."—WILFORD: Origin of the English Language.

"William Jones has as yet had no rivals in the department which he selected; no one appears to have comprehended as he did the antiquities of Asia, and, above all, of India, with the acuteness of a philosopher, or to have seen the mode of reconciling every thing with the doctrine and history of the Scriptures"—FREDERICK VON SCHLEGEL: Lects. on the Hist. of Literature, Ancient and Modern; Lect. XIV.

And see Lect. V., where several of Sir William's translations are briefly noticed.

It is to be remembered that Schlegel penned the passages just quoted almost half a century since,—in 1812. Since that date Oriental literature has been cultivated with great success by Horace Hayman Wilson, Duncan Forbes, Monier Williams, J. Cockburn Thomson, Eastwick, Cowell, Cassal, Griffith, Barker, Keene, Johnson, Prinsep, and others. Among the modern specimens of translations from the Sanskrit, we may briefly notice that of the Bhagavad-Gitá, by J. C. Thomson, and the version of Sakoontala, or The Lost Ring, by M. Williams. The prose translations of these works—that of the former by Sir Charles Wilkins, of the latter by Sir William Jones—had made them known to Oriental scholars, but in the new versions recently published (1855) they are likely to have a much wider circulation. Sakoontala, or The Lost Ring, has elicited ardent eulogies from those who have taken the pains to acquaint themselves with its many beauties:

"The only specimen of their plays (natak) hitherto known to us is the delightful Sakoontala, which, notwithstanding the foreign colouring of the native climate, bears in its general structure such a striking resemblance to our own romantic drama, that we might be inclined to suspect we owe this resemblance to the predilection for Shakspeare entertained by the English translator, Sir William Jones, if his fidelity were not attested by other learned Orientalists."—AUGUSTUS WILLIAM VON SCHLEGEL: Lects. on Dramat. Art and Lit., 1809; Lect. II.

"Of all Indian poems, so far as we are as yet acquainted with them, that of Sakuntala (which has been translated with the most scrupulous exactness by Jones) is the work which gives the best idea of Indian poetry: it is a speaking example of that sort of beauty which is peculiar to the spirit of their fictions."—FREDERICK VON SCHLEGEL: Lects on the Hist. of Lit., 1812; Lect. V.

"Kálidása, the celebrated author of Sakoontala, is a masterly describer of the influence which nature exercises upon the minds of lovers. This great poet flourished at the Court of Vikramadítya, and was therefore contemporary with Virgil and Horace. To richness in the expression of feeling, and richness of creative fancy, have assigned to him his lofty place among the poets of all nations."—ALEXANDER VON HUMBOLDT.

But the glowing eulogy of Goethe must not be omitted:

"Wouldst thou the young year's blossoms and the fruits of its decline,
And all by which the soul is charm'd, enraptured, feasted, fed?
Would thou the earth and heaven itself in one sole name combine?
I name thee, O Sakoontala! and all at once is said."

Mr. Williams's translation is a free one, and in prose and verse, and a great improvement (according to Professor H. H. Wilson) upon the original translation by Sir William Jones. Whilst noticing modern translations of this school, we must not omit to make honourable mention of the following:

Khirad-Afroz, Anvar-i Suhaili, Gulistán, Bágh o Bahár, and Prem Ságar, by Prof. E. B. Eastwick; a selection from the Odes of Hafiz, and Vikramorvasi, by Prof. E. B. Cowell; the Anekártha of Hemachandra, by Charles Cassal; Baitál Pachisi, by Prof. W. B. Barker; Akhlák i Muhsini, by Prof. H. G. Keene; and Hitopadesa, by Prof. Johnson.

We observe that a prize of £300 has been recently offered, (March, 1857,) by a gentleman lately a member of the Bengal Civil Service, for the best treatise on the Vedanta. The treatise is to be written in German or French. The essays are to be lodged with the Royal Asiatic Society before April 1, 1860, and Professor Lassen, of Bonn, Dr. Windischmann, of Munich, and Professor Max Müller, of Oxford, are to be the examiners and adjudicators. The object is to elicit treatises which will be of assistance to Christian missionaries in the East. Some years ago, the same gentleman who offers this prize placed two sums of £500 at the disposal of the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge, for essays on Christianity and Hinduism.

But we have wandered from our theme, and the length of our article warns us to return. It may be readily supposed that the melancholy news of the early demise of the profound scholar, the upright judge, the conscientious Christian, and the affectionate friend, elicited many tears not only in the land where he had been known from boyhood, but also in his adopted home, among a simple and confiding people, who had suffered too much from the cruelty and extortion of many of his countrymen not to know how to value a man of such true nobility of character as Sir William Jones:

The pundits who were in the habit of attending him," remarks his friend and biographer, "when I saw them at a public durbar a few days after that melancholy event, could neither restrain their tears for his loss, nor find terms to express their admiration at the wonderful progress which he had made in the sciences which they professed."—LORD TEIGNMOUTH: Life of Sir William Jones.

The commendations of his countrymen have been lavished upon his character and attainments with all the profusion of eloquence animated by the warmth of affection, and yet have not exceeded the rigid estimate of impartial criticism.

"Know him, sir!" exclaimed the friend of his boyhood, Samuel Parr,—who, with all his pompous affectation, had a warm heart under his Roman mail,—"Know him, sir! who did not know him? Who did not bend in devout respect at the variety and depth of his learning the integrity of his principles, and the benevolence of his heart?"—Barker's Parriana, 322.

"Need I dwell a moment," says Dr. Dibdin, "on the recommendation of the works of Sir William Jones? A scholar, a critic, philosopher, lawyer, and poet,—where shall we find, in the works of the same man, greater demonstrations of pure and correct feeling, and cultivated and classical taste, than in the volumes here noticed and recommended? The piety of Sir William Jones was not inferior to his learning. A thoroughly good and great-minded man, his candour, humility, and diffidence were equal to his learning and multifarious attainments: and there is a vigour and raciness in his translations of Persian poetry which give them the enchanting air of original productions."—Lib Comp., ed 1825, 425.

"His writings everywhere breathe pure taste in morals as well as in literature; and it may be said with truth, that not a single sentiment has escaped him which does not indicate the real elegance and dignity which pervaded the most secret recesses of his mind. No author is better calculated to inspire those generous sentiments of liberty without which the most just principles are useless and lifeless."—SIR JAMES MACKINTOSH.

"The name of Sir William Jones is associated not only with the splendour of a great reputation, but with almost all the amiable and exemplary virtues; and the tender affections, which were a little chilled by the aspect of his vast literary attainments are won sweetly back and rest with delight upon the view which is here exhibited [in Lord Teignmouth's Life of Sir William Jones] of the purity the integrity, and the mildness of his private manners. . . . The most remarkable features of his character, indeed, seem to have resulted from the union of this gentleness and modesty of disposition with a very lofty conception of his own capability and destination."—LORD JEFFREY: Review of Lord Teignmouth's Life of Sir Wm. Jones, Edin. Rev., v. 328–330 Jan. 1805.

"In the course of a short life, Sir William Jones acquired a degree of knowledge which the ordinary faculties of men, if they were blessed with antediluvian longevity, could scarcely hope to surpass. His learning threw light on the laws of Greece and India, on the general literature of Asia, and on the history of the family of nations. He carried philosophy, eloquence, and philanthropy into the character of a lawyer and a judge. Amidst the driest toils of erudition, he retained a sensibility to the beauties of poetry, and a talent for transfusing them into his own language, which has seldom been united with the same degree of industry. When he went abroad, it was not to enrich himself with the spoils of avarice or ambition, but to search, amidst the ruins of Oriental literature, for treasures which he would not have exchanged

'For all Bocara's vaunted gold,
Or all the gems of Samarcand.'"

THOMAS CAMPBELL.

But Lord Jeffrey takes a view of this subject less discouraging to the young student, and tells us that,

"Great as Sir William Jones's attainments unquestionably were, they may be contemplated without despair by any one who is not frightened by his industry." Nor is his lordship disposed to concede to Sir William Jones's mind the attributes of original genius, philosophical acumen, or great strength of understanding. A similar opinion to this was expressed in very decided terms by one who, as we have just seen, entertained the highest admiration for Sir William's character,—Sir James Mackintosh. But the time for quotation is passed, and the curious reader can pursue this matter further by referring to the Edinburgh Review for January, 1805,—Lord Jeffrey's Review of Lord Teignmouth's Life of Sir William Jones; and to the North American Review for October, 1832,—Alexander H. Everett's Conversations with Sir James Mackintosh; Sir James Mackintosh's Life.

Jones, William Alfred, b. June 26, 1817, in the city of New York, is the son of the late Hon. David S. Jones, and a member of a family which has long been eminent in the annals of jurisprudence. The subject of our notice graduated at Columbia College, New York, and has been for some years officiating in the capacity of librarian to that institution. 1. The Analyst: a Collection of Miscellaneous Papers, New York, 1840, 18mo.

"This is a volume well worthy to be read. It gives proof of reflection, observation, and literary culture, and its style is always clear, sometimes forcible and terse, though not often eloquent. It abounds with shrewd remarks, happy criticisms and well drawn traits of character. But it is not executed with equal felicity throughout. The author imitates largely no one part of his book; he writes not from his own mind and after his own fashion but draws from others both matter and form."—*N. Amer. Mr. Jones has been long known as a critic, and his uncollected essays, contributed to the New York Church Record, Arcturus, Whig Review, Democratic Review, &c., would fill two vols. of the size of those which he has given to the world. Jonson, Ben, or, more correctly, Benjamin Johnson, 1573-1637, one of the most eminent of English dramatists, was a native of Westminster, and came into the world a month after the decease of his father,—who, after suffering imprisonment and confiscation of estates for his Protestant principles, became a preacher of those doctrines for which he had been in bonds. It has been generally asserted by the poet's biographers, from the time of Wood to Gifford, that his mother, after the decease of Jonson's father, married again, and that the object of her choice was a bricklayer, named Thomas Fowler. But the later researches of Mr. Peter Cunningham, endorsed by the learned imprimatur of Mr. J. Payne Collier, have brought us to the conclusion, to borrow the language of the last named gentleman, that, "if Ben Jonson's mother married a second time, we have yet to ascertain who was her second husband." That the future poet, however, did in his early youth give some reluctant attention to the useful art and mystery of brickmaking, we have his own avowal, conveyed in most disgustful terms. Previously to this unpromising entrance upon the responsibilities of active life, Jonson had pursued his studies at the school attached to St. Martin's-in-the-Fields, at Westminster School, (under the illustrious Camden,) and for a week or month, when in his sixteenth year, at St. John's College, Cambridge. After throwing aside his trowel, the mechanic turned soldier, and gained great distinction by his bravery while serving in a campaign in the Low Countries. There is a tradition that on his return to England, at the age of nineteen he returned to pursue his studies at Cambridge: but this conjecture appears to have no better foundation than the difficulty of otherwise accounting for that proficiency which he undoubtedly acquired in some of the Latin authors. It appears much more likely that he immediately became connected with the stage,—where he had but little success as an actor,—and not long after applied his literary talent to good purpose by assisting the dramatists of the day in the composition of their pieces. An unfortunate quarrel with a brother actor, named Gabriel Spencer, led to a duel which resulted in the death of the latter and the imprisonment, for about a twelvemonth, of the unhappy victor. Whilst in prison, he was visited by a Roman Catholic priest, who presented his doctrines in so favourable a light to the repentant duellist that he became a convert, and for twelve years retained the ecclesiastical connexion thus commenced. The young actor was no sooner discharged from custody than he sought to resign his freedom, and, perhaps without a due appreciation of the serious step he was taking, was not satisfied until able to write himself a married man. The hard-ships of poverty pressed sorely upon the young couple, whose sole fortune consisted in their abundant stock of mutual affection, (we speak of the honeymoon,) and the actor determined to become an author in the enlarged sense of that term, by trying his luck with a drama, calculated, he fondly hoped, to produce a harvest of profit and reputation. The precise time at which he composed the Comœdie of Every Man in his Hvmovr cannot now be ascertained, but it was originally acted by the Lord Chamberlain's servants, in the form in which we have it, in the year 1598, although it is asserted that it was acted eleven times between Nov. 25, 1596, and Nov. 10, 1597. He seems to have previously written for the stage conjointly with others, as we have intimated above, and without assistance, but we are obliged to commence the list of his ascertained productions with the play just named. This at once gained him fame and enemies; and now seem to have commenced the first literary quarrels the details of which form so large a portion of Jonson's personal history. Rejecting the stories of his misunderstandings with Shakespeare, which is asserted, but the assertion is not believed by many, was the means of introducing his first comedy on the stage, we still leave our poet's hands full of his opponents. Decker, Marston, Gill, and other active combatants. His successful piece was followed by Every Man out of his Hvmovr, A Comicall Satyre, first acted in 1599; Cynthias Revels, or The Fountayne of Selfe-Love, first acted in 1599; The Poetaster, or His Arraignement, a Comicall Satyre, first acted in 1601; Sejanvs his Fall, a Tragedie, first acted in 1603; Volpone, or The Fovxe, a Comedie, first acted in 1605; Epicœne, or The Silent Woman, Comœd. first acted in 1609; The Alchemist, a Comœdie, first acted in 1610; Catiline his Conspiracy, a Tragœdie, first acted in 1611. So far we have quoted the titles of our author's principal productions (not pausing to notice his minor pieces) from his own collective edit. of his Works, pub. in 1616, now lying before us. To these succeed, in this ancient folio, Epigrammes, 1 Booke; The Forrest, (Songs, Odes, &c.;) Part of the King's Entertainment in passing to his Coronation; A Panegyre on The Happie Entrance of James our Soveraigne to His first high Session of Parliament in this his Kingdom the 19 of March, 1609; Masques at Court.

It will be seen that to this folio, pub. in 1616, the author did not include the Comedies of Bartholomew Fair, produced in 1614, and the Devil's an Ass, produced in 1616. It is probable, also, that a number of minor pieces written before this time (many are without any date) were reserved by the author for a future volume of his collected Works:

"He seems," says Gifford, "to have meditated a complete edition of all his works; but he apparently grew weary towards the end clusion of the volume, and never (unless peculiarly called upon) had recourse to the press afterwards. The second folio is a wretched continuation of the first, printed from the MSS. surreptitiously obtained during his life, or ignorantly hurried through the press after his death. It bears a variety of dates, from 1631 to 1641 inclusive. It is probable that he looked forward to a period of retirement and ease; but the loss of his MSS. by fire, and the fatal illness which almost immediately afterwards seized him, rendered all such views abortive. It is remarkable that he calls his Epigrams 'Book the First:' he had, therefore, others in his hand: but they have perished."—Memoir of Ben Jonson.

It was three years after Jonson's death before any of his later productions were published. Two small edits. of his minor pieces were issued in 1640, and in the next year appeared a reprint of his own folio of 1616, and a second vol. of the same size, containing his dramatic pieces from 1612, several masques, and all that could be discovered of his occasional poetry. Another collective ed. of his Works was pub. in 1692, fol.; another (a reprint of the last) in 1715, 6 vols. 8vo; and a more complete one, edited by the Rev. Peter Whalley, in 1756, 7 vols. 8vo. A second issue of Whalley's edit. was commenced in 1792, but the publication extended no further than two numbers. In 1811, 4 vols. r. 8vo, appeared—what has been denominated "an execrable edition".—The Dramatic Works of Ben Jonson and Beaumont and Fletcher. Whalley's edit. was most carelessly compiled, the text that of the impression of 1715, rarely collated with early edits., and often erroneous, and the notes of little if of any value. In 1816 Mr. William Gifford pub. the first good edit. of Jonson's Works. This was accompanied with Notes, Critical and Explanatory, and a Biographical Memoir. It was pub. in 9 vols. 8vo, £6 6s.; r. 8vo, £9. We shall have something more to say of this edit. presently. In 1838, Mr. Moxon, of London, pub. an edit. of Jonson's Works in r. 8vo, edited by Barry Cornwall, another edit. in 1841, r. 8vo, and again in 1853, r. 8vo. Mr. Moxon put forth a collective edit., prefaced in both cases with Gifford's Memoir of the Author. To this Memoir, and especially to the biography of Jonson in Austin and Ralph's Lives of the Poets Laureate, Lon., 1853, 8vo, we refer the reader for further information respecting "Rare Ben Jonson." The other accounts of the poet, referred to below, may be examined for the gratification of curiosity, and for the amusing gossip of the times to which they relate; but, according to Mr. Gifford, few men have suffered more from literary injustice than the author of Catiline and Sejanus. Mr. Gifford himself, however, is perhaps too warm a partisan to be considered an infallible authority. In Moxon's reprints of Jonson's Works, above referred to, (1841, r. 8vo; 1853, r. 8vo,) the arrangement is as follows: after the eleven dramatic pieces already noticed by us, come The Staple of News, a Play; The New Inn, or The Light Heart, a comedy; The Magnetic Lady, or Humours Reconciled, a play; A Tale of a Tub, a play; (this is the last work of the author that was submitted to the stage:) The Sad Shepherd, or A Tale of Robin Hood, a play; The Case is Altered, a play; Entertainments; Masques; Epigrams; The Forest: Underwoods; Loges Convivales; Translations from the Latin Poets; Timber, or Discoveries made upon Men and Matter; The English Grammar; Jonsonus Virbius, or The Memory of Ben Jonson; Glossary; Index. Between Gifford's Memoir of the Author and the first of his pieces are inserted Ancient Commendatory Verses on Ben Jonson. We have already referred (see CHAPMAN, GEORGE) to Jonson's share in the composition of Eastward-Ho, and he was a partner in other literary enterprises,—according to the custom of the poets of the age.

It was in 1616 that Jonson received an acceptable mark of the royal favour, in the shape of an annual pension from King James of one hundred marks a year for life, (from henceforth we designate him by the title of Poet-Laureate,) which was increased by King Charles, in 1630, to one hundred pounds sterling, and "a terse of Canary Wine." This augmentation of his income (for which, indeed, he had petitioned the king in a rhyming epistle) did not come any too soon, for the extravagance of the past between 1616 and 1625, his multiplied libations at the Mermaid, and profuse hospitality at his own table, had reduced him to great straits. It is melancholy to be obliged to add that he died in poverty: it is more pleasing to our feelings to be able to record the fact that he departed in penitence and faith,—regretting the occasional irreverence of his pen, and, we trust, deploring the frequent abuse of powers which were given for nobler ends. He was called to the "dread account" before the "Judge of all the earth" on the 6th day of August, 1637. Did our space permit, we might, ere we proceeded to a brief consideration of Jonson's characteristics as a writer, linger a short time over some of the prominent incidents of the poet's life, especially upon his memorable visit to Drummond of Hawthornden in 1619, his wit (or wet) combats with Shakspeare, and his less amiable contests with the second-rate wits of this belligerent age. But we have already referred the reader to abundant sources of information, and with them we shall leave him, after he has borne us company for a few moments longer, whilst we quote some opinions from a few eminent authorities respecting the characteristics of this once-favourite author.

"Ben Jonson, a younger contemporary and rival of Shakspeare, who laboured in the sweat of his brow, but with no great success, to expel the romantic drama from the English stage and to form it on the model of the ancients, gave it as his opinion that Shakspeare did not blot enough, and that, as he did not possess much school-learning, he owed more to nature than to art. . . . Jonson was a critical poet in the good and bad sense of the word. He endeavoured to form an exact estimate of what he had on every occasion to perform; hence he succeeded best in that species of the drama which makes the principal demand on the understanding and with little call on the imagination and feeling,—the comedy of character. He introduced nothing into his works which critical dissection should not be able to extract again, as his confidence in it was such, that he conceived it exhausted every thing which pleases and charms us in poetry. He was not aware that in the chemical retort of the critic what is most valuable, the volatile living spirit of a poem, evaporates. His pieces are in general deficient in soul, in that nameless something which never ceases to attract and enchant us even because it is indefinable. In the lyrical pieces, his Masques, we feel the want of a certain mental music of imagery and intonation, which the most accurate observation of difficult measures cannot give. He is every where deficient in those excellences which, unsought, flow from the poet's pen, and which no artist who purposely hunts for them can ever hope to find. We must not quarrel with him, however, for entertaining a high opinion of his own works, since whatever merits they have he owed, like acquired moral properties, altogether to himself. The production of them was attended with labour, and unfortunately it is also a labour to read them. They resemble solid and regular edifices, before which, however, the clumsy scaffolding still remains, to interrupt and prevent us from viewing the architecture with ease and receiving from it a harmonious impression. We have of Jonson two tragical attempts and a number of comedies and masques.

"He could have risen to the dignity of the tragic tone, but for the pathetic he had not the smallest turn. As he incessantly preaches up the imitation of the ancients, (and he had, we cannot deny, a learned acquaintance with their works,) it is astonishing to observe how much his two tragedies differ, both in substance and form, from the Greek tragedy. . . After these attempts, Jonson took leave of the Tragic Muse, and in reality his talents were far better suited to Comedy, and that, too, merely the Comedy of Character. His characterization, however, is more marked with serious satire than playful ridicule: the latter Roman satirists, rather than the comic authors, were his models. In so far as plot is concerned, the greatest praise is merited by Volpone, The Alchemist, and Epicene, or the Silent Woman. . . . Of all Jonson's pieces there is hardly one which, as it stands, would please on the stage in the present day, even as most of them failed to please in his own time: extracts from them, however, could hardly fail to be successful. In general much might be borrowed from him, and much might be learned both from his merits and defects. His characters are, for the most part, solidly and judiciously drawn: what he most fails in, is the art of setting them off by the contrast of situations. The peculiarity of Jonson's Masques most deserving of remark seems to me to be the anti-masques, as they are called, which the poet himself sometimes attaches to his own invention, and generally allows to precede the serious act. As the ideal flatteries, for whose sake the gods have been brought down from Olympus, are but too apt to fall into mawkishness, this antidote on such occasions is certainly deserving of commendation."—AUGUSTUS WILLIAM VON SCHLEGEL: Lects. on Dramat. Art and Lit.; Black's Trans., Lon., 1846, 347, 481-492, 463, 465, 466.

Dr. Johnson is thought to have very happily hit off the character of his dramatic namesake in the following graphic lines in his celebrated prologue:

> "Then Jonson came, instructed from the school,
> To please by method, and invent by rule.
> His studious patience and laborious art
> With regular approach assay'd the heart:
> Cold approbation gave the ling'ring bays,
> For they who durst not censure scarce could praise.
> A mortal born, he met the general doom,
> But left, like Egypt's kings, a lasting tomb."

Mr. Campbell will be found to dissent widely from the authorities just quoted, and from several others whose opinions we shall have occasion to cite:

"The art of Jonson was not confined to the cold observations of the unities of place and time, but appears in the whole adaptation of his incidents and characters to the support of each other. Beneath his learning and art he moves with an activity which may be compared to the strength of a man who can leap and bound under the heaviest armour."—Specimens of English Poetry.

"There are people who cannot take offence: and I cannot much relish Ben Jonson, though I have taken some pains to do it, and went to the task with every sort of good will. I do not deny his power or his merit: far from it: but it is to me a repulsive and unamiable kind. He was a great man in himself, but one cannot readily sympathize with him. His works, as the characteristic productions of an individual mind, or as records of the manners of a particular age, cannot be valued too highly; but they have little charm for the more general reader."—Hazlitt's Lects. on the English Comic Writers; Lect. II.

"Ben Jonson's serious productions are, to my opinion, superior to his comic ones. What he does, is the result of strong sense and painful industry; but sense and industry agree better with the grave and severe than with the light and gay productions of the muse."—Hazlitt's Lects. on the Dramat. Lit. of the Age of Elizabeth; Lect. IV.

"If asked to give our opinion of Ben Jonson's powers in general, we should say that he was a poet of a high order, as far as learning, fancy, and an absolute rage of ambition could conspire to make him one; but that he never touched at the highest except by violent efforts and during the greatest felicity of his sense of success. The material so predominated in him over the spiritual—the sensual over the sentimental,—that he was more social than loving and far more wilful and fanciful than imaginative."—Leigh Hunt's Men and Women and Books: Suckling and Ben Jonson

"I do not think that his poetical merits are yet properly appreciated. I cannot consent that the palm of humour alone shall be given to him, while in wit, feeling, pathos, and poetical diction he is to be sunk fathoms below Fletcher and Massinger. In the last particular I think that he excels them both and, indeed all his contemporaries, excepting Shakspeare."—Henry Nelt's Lects. on English Poetry; Lect. III.

Mr. Disraeli also comes to the rescue of the abused poet:

"Some modern critics, whose delicacy of taste in its natural feebleness could not strain itself to the vigour of Jonson, have strangely failed to penetrate into the depths of that mighty mind: and some modern poets have delivered their sad evidence that for them the Coryphæus of our elder dramatists has become mainly gible."—Anecdotes of Literature: The Humours of Jonson

"With such extraordinary requisites for the stage, joined to a strain of poetry always manly, frequently lofty and sometimes almost sublime, it may at first appear strange that his dramas are not more in vogue; but a little attention to his peculiar modes and habits of thinking will, perhaps, enable us in some measure to account for it. The grace and urbanity which mark his lighter pieces he laid aside whenever he approached the stage, and put on the censor with the sock. This system (whether wise or unwise) naturally led to circumstances which affect his popularity as a writer: he was obliged as one of his critics justly observes 'to hunt down his own characters,' and, to continue the metaphor, he was frequently carried too far in the chase."—Inglis' Memoir of Ben Jonson.

The whole of this criticism should be consulted by the reader.

"The fault in Jonson's two tragedies is that there is not enough to interest flesh and blood in them and to stir up the sympathies, the hopes and fears, of humanity. There is a cold historic sublimity, which, however it may command the homage of the intelle- the- are true to history,—true, there and they move on in the plot with stern an- rigid the harsh outline lacks those lighter pencilings by which poetry surpasses history of without who though bold and masterly, will not chain the live spectator to the painter's canvas. His best comedies are generally known that a lengthy critique on them would be tedio- those that are less read are scarcely deser- mention and the interest that must attach itself to any production from the pen of such a man. Every Man in his Humour, The Alchymist, Volpone, or the Fox, and The Silent Woman are the best of the numerous comedies he has left us. . . . Jonson's masques are beautiful. Though with occasional extravagant fancies and strained conceits, they are full of learning and taste. They were many of them written for great festive occasions. . . . Some beautiful songs are introduced into them. . . . As a translator he must not be forgotten. He has left a version of Horace's Ars Poetica, and a few of the odes. The former is marvellously literal, and not so tame as therefore be supposed. In the latter there is little to praise; but he has excelled these regular translations in passages of their epodes and elsewhere, which he has borrowed from ancient authe- literally rendered. . . . Jonson is no exception to the rule that clear and strong utterance is one of the chief characteristics of genius, and that great poets have been good prose-writers. The fragment entitled Timber, or Discoveries, sufficiently shows, without appealing to his letters, dedications, and prefaces, the English literature lost much by the destruction of his prose manuscripts. The small remnant that is left is full of erudite criticism and reflection, and great severity of judgment. There are notes on books and on life, arranged in a strange and arbitrary manner, written in a concise and pregnant style, and, though they do not contain so much sententious wisdom, remind us forcibly of the Essays of Bacon. . . . We have spoken of Jonson as the author of tragedy, of comedy, of masque, as a translator and prose-writer. But it was as a lyric poet also that we claim for him a homage and admiration which has hitherto been sparingly given if yielded at all."—Southey and Ralph's Lives of the Poets-Laureate, Lon., 1853. 90, 91–92, 95, 96, 98–99, 101.

An accomplished female writer, whose graceful criticisms we have frequently had occasion to quote in the course of this volume, speaks with enthusiasm of the lyrics just referred to:

"We of this age, a little too careless perhaps of learned labour, would give a whole wilderness of Catilines and Pretenders, and even of Alchemists and Volpones, for another score of the exquisite lyrics which are scattered carelessly through the plays and masques which—strange contrast with the rugged verse in which they are imbedded—seem to have burst into being at a stroke, just as the evening primrose flings open her fair petals at the close of the day. Lovelier songs were never written than these wild and quaint fancies."—Mary Russell Mitford's Recollec. of a Literary &c.

We shall hardly feel that we can willingly pass on to the next article in our Dictionary without quoting some of the notices respecting our author from some of the great men of his own day and the age which followed. The best-known of such passages is that which bears the imprimatur of Jonson's host of April, 1619,—Drummond of Hawthornden. None of the abundant censures lavished upon his hero more excites the indignation of Gifford than these jottings of the unfortunate Boswell of the age of James I. But, if Drummond was not the victim of the furor biographicus, surely Gifford was, and therefore (to borrow from Dr. Johnson's letter to James Macpherson) regard is to be paid less to what he says than what he is able to prove. The easy and confident arrogance with which Gifford contradicts the assertions of Jonson's contemporaries, of those who lived in the succeeding few years, and of later authorities, who perhaps had as good information, and certainly far better manners, than the editor of the Quarterly, is not a little amusing. We are not insensible to the value of his critical labours, and have no disposition to endorse Mr. Leigh Hunt's assertion that "Sympathy with Jonson's rudeness and his love of the exact, a good verbal fact, and a worship of authority, were the only qualifications for a critical sense of him possessed by the petulant and presumptuous Gifford."—Men, Women, and Books: Suckling and Ben Jonson.

But surely Gifford might have displayed all that he had to offer in its best light, without so ruthlessly assailing his predecessors. In the words of a late critic,

"The author's one plan for refuting Jonson in the good opinion of his countrymen is to fall foul of every critic, old or recent, that had ever said a word against him."—North British Review, Feb. 18..

We may remark, in passing, that a notice of Barry Cornwall's edit. of Jonson's Works, already referred to by us, will be found in Leigh Hunt's Men, Women, and Books. Whilst Jonson was Drummond's guest, it was the custom of the latter to register the sayings of the distinguished sojourner, and at the conclusion of those piquant entries he takes the opportunity to record his own opinion of the characteristics of his visitor, who, he tells us, was "A great lover and praiser of himself, a contemner and scorner of others; given rather to loss a friend than a jest; jealous of every word and action of those about him especially after drink, which is one of the elements in which he lived; a dissembler of ill parts which reign in him; a bragger of some good that he wanted; thinketh nothing well done but what either he himself or some of his friends hath said or done. He is passionately kind and angry, careless either to gain or keep, vindictive, but, if he be well answered at himself, interprets best sayings and deeds often to the worst. He was for any religion as being versed in both; oppressed with that wherewith hath ever mastered his reason, a general disease in many poets: his inventions are smooth and easy, but above all he excelleth in a translation."—Drummond's Works, 1711, fol., pp. 220.

It is only proper to remark that Drummond's notes are not correctly printed in this folio ed. of 1711. A correct text with illustrative notes, was for the first time printed, in 1842, by the Shakspeare Society, under the editorial supervision of Mr David Laing, by whom the MS. was discovered. We have already noticed (see Drummond, Wm.) Mr. Peter Cunningham's ed. of Drummond's Works, 1833, 12mo. A new ed. by the same editor was pub. in 1852, Edin., 8vo.

The last charge which Drummond prefers in the above sentimental is unfortunately too fully endorsed by contemporary evidence to admit of any debate. To say nothing of Owen Feltham's admirable parody upon Jonson's "Come, leave the loathed stage,"—a burst of indignation at the failure of his play of The New Inn,—we have a letter from Howell upon this theme, a few lines of which we shall quote:

"Sir,—I was invited yesternight to a solemn supper by B. J. [Ben Jonson, where you would deeply remembered. There was good company, excellent choice wines, and jovial welcome: one thing interposed, which (as it) spoiled the relish of the rest—that B. began to engross all the discourse, to vapour extremely by himself, and, by whittling others, to magnify his own muse. T. Ca. [Tom Carew] buzzed me in the ear that though Ben had barrelled up a great deal of knowledge yet it seems he had not read the ethics, which, among other precepts of morality, forbad self-commendation, declaring it to be an ill favoured solecism in good manners. . . . But, for my part, I am content to dispense with the Roman infirmity of Ben, now that time hath snowed upon his pericranium. You know Ovid and (very) Horace were subject to this humour,—the first bursting out into 'Jamque opus exegi, quod nec Jovis ira nec ignis,' &c.

'The other into—

'Exegi monumentum ære perennius,' &c.

As also Cicero, while he forced himself into this hexameter:

'O fortunatam natam me consule Romam.'

"There is an inner room that exceeds B.—which is, that if one be allowed to love the natural issue of his body, why not that of his brain, which is of a spiritual and more noble extraction?"—To Mr Thomas Hawk, Kt., Westminster, 5th April, 1636.

See our Life of James Howell, No. 3, in this Dictionary. It was well that Howell bore this infliction so well, for Gerard Langbaine tells us that "Ben Jonson's great weakness was that he could not bear censure,"

"He was a Man of a very free Temper, and withal blunt, and somewhat haughty to those who were, either Rivals in Fame, or Enemies to his Writings, (witness his Poetaster, wherein he falls upon Decker, and his answer to Dr. Gill, who writ against his Magnetic Lady,) otherwise of a good Sociable Humour, when amongst his Sons and Friends in the Apollo: from whose Laws the reader may possibly better judge of his Temper; a copy of which I have transcribed for the Learn'd Readers perusal."—Account of the Eng. Dramat. Poets, Oxf., 1691.

They were a merry set of fellows that met at The Apollo and at The Mermaid,—too merry by half, or rather too free with the stimulants that provoked their merriment. When Frank Beaumont was paying a visit in the country, he felt the loss of these highly-seasoned festivities, and thus pours out his troubles into the bosom of his correspondent, Rare Ben:

> "Methinks the little wit I had is lost
> Since I saw you; for wit is like a rest
> Held up at Tennis, which men do the best
> With the best gamesters. What things have we seen > Done at the Mermaid! heard words that have been
> So nimble, and so full of subtle flame,
> As if that every one, from whom they came,
> Had meant to put his whole wit in a jest,
> And had resolved to live a fool the rest
> Of his dull life."

It had been better for the whole company had they loved their own firesides more and the Mermaids and Apollos less. Of this gay circle Master Shakspeare was a prominent member, and good old Thomas Fuller tells us

"Many were the wit-combats [" wet combats," the last edition of Fuller, from which we quote, prints it; betwixt him and Ben Jonson; which two I behold like a Spanish great galleon and an English man-of-war: Master Jonson (like the former) was built for higher in learning; solid, but slow in his performances. Shakspeare, with the English man-of-war, lesser in bulk but lighter in sailing, could turn with all tides, tack about, and take advantage of all winds, by the quickness of his wit and invention."—Worthies of England, Lon., 1840, iii. 284–285.

As Fuller was only eight years of age when Shakspeare died, he of course does not intend us to understand the word "beheld" in its literal sense. Jonson was not always disposed to engage in these wit-combats, for, as Fuller himself tells us in another place,

"He would sit silent in a learned company, and suck in (besides wine) their several humours into his observation. What was ore in others, he was able to refine to himself.

"He was paramount in the dramatic part of poetry, and taught the stage an exact conformity to the laws of comedy. [illegible] motions were above the vulgar, (which are only tickled with downright obscenity,) and took not so well at the first stroke as at the rebound, when beheld the second time: yea, they will endure reading and that due commendation so long as either ingenuity or learning are fashionable in our nation. If his later be not so spiritful and vigorous as his first pieces, all that are old will, and all that desire to be old should, excuse him therein."—Ibid., ii. 425.

"The most learned, judicious, and correct, generally so accounted, of our English Comedians, and the more admired for being so, for that neither the height of natural parts, for he was no Shakspeare, nor the cost of extraordinary education, for he is reported but a bricklayer's son, but his own proper industry and addiction to books advanced him to this perfection."—Phillips's Theat. Poet Anglic.; Brydges's ed., 1800, 241–250, q. v.

The comparison between Shakspeare and Jonson—whom before Gifford's Memoir it was the fashion to represent as the enemy and vilifier of his illustrious brother—is a favourite topic with many critics. It is not omitted in Dryden's admirable summary of the literary characteristics of Ben Jonson:

"As for Jonson, to whose character I am now arrived, if we look upon him while he was himself, (for his last plays were but his dotages,) I think him the most learned and judicious writer which any theatre ever had. He was a most severe judge of himself as well as others. One cannot say he wanted wit, but rather that he was frugal of it. In his works you find little to retrench or alter. Wit and language, and humour also in some measure, we had before him, but something of art was wanting to the drama before he came. He managed his strength to more advantage than any who preceded him. You seldom find him making love in any of his scenes, or endeavouring to move the passions; his genius was too sullen and saturnine to do it gracefully, especially when he knew he came after those who had performed both to such a height. Humour was his proper sphere, and in that he delighted most to present mechanical people. He was deeply conversant in the ancients, both Greek and Latin, and he borrowed boldly from them. There is scarce a poet or historian among the Roman authors of those times whom he has not translated in 'Sejanus' or 'Catiline.' But he has done his robberies so openly that one may see he fears not to be taxed by any law. He invades authors like a monarch, and what would be theft in other poets is only victory in him. With the spoils of those writers, he so represents Old Rome to us, in its rites, ceremonies, and customs, that if one of their poets had written either of his tragedies, we had seen less of it than in him. If there was any fault in his language, it was that he weaved it too closely and laboriously, in his comedies especially: perhaps, too, he did a little too much Romanise our language, leaving the words he translated almost as much Latin as he found them, wherein, though he learnedly followed their language, he did not enough comply with the idioms of ours. If I would compare him with Shakspeare, I must acknowledge him the more correct poet, but Shakspeare the greater wit. Shakspeare was the Homer or father of dramatic poets, Jonson was the Virgil, the pattern of elaborate writing. I admire him, but I love Shakspeare."

Sir Walter Scott thus contrasts Jonson and Shakspeare:

"The one is like an ancient statue, the beauty of which, springing from the exactness of the proportion, does not always strike at first sight, but rises upon us as we bestow time in considering it; the other is the representation of a monster, which is at first only surprising, and ludicrous and disgusting ever after."—Life of Dryden.

The following lines from an old play, entitled Retvrne from Pernassvs, pub. in 1606, (ten years before Shakspeare's death,) are too pertinent to our subject to be omitted:

> "Who loues Adonis loue, or Lucre's rape,
> His sweeter verse containes hart robbing life,
> Could but a grauer subiect him content,
> Without loue's foolish lazy languishment."—Act I. Scene II.

"Few of the vniuersity pen plaies well: they smell too much of that writer Ouid, and that writer Metamorphosis, and talke too much of Proserpina & Iuppiter. Why heres our fellow Shakespeare puts them all downe, I and Ben Ionson too. O that Ben Ionson is a pestilent fellow, he brought vp Horace giuing the Poets a pill, but our fellow Shakespeare hath giuen him a purge that made him beray his credit."—Act IV. Scene III.

We would fain quote from Hazlitt's lively comparison between these two great poets, but this our space forbids. The reader must himself turn to Lecture II. of the series on the English Comic Writers. The commendations of the Great Earl of Clarendon and Lord Falkland (both personal friends of Jonson) are too weighty, and the poetical portrait of Churchill too admirably drawn, to be omitted in a biographical article of Rare Ben Jonson.

"His name," says Lord Clarendon, "can never be forgotten, having by his very good learning, and the severity of his nature and manners, very much reformed the stage, and indeed the English poetry itself. His natural advantages were judgment to order and govern fancy, rather than excess of fancy; his productions being slow and upon deliberation, yet then abounding with great wit and fancy, and will live accordingly; and surely as he did exceedingly excel the English language in eloquence, propriety, and masculine expression, so he was the best judge of, and fitted to prescribe rules to, poetry and poets, of any man who had lived with, or before him, or since: if Mr. Cowley had not made a flight beyond all men, with that modesty yet as to ascribe much of this to the example of learning of Ben Jonson. His conversation was very good, and with the men of most note."

The assertion last quoted is supported by the testimony of the other nobleman whom we have mentioned as one of the poet's admiring friends:

> "To him how duly flock'd, what reverence gave,
> All that had wit, or would be thought to have;
> How the wise too did with mere wits agree,
> As Pembroke, Portland, and grave D'Aubigny;
> Nor thought the rigid'st senator a shame
> To add his praise to so deserv'd a fame!"

Churchill's lifelike portrait must conclude an article which has grown on our hands considerably beyond our intended limits:

> "Next Jonson sat, in ancient learning train'd:
> His rigid judgment Fancy's flight restrain'd,
> Correctly prun'd each wild luxuriant thought,
> Mark'd out her course, nor spar'd a glorious fault.
> The book of man he read with nicest art,
> And ransack'd all the secrets of the heart;
> Excited Penetration's utmost force,
> And trac'd each passion to its proper source;
> Then, strongly mark'd, in liveliest colours drew,
> And brought each fable forth to public view.
> The coxcomb felt a lash in every word,
> And fools, hung out, their brother fools deterr'd;
> His comic humour kept the world in awe,
> And laughter frighten'd folly more than law."

5. Remarks on Ecclesiastical History, 1751–73, 3 vols 8vo. New ed., together with a new ed. of No. 4, and a Life of the Author, by Dr. Heathcote, 1805, 5 vols. 8vo. New ed. of Remarks on Ecclesiastical History, edited by the Rev. W. Trollope, 1846, 2 vols. 8vo. It has been remarked that this work might properly be entitled Curiosities of Ecclesiastical History. The Remarks

"do not embrace a regular series of facts, but point out the prominent parts and circumstances of the general subject with interesting remarks."—Dr. E. Williams's Class. Pr., 1845, 425, 7.

"Once, and rarely more than once, he rose to eloquence; and that was in the preface to his Remarks &c. which Dr. Dr. Gosset told me he regularly read through every year with undiminished delight. . . . The Remarks are excellent,—pithy learned, candid, and acute; presenting us with the marrow of his predecessors."—Dibdin's Lib. Comp.

"Dr. Jortin has, in a little compass taken notice of so many facts, and animadverted on them with so much judgment that this work will ever be held in deserved repute."—Bishop Watson.

"Critical, but wanting in more important things."—Beckwith's C. S.

"He is judicious, temperate, candid and benevolent."—Hales.

"The character of his work is too well established to require recommendation."—Bogue.

"His remarks are highly interesting and impartial. They are full of manly sense, ingenious strictures, and profound erudition. It is a work highly beneficial to mankind, as it represents in its proper light that superstition which disgraced human nature, and gives a right sense of the advantages derived from religious reformation."—Dr. V. Knox.

"The Remarks of Jortin are a vulgar caricature, distinguished not more for their heartlessness and the absence of every noble feeling, than for the author's shameful ignorance of the subject which he presumed to handle."—Dr. Dowling.

In Rose's Lecture on the Study of Church History will be found some severe strictures on Jortin's Remarks.

6. Six Dissertations upon different subjects, 1755, 8vo; 1809, 8vo.

"Dr. Jortin, in one of his Six Dissertations, (half a dozen too many,) thus paints the portrait of Achilles." &c.—Professor John Wilson; Essays Critical and Imaginative, Edin. and Lon., 1857, iv. 108, q. v.

"Equally remarkable for taste, learning, originality, and ingenuity."—Dr. V. Knox.

Bishop Warburton thought otherwise, as the Sixth Dissertation proved so conclusively the great antiquity of the doctrine of a future state as to overthrow the prelate's leading and most absurd position in The Divine Legation of Moses. Hurd, therefore, ever ready for such service, took up the cudgels for his friend, and Warburton, in his letters to Hurd, attacks Jortin with his usual arrogance, petulance, and indecency. See Disraeli's Quarrels of Authors, in Miscell. of Lit., ed. Lon., 1840, 166; Lord Jeffrey's Contrib. to Edin. Rev., 1853, 889–890; Blackwood's Mag., xxix. 901; and authorities cited below.

7. The Life of Erasmus, with Remarks on his Works, 1758–60, 2 vols. 4to; 1806, 3 vols. 8vo. Vol. iii. is composed entirely of Original Documents, and extracts from the writings of Erasmus and other writers. An abridgment of Jortin's Life of Erasmus was pub. by A. Laycay, Lon., 1805, 8vo.

"Having been long an object of universal admiration, it is a matter of surprise that his life has never been written with accuracy and judgment. This task was reserved for Dr. Jortin; and the avidity with which it is read by the learned is a proof of the merit of the execution."—Dr. V. Knox.

"The ease, simplicity, and vigour of this engaging writer, (I speak of the biographer,) who negligently scatters learning and vivacity on every subject which he treats, are here exercised on a most congenial topic."—Green's Diary of a Lover of Lit., Ipswich, 1810, 4to, p. 13.

"In his Life of Erasmus, Jortin showed himself to be little more than a translator of Le Clerc. A subject of the greatest is made by him one of comparatively small interest. The work is little better than a dry journal of facts, stitched together. . . . It is unfaithfully and carelessly compiled, but wholly illuminated by a stroke of genius. The life of one of the greatest wits of his age has produced only sombre biographies. . . . These volumes . . . are almost less unworthy of their author."—Dibdin's Lib. Comp.

"Dr. Johnson thought Jortin's Life of Erasmus a dull book."—

ry scholar well	in the writings of Erasmus and his ignorance must be	covered that Jortin has neither collected sufficient	materials for his work; and perhaps to that	weary of his task before he had made a full	rials which he had collected."—S. T.
Coleridge.

9. Tracts, Philological, Critical, and Miscellaneous, 1790, 2 vols. 8vo. Pub. by the author's son.

"The miscellaneous tracts in these volumes are highly commended by Bishop Newton, T. Warton, and Dr. Knox."

It is to be regretted that, in these days of republication of standard authors, a collective ed. of the works of Dr. Jortin should still be a desideratum. Mr. Strong, of Exeter, some years since, offered a set of all of this divine's works, together with Disney's Life of Jortin,—in all 22 vols. 8vo,—for £7 7s. For further information respecting this excellent writer, see Dr. John Disney's Life of Jortin, 1792, 8vo; Nichols's Lit. Anec.; Chalmers's Biog. Dict.; Blackwood's Mag., xxix. 901–902; xxx. 851; xxxii. 873.

"The works of Bishop Warburton and Dr. Jortin will speak for them better than any private commendation: they were two very extraordinary men, they were both men of great parts and abilities, both men of uncommon learning and erudition, both able critics, both copious writers. . . . Every thing that proceeds from Jortin is of value, whether in poetry, criticism, or divinity."—Bishop Newton.

"A poet, a divine, a philosopher, and a man, Dr. Jortin served the cause of religion, learning, and morality."—Dr. V. Knox.

"Dr. Jortin was an accomplished classical scholar: his style often bears a resemblance to that of Xenophon, in ease, &c."—Williams.

"As to Jortin, whether I look back to his verse, to his prose, to his critical or to his theological works, there are few authors to whom I am so much indebted for rational entertainment or for solid instruction."—Dr. Parr; Parr's Tracts by a Warburtonian, q. v.

Joscelin de Brakelonde, almoner of the Abbey of St. Edmund's, 1211, wrote a history of the affairs of his abbey, 1173–1201, and a book on the pretended miracles of St. Robert. An edit. of Joscelin's Chronicle, from the Latin original, was pub. by the Camden Society, edited by J. Gage Rokewode, 1840, 4to, and a trans. of this ed., with Notes, Introduction, &c., by T. E. Tomlins, 1843, 8vo. See these works and Wright's Biog. Brit. Lit., Anglo-Norman Period, 1846.

"The author [Joscelin] appears to have been well acquainted with the common Latin authors, but his latinity is singularly unclassical and inelegant."—WRIGHT, ubi supra.

Joseph of Exeter, or Josephus Iscanus, an Anglo-Latin poet temp. Richard I., a native of Devonshire, wrote two epic poems in Latin heroics: the first, in six books, is on the Trojan war; the other is entitled Antiochēis, the War of Antioch. Of the last, the only fragment which remains (22 lines) will be found in Warton's Hist. of English Poetry, and in Wright's Biog. Brit. Lit., Anglo-Norman Period. Leland also attributes to Joseph epigrams and love-verses, (Nugæ Amatoriæ,) and it is asserted that he wrote in Latin verse De Institutione Cyri, but no such productions are known to be extant. For an account of the edits. of the poem De Bello Trojano, see Wright, ubi supra. See also Leland; Bale; Pits; Prince's Worthies of Devon; Warton's Hist. of Eng. Poet.; The Sketch-Book, (art. on The Mutability of Literature,) by Washington Irving.

"A miracle of this age in classical composition was Joseph of Exeter, commonly called Josephus Iscanus . . . He appears to have possessed no common command of poetical phraseology, and wanted nothing but a knowledge of the Virgilian chastity. His style is a mixture of Ovid, Statius, and Claudian, who seem then to have been the popular patterns."—Warton's Hist. of Eng. Poet., ed. Lon., 1840, vol. i. cxxvii., cxxviii.

Warton remarks that Italy had at that time produced no poet comparable to Josephus Iscanus. It has been stated that this poet died about 1224, but of the true date nothing is certainly known.

"The relation is curious and faithful: when the author makes his own remarks, they are in the oddest uncouth expressions imaginable."—JOHN LOCKE: The Philosopher.

"Contains a variety of curious facts regarding medicine and surgery: the author, however, appears a little credulous."—Watt's Bibl. Brit.

A little credulous certainly, for he tells us, "Some frogs, when they sit upon their breech, are a foot high:" "barley frequently degenerates into oats." Judson, Adoniram, D.D., b. Aug. 9, 1788, at Malden, Mass., d. 1850, at sea, on his voyage to Rangoon, a Baptist divine, the founder of the Burmah Mission in 1813, wrote a work on Christian Baptism, (recently repub.,) &c., and trans. the Bible, a Dictionary, and a number of tracts, into the Burmese tongue. His 1st ed. of the Bible in Burmese was pub. in 1835, 3 vols. 8vo; 2d ed., revised and much improved, 1840, thick 4to. His Burmese and English Dictionary was compiled from his papers by E. A. Judson, Mrs. Anne Hasseltine, 1789-1826, a native of Bradford, Mass., was married to the preceding in 1812, and proved a faithful ally in his efforts for the conversion of the heathen, and a skilful diplomatist in affairs of state. She wrote some tracts for her Burmese pupils, and an excellent Account of the American Baptist Mission to the Burman Empire, Lon., 1825, 8vo. See Memoir of Anne H. Judson, by Rev. Jas. D. Judson, Mrs. Emily, formerly Miss Chubbuck, 1817-1854, better known by her nom de plume of Fanny Forester, a native of Eaton, New York, became, in June, 1846, the third wife of the Rev. Dr. Adoniram Judson, the founder of the Burmah Mission, and immediately afterwards accompanied her husband to India. After Dr. Judson's decease in 1850, Mrs. Judson returned to the United States, in impaired health, and, after a lingering illness, died at the residence of her brother, at Hamilton, New York. Among her first contributions to literature were several small vols. of a religious character, issued by the Baptist Publication Society, and poetical essays in the Knickerbocker Magazine. In 1841, she sent a paper to The New York Weekly Mirror, under the signature of Fanny Forester, which was so fortunate as to elicit the enthusiastic commendation of Mr. N. P. Willis, editor of that periodical. Encouraged by this, she contributed to his columns a number of essays, sketches, and poems, of which a collection appeared in 2 vols. in 1846, under the title of Alderbrook. These met with such favour, that the sale in America from the date of publication to the year 1853 amounted to 33,000 vols. Mrs. Judson subsequently gave to the world A Memoir of Mrs. Sara B. Judson, N. York, 1849, 18mo; The Olio, or Domestic Portfolio; The Kathayan Slave, and other Papers connected with Missionary Life, Bost., 1853, 16mo; My Two Sisters, a Sketch from Memory, [prose,] 1854, 18mo, &c. The following vols. were pub. before Mrs Judson's marriage. 1. Charles Linn; or, How to Observe, 18mo. 2. The Great Secret; or, How to be Happy, 18mo. 3. Allen Lucas; or, The Self-Made Man, 18mo. The three are also all pub. in 1 vol., under the title of How to be Great, Good, and Happy. 4. Trippings in Author-Land, 12mo.

"She has a mind of the purest quality,—simple truthful, imaginative, fertile, and genial. We have never expressed one half of the admiration we have felt for that rare, most rare, quality of her mind,—its unerring, unbroken weaving of truth and nature through all its fancies. Eminently fruitful as it is, a sunbeam is not more direct, pure, and honest, than that same feminine and delicate fancy. Her books are delightful to read in this reason. The heart secures the attention given to them with constant recognition."—N. P. Willis.

The Memoir of Mrs. Sarah B. Judson was repub. in London in 1848; 2d ed., 1849, 12mo; 3d ed., 1856, 12mo. In an Introductory Notice by Edward Bean Underhill, it is commended as a beautiful biographical production, from which eulogy the critic of the London Athenæum thus expresses his dissent:

"We cannot share Mr. Underhill's admiration for Miss Emily C. Chubbuck's style as an authoress. The tomb of the second Mrs. Judson is by her hung with artificial flowers of the most tawdry and ostentatious quality. Without simplicity there is neither ——— nor profit in narratives of this kind: and 'Fanny Forester' ——— to have avoided simplicity with unusual fervour, and entirely to have succeeded in her escape from it."—Nov. 11, 1848, p. 1122.

See Lives of the Three Mrs. Judson, by Mrs. A. M. Willson, N. York, 1851, '55, 12mo; Griswold's Female Poets of America; N. Amer. Rev., lxviii. 484; The Female Poets of America, by Mrs. E. F. Judson, Mrs. Sarah B., 1803-1845, a native of Alstead, New Hampshire, was married in 1825 to the Rev. George Boardman, who died in 1831, and in 1835 she became the second wife of the Rev. Adoniram Judson. The parting poem, addressed to the latter when she was about sailing for America, has been much admired. See the three preceding articles.

Junius. In our article upon Sir Philip Francis, in this volume, we remarked that we should best discharge our duty with respect to the vexed question of the authorship of The Letters of Junius by indicating the sources of information upon this famous controversy. The catalogue raisonné subjoined, of works upon this warmly-agitated theme, we have prepared with much care from a number of authorities not accessible to all inquirers.

We must premise—for we write not for the learned only—that the compositions distinctively styled The Letters of Junius were originally pub. in The Public Advertiser of London, by Henry Sampson Woodfall, the first letter bearing date January 21, 1769, and the last January 21, 1772. These celebrated epistles are addressed to The Printer of The Public Advertiser, Sir William Draper, The Duke of Grafton, The Duke of Bedford, Lord North, Lord Mansfield, The King of England, Rev. Mr. Horne, and others. Junius was a Grenville or Rockingham Whig, and attacked with great severity the ministerial measures of the Duke of Grafton and his colleagues.

"The classic purity of their language, the exquisite force and perspicuity of their argument, the keen severity of their reproach, the extensive information they evince their fearless and decisive tone, and, above all, their stern and steady attachment to the purest principles of the Constitution, acquired for them, with an almost electric speed, a popularity which no series of letters have since possessed, nor, perhaps, ever will; and, what is of far greater consequence, diffused among the body a clearer knowledge of their constitutional rights than they had ever before attained, and animated them with a more determined zeal to maintain them inviolate. Enveloped in the cloud of a fictitious name, the writer of these philippics, unseen himself, beheld with secret satisfaction the vast influence of his labours, and enjoyed, though, as we shall afterwards observe, not always without apprehension, the universal heart that was made to detect him in his disguise. He beheld the people extolling him, the court execrating him, and ministers, and more than ministers, trembling beneath the lash of his invisible hand."—John Mason Good, M.D. Essay on Junius and his Writings.

Several unauthorized collections of the letters of Junius were put forth by various publishers before 1772, in which year Mr. Henry Sampson Woodfall, the original printer of the epistles, issued an edition in 2 vols. sm. 8vo, with the sanction of Junius, and an eloquent Dedication, Preface, and Notes, by the same mysterious individual. In 1812, 3 vols. 8vo, Mr. George Woodfall pub. a new edition of these celebrated letters. In this edit. we have not only the Letters of Junius referred to above, but also his private letters to H. S. Woodfall, his correspondence with John Wilkes, and other communications to Woodfall's Public Advertiser, under various signatures, ascribed to him with more or less probability of truth. The period during which the Letters of Junius and those thus ascribed to him were written extends from the letter of Poplicola, 28th April, 1767, to the letter of Nemesis, May 12, 1772. Woodfall's edition contains—

I. The Letters of Junius distinctively so called, and acknowledged by him, dated January 21, 1769, to January 21, 1772.

Of the 69 Letters in this series, 59 were written by Junius; of which 44 bear the signature of Junius, and 15 the signature of Philo-Junius. Of the 44 letters signed Junius, the titles are as follows:

To the Printer of the Public Advertiser	10
" Sir Wm. Draper	5
" the Duke of Grafton	11
" Edward Weston	1
" Dr. Wm. Blackstone	1
On Walpole's Case	1
To the Duke of Bedford	1
On the Rescue of General Gansel	1
On Modestus	1
Address to the King	1
Retrospect of Parliamentary Session	1
To Lord North	1
" Chief-Justice Mansfield	3
On the Falkland Islands	1
On Privileges of Parliament	1
On Parliamentary Resolutions	1
To the Rev. Mr. Horne	1
" " Livery of London	1
" Lord Camden	1
	44

Of the 15 Letters signed Philo-Junius (really written by Junius) the titles are as follows:

On Walpole's Case	1
the Spanish Convention	1
To the Printer of the Public Advertiser
" Modestus
" Zeno
" an Advocate in the Cause of the People

Of the other 10 Letters the titles are:

Sir Wm. Draper to the Printer of the Public Advertiser	1
Sir Wm. Draper to Junius	4
The Rev. Mr. Horne to Junius	3
A Friend of Junius	1
On behalf of Junius: anonymous	1
	10

II. Junius's Private Letters to Mr. H. S. Woodfall, dated April 20, 1769, to January 19, 1774. In this series there are 64 Letters and Notes, 62 of which are addressed by Junius to Woodfall, 1 to David Garrick, and the other (the conclusion of the series) is a letter of Woodfall's to Junius, dated March 7, 1773.

III. Junius's Confidential Correspondence with John Wilkes, containing 18 Letters, 10 of which are written by Junius, and 8 by Wilkes. These letters are dated 21st August, 1771, to January 15, 1772.

IV. The Miscellaneous Letters ascribed to Junius, under various signatures, consisting of 113 letters and papers, 28th April, 1769, to May 12, 1772, which occupy part of the second and the whole of the third volumes. The authenticity of many of these productions is very questionable. Prefixed to this edition, which is illustrated by notes, is an admirable Preliminary Essay on Junius and his Writings, by the editor, John Mason Good, M.D.

A new edition of the issue of 1812 was published in 1850, 2 vols. 12mo, which contains much additional matter of great value. This forms part of Bohn's Standard Library, and is edited by John Wade, who favours us with New Evidence as to the Authorship, and a portion of an Analysis, by the late Sir N. Harris Nicolas. Mr. Wade makes out a strong case for the claim of Sir Philip Francis. There are, however, some grave objections to this hypothesis, which we hardly expect to see surmounted. See, in addition to authorities to be cited hereafter, London Athenæum, 1850, 125, 154, 863, 939, 969, 993, 1021, 1071.

The curious reader will be glad to see a list of the most prominent names of those to whom the Letters of Junius have been at one time or another ascribed:

1. Adair, Mr. Serjeant.	23. Jones, Sir Wm.
2. Barré, Col. Isaac.	24. Kent, John.
3. Boyd, Hugh Macauley.	25. Lee, General Charles.
4. Burke, Edmund.	26. Lloyd, Charles.
5. Butler, Bishop.	27. Lyttelton, Lord Thos.
6. Camden, Lord.	28. Macleary, Loughlin.
7. Chatham, Lord.	29. Portland, Duke of.
8. Chesterfield, Lord.	30. Pownall, Gov. Thomas.
9. De Lolme, M.	31. Rich, Sir Robert.
10. Dunning, Lord Ashburton.	32. Roberts, John.
11. Dyer, Samuel.	33. Rosenhagen, Rev. Philip.
12. Flood, Henry.	34. Sackville, Lord George, afterwards Lord Germain.
13. Francis, Philip, D.D.
14. Francis, Sir Philip.	35. Shelburne, Earl.
15. Gibbon, Edward.	36. Temple, Earl.
16. Glover, Richard.	37. Tooke, Jno. Horne.
17. Grattan, Henry.	38. Walpole, Horace.
18. Grentrakes, Wm.	39. Wilkes, John.
19. Grenville, Geo.	40. Wedderburn, Alex. (Lord Loughborough.)
20. Grenville, James.
21. Hamilton, Wm. Gerard.	41. Willaot, James, D.D.
22. Hollis, James.	42. Wray, Daniel.

Of the 42 names above enumerated, the claims of 13—viz.: Boyd, Burke, Bishop Butler, Dunning, Dyer, Flood, General Lee, Lloyd, Roberts, Rosenhagen, and Lord George Sackville—are carefully examined by Dr. Good in his celebrated preliminary essay, and all are decidedly rejected. As the question now stands, the sifting of zealous and learned controversy has spared but three names out of all those for whom the authorship has from time to time been claimed,—viz.:

I. Sir Philip Francis.

II. Lord George Sackville, afterwards Lord Germain.

III. Colonel Isaac Barré.

The claims of the last two candidates in the field, Sir Robert Rich and Gov. Thos. Pownall, have been recently brought prominently forward,—those of the former by Mr. Ayerst, in 1853, and of the latter by Mr. Frederick Griffin, of Montreal, in 1854. Mr. Dowe, indeed, has within the last few months announced new discoveries in favour of the claims of the Earl of Chatham, but in the present stage of the question—for Mr. Dowe's book is hardly yet fairly before the world—we do not feel justified in adding his lordship's name to the three who still exhibit indications of vitality after enduring the targets of a keen literary battle of fourscore years' duration.

We shall presently give a list of publications connected with the Junius controversy, but it may be proper here briefly to refer to some prominent pleas for the respective claims of the three above named.

I. Sir Philip Francis. 1. The Identity of Junius with a distinguished Living Character, by Mr. John Taylor, Lon., 1816, 8vo. 2. A Supplement to Junius Identified, consisting of Fac-Similes of Handwriting, and other Illustrations, 1817, 8vo. 3. Review of the two preceding, by Lord Brougham, Edin. Rev., November, 1817, xxix. 94. His lordship thus sums up the evidence presented by Mr. Taylor:

"That it proves Sir Philip to be Junius, we will not affirm; but this we can safely assert, that it accumulates such a mass of circumstantial evidence as renders it extremely difficult to believe he is not; and that, if so many coincidences shall be found to have misled us in this case, our faith in all conclusions drawn from proofs of a similar kind may henceforth be shaken."

4. Letter of Sir James Mackintosh to John Murray, Sr., Nov. 28, 1824. See No. 10. 5. Argument by Thomas De Quincey, in his Literary Reminiscences, vol. ii., being vol. vii. (chap. xxii.) of Ticknor, Reed & Field's edit. of De Quincey's works. 6. Argument by T. B. Macaulay, in his review of Gleig's Life of Warren Hastings, Edin. Rev., Oct. 1841, lxxiv. 160. 7. Letter of Lady Francis (widow of Sir Philip) to Lord Campbell, inserted in his lordship's Lives of the Lord-Chancellors, vol. vi. p. 344. 8. The History and Discovery of Junius, by John Wade, in his edit. of the Letters of Junius, 1850, 2 vols. 8vo, before referred to. 9. Some New Facts and a suggested New Theory as to the Authorship of the Letters of Junius, by Sir Fortunatus Dwarris, Knt., Lon., 1850. Privately printed. See London Athenæum, 1850, 939, 969, 993. 10. Argument by Lord Mahon, in his History of England from the Peace of Utrecht, vol. v. 326–340, 1851. Nos. 4 and 11 are printed in this work. 11. Letter of T. B. Macaulay to John

Murray, Jr., dated at the Albany, Jan. 3, 1852. See No. 10. This refers to the famous article in the London Quar. Rev. for Dec. 1851, xc. 91, advocating the claims of Lord Thomas Lyttelton to the authorship of Junius, and rejecting altogether the pleas urged in favour of Sir Philip Francis. But Lord Lyttleton's claims have been since set aside, (see London, Athenæum,) and the question remains status quo ante bellum. In the letter above referred to, Mr. Macaulay remarks:

"But, in truth, the strongest arguments against the Reviewers' theory are the arguments which, in my opinion, prove that Francis was the author of the letters."

Mr. Macaulay despatches the claims of five celebrated names—claims which have been urged with much pertinacity and some of them at great length—in as many lines:

"Lord Lyttleton's claims to the authorship of Junius are better than those of Burke or Burre, and quite as good as those of Lord George Sackville or Single-speech Hamilton. But the case against Francis, or, if you please, in favour of Francis, rests on grounds of a very different kind, and on coincidences such as would be sufficient to convict a murderer."

II. Lord George Sackville, afterwards Lord Germain. We need here only refer to George Coventry's Critical Inquiry regarding the real author of the Letters of Junius, proving them to have been written by Lord Viscount Sackville, 1825, 8vo. This theory was sustained in a work pub. in Boston, U. States, in 1828, entitled Junius Unmasked, or Lord George Sackville proved to be Junius, and in a review of this, vol. in the N. American Rev., xxix. 315, by G. B. Cheever. Charles Butler (see his Reminiscences) supposes Lord Sackville to have been the author of Junius, and Sir Philip Francis his amanuensis and occasional assistant. Mr. Jaques, in his History of Junius and his Works, and a Review of the Controversy, 1843, 8vo, adopts this theory, and adds D'Oyly, Francis's fellow-clerk in the War Office—as a connecting link between Lord Sackville and Francis.

III. Colonel Isaac Barré. Mr. John Britton, in his Authorship of the Letters of Junius Elucidated, 1848, r. 8vo, earnestly contends that Colonel Barré was Junius, and that he was assisted by Lord Shelburne and Mr. Dunning. In an article pub. in the London Morning Herald in 1813, the opinion was expressed that the Earl of Shelburne was Junius, and that he was assisted by Barré and Dunning. This work is noticed by the author of the article in the London Quar. Rev., xc. 91, before referred to, as "a curious instance of the delusion which men will resign themselves when they have a favourite opinion to uphold."

An elaborate review of Mr. Britton's work will be found in the London Athenæum, July 22 and 29, 1848. And see other articles referred to in the course of the present notice.

We shall now proceed to give a list of publications connected with this perplexing subject, which to the minds of many of the most intelligent readers of the day is as much a mystery as it was to their grandfathers. Whether this cloud will ever be lifted from the name is now doubtful. Indeed, it is difficult to imagine in what way the authorship of the Letters of Junius can ever be satisfactorily proved, presuming that the claims of the real author have been, or shall hereafter be, presented to the public for acceptance. If the arguments in favour of the authorship of Sir Philip Francis, or Lord Sackville, or both combined, be insufficient to gain credence, what amount of evidence can identify the real author? Certain it is that against even Junius himself, whoever he may be, many probabilities will apparently exist. It can be only by the preponderance of favourable testimony that any such claim can be established. Not a year elapses in which some man is not hanged on less evidence than has been adduced in favour of more than one of the claimants of the authorship of the Letters of Junius. But we must proceed with our list of publications.

1769. 1. An Impartial Answer to the Doctrine delivered in a Letter which appeared in the Public Advertiser under the signature of Junius. By Charles Fearne, 8vo. 2. Interesting Letters selected from the Correspondence of Messrs. Wilkes, Horne, Beckford, and Junius, 8vo. 3. A Collect. of the Letters of Atticus, Lucius, Junius, and others; with Observ. and Notes, 8vo. 4. The Political Contest; being a Cont. of Junius's Letters from the 6th of July to the present time, 8vo. 5. The Political Contest; containing a Series of Letters between Junius and Sir Will. Draper; also the whole of Junius's Letters to his Grace the Duke of Grafton, 8vo.

1770. 6. An Address to Junius upon the subject of his Letter in the Public Advertiser, Dec. 19, 1769, 8vo. In this address the Letters are attributed to Wilkes.

1771. 7. Letters addressed to the King, the Duke of Grafton, the Earls of Chesterfield and Sandwich, Lord Barrington, Junius, and the Rev. Mr. Horne, under the signature of P. P. S., 8vo. 8. An Answer to Junius, 8vo. 9. The Trial of John Almon, Bookseller, for selling Junius's Letters to the K—g, 8vo. 10. The Genuine Letters of Junius, and Anecdotes of the Author. The compiler attributes the letters to Edmund Burke.

1772. 11. Woodfall's—the first authorised—edit. of the Letters of Junius, 2 vols. sm. 8vo.

1774. 12. Epistle to Junius, by Benj. Hughes, 4to.

1778. 13. Serious Letter to the Public, by Junius, 8vo. Fictitious.

1788. 14. Anecdotes of Junius: to which is prefixed the King's Reply, 8vo.

1789. 15. Junius Discovered, by P. T., 8vo. Junius is supposed to be John Horne Tooke.

1794. 16. Letters of Junius, 2 vols. 8vo.

1797. 17. Letters of Junius, 2 vols. 8vo, Bensley's beautiful ed., illustrated by portraits. A copy on vellum was sold at auction in London in 1804 for £25 4s.

1799. 18. Letter of Charles Butler, dated July, 1799, giving an account of the inquiries of John Wilkes and himself relative to the authorship of Junius. Repub., with addits., in Butler's Reminiscences, 1822.

1800. 19. Geo. Chalmers's Append. to his Supp. Apology; being the documents for the opinion that Hugh McAuley Boyd wrote Junius's Letters, 8vo. See 1817, No. 41.

1801. 20. Junius's Letters, with portraits, 2 vols. 8vo. Printed by Bensley.

1803. 21. St. James's Chronicle, Apl. 16. T. Rodney's account (extracted from the Wilmington, Del., Mirror) of Genl. Lee's assertion that he was Junius.

1808. 22. Reasons for rejecting the presumptive Evidence of Mr. Almon that Boyd was Junius, with Passages selected to prove the real author of the Letters of Junius. This is Dr Girdlestone's pamphlet, and endeavours to show that Gen. Charles Lee was Junius.

1809. 23. Another guess at Junius, and a Dialogue, 8vo. An attempt to prove that Lord Chatham was Junius.

1810. 24. Junius's Letters, with Portraits, r. 8vo.

1812. 25. The Letters of Junius, including Letters by the same Writer, under other signatures, (now first collected.) To which are added confidential Corresp. with Mr. Wilkes, and his private Letters to H. S. Woodfall, with a Preliminary Essay, [by John Mason Good, M.D.,] Notes, Fac-similes, &c., 3 vols. 8vo. Repub. in Phila., 1813, 2 vols. 8vo.

1813. 26. An Attempt to ascertain the author of Junius's Letters, 8vo. By the Rev. John B. Blakeaway. Mr. B. advocates the claims of John Horne Tooke. See 1815, No. 36. 27. An Inquiry concerning the Author of the Letters of Junius, in which it is proved, by internal as well as direct and satisfactory Evidence, that they were written by the Hon. Edmund Burke, 8vo. By John Roche. 28. Facts tending to prove that Genl. Lee was the Author of Junius. By T. Girdlestone, M.D. See 1808, No. 22. 29. The Life of the Author of Junius's Letters, the Rev. James Wilmot, D.D. With portrait, fac-similes, etc., 8vo. By Olivia Wilmot Serres. 30. A Discovery of the Author of the Letters of Junius, 8vo. This is John Taylor's first publication on the subject, and attributes the authorship to Philip Francis, D.D., father of Sir Philip Francis. See 1816, No. 37. 31. The Letters of Junius, illustrated by Howard Roequet, from original paintings. A beautiful ed., with 12 portraits. 32. Memoirs, by a celebrated Literary and Political Character, [Richard Glover,] 1742-57, 8vo. By Richard Duppa.

1814. 33. An Inquiry concerning the Author of the Letters of Junius, with Reference to the Memoirs, [see 1813, No. 32,] &c., 8vo. An attempt to prove that Richard Glover was the author. 34. An Inquiry into the Author of the Letters of Junius. 35. Second ed. of H. S. Woodfall's ed. of 1812, 3 vols. 8vo.

1815. 36. Sequel of An Attempt to discover Junius, by the Rev. J. B. Blakeaway. See 1813, No. 26.

1816. 37. The Identity of Junius with a distinguished Living Character [Sir Philip Francis] established. By John Taylor. See 1813, No. 30. This is the first attempt to fix the authorship upon Sir Philip Francis. See the preceding references to this branch of the controversy, under the title of I. Sir Philip Francis, and to London Athenæum, Oct. 8, 1850; consult also Index to Notes and Queries, and to the Athenæum for 1850. Especially see Mr. Taylor's letters to Notes and Queries, Sept. 7, 1850. 38. Arguments and Facts proving that the Letters of Junius were written by John Lewis De Lolme. By Tho. Busby, Mus. D., 8vo.

39. Letters to a Nobleman, proving a late Prime Minister [the Duke of Portland] to have been Junius, and developing the secret motives which induced him to write under that and other signatures, with an Appendix, 8vo.

1817. 40. A Supp. to Junius Identified. By John Taylor. Consisting of Fac-similes of Handwriting and other Illustrations, 8vo. A 2d ed. of this and of No. 37 was pub. in 1818. See 1816, No. 37. 41. The Author of Junius ascertained from a concatenation of circumstances, amounting to moral demonstration, 8vo. By George Chalmers. This is a republication, with new facts, &c., of the arguments in favour of H. M. Boyd. See 1800, No. 19. Reprinted in 1819, with a new title-page and a postscript. 42. An Attempt to ascertain the Author of Junius, 8vo. 43. Junius: Sir Philip Francis Denied: a Letter addressed to the British Nation, by Olivia Wilmot Serres, 8vo.

1819. 44. Junius Unmasked: a well-known and most eminent Literary Character of the last Century. 1819. This is an argument in favour of Gibbon the historian. 45. A Refutation of the Claims preferred for Sir Philip Francis and Mr. Gibbon to the Letters of Junius, 1819. 46. Junius, with his Visor Up! 1819. A burlesque in favour of Suett, the Comedian. 47. Another Guess at Junius, (1819?)

1821. 48. The Author of Junius discovered in the Person of the celebrated Earl of Chesterfield, 8vo; and 1823.

1822. 49. The Letters of Junius, with Preliminary Dissertations and Copious Notes. By Atticus Secundus, 8vo. This author coincides with John Taylor.

1824. 50. The Claims of Sir Philip Francis, with a Supp. to Junius Discovered, 8vo.

1825. 51. A Critical Enquiry regarding the real author of the Letters of Junius, proving them to have been written by Lord Viscount Sackville. By George Coventry, 8vo. It is asserted that Coventry changed his views, and pub. a pamphlet in support of the claims of Sir Philip Francis. But this appears to be doubtful.

1826. 52. Junius proved to have been Burke; with an Outline of his Biography, 8vo. We may here mention also (53.) Junius's Political Axioms, 8vo, and (54.) A Great Personage proved to have been Junius, 8vo.

1828. 55. Junius Unmasked; or, Lord George Sackville proved to be Junius. This anonymous work, pub. at Boston, Mass., is based upon Coventry's argument in favour of Lord George Sackville. See ante, 1825, No. 51. 56. Letters on the Author of Junius. By E. H. Barker, 12mo. This work opposes the claims of Sir Philip Francis, and advocates those of Charles Lloyd. 57. Memoirs of John Horne Tooke, and also containing proofs identifying him as the author of the celebrated Letters of Junius. By Dr. Graham; pub. in N. York.

1829. 58. Junius's Posthumous Works; with an Inquiry respecting the Author, and a sketch of the Life of John Horne Tooke, 8vo. Pub. in N. York. Advocates the claims of Tooke.

1830. 59. The Secret Revealed of the Authorship of Junius's Letters. By James Falconar, Jun., Esq. Advocates the claims of Daniel Wray.

1831. 60. An Essay on Junius and his Letters. By Benj. Waterhouse, M.D. This work, pub. at Boston, Mass., advocates the claims of the Earl of Chatham. 61. Letters on Junius, addressed to John Pickering, Esq., shewing that the author of that celebrated work was Lord Temple. By Isaac Newhall. Pub. at Boston.

1833. 62. Junius, Lord Chatham, &c. By John Swinden.

1837. 63. Who was Junius? Anon. In favour of Lord Chatham's claims.

1841. 64. Letter to an Hon. Brig.-Genl., [Lord Townshend;] repub. by N. W. Simons, 1843, 12mo. This Letter, ascribed to Junius by Mr. Simons, was originally pub. in 1760. Mr. Simons argues against the claims of Sir Philip Francis.

1843. 65. The History of Junius and his Works; and a Review of the Controversy respecting the Identity of Junius. By John Jaques, 8vo. See the preceding remarks under II. Lord George Sackville.

1848. 66. The Authorship of the Letters of Junius Elucidated. By John Britton, 1848, r. 8vo. See the preceding remarks under III. Colonel Isaac Barré.

1850. 67. H. G. Bohn's ed. of Junius, edited by John Wade, 2 vols. 8vo. See the preceding remarks under I. Sir Philip Francis. 68. Some New Facts and a suggested New Theory as to the authorship of the Letters of Junius. By Sir Fortunatus Dwarris, Knt. Privately printed. Refer according to last article. 69. Junius and his Works compared with the Earl of Chesterfield, by W. Jebb, 8vo.

1851. 70. Postscript to No. 69, with Fac-similes of Letters of Junius, Lord Chesterfield, and Mrs. C. Dayrolles, &c.

1853. 71. The Ghost of Junius, &c. By Mr. Ayerst. In favour of the claims of Lieut.-Genl. Sir Robert Rich, Bart.

1854. 72. Junius Discovered. By F. Griffin, at Boston, Mass., 1857, 12mo. Mr. Griffin advocates the claims of Gov. Thos. Pownall. 73. Junius—Lord Chatham, &c., by William Dowe, N. York, 1857, 12mo. A review of the works of Mr. Griffin and Mr. Dowe will be found in the Lon. Athen., July 17, 1858. The tone of the critique is indicated in the opening paragraph:

"Two more volumes of mere speculation, both from the other side of the Atlantic."

74. The Beauties and Maxims of Junius, by Lye, and 75, the Selection of Aphorisms, by Fisher, being merely compilations, need be barely referred to. The notes to Heron's edit. of Junius are worthy of attention. The reader will find much ingenious criticism, and many plausible suppositions, in several of the following articles enumerated in Poole's Index to Periodical Literature.

I. Authorship of Junius: 1. Edin. Rev., xxix. 94, (by Lord Brougham.) A writer in the Lon. Gent. Mag. (Dec. 1845, p. 587) ascribes this article to Sir Jas. Mackintosh; but he is in error: Lord Brougham has recently repub. it in his Contributions to the Edin. Rev., Lon. and Glasg., 1856, iii. 338-361. 2. N. Amer. Rev., xxix. 315, (by G. B. Cheever.) 3. N. Amer. Rev., xxxiv. 316, (by D. L. Child.) 4. N. Brit. Rev., x. 52; same art. in N. York Eclec. Mag., xvi. 160. 5. Amer. Month. Rev., i. 33. 6. N. Eng. Mag., i. 54. 7. Blackw. Mag., xviii. 164. 8. Blackw. Mag., xxxiv. 209. 9. Lon. Month. Rev., lxxxii. 69. 10. Lon. Month. Rev., cvii. 304. 11. Amer. Whig Rev., xiii. 484. 12. Amer. Whig Rev., xiv. 35. 13. Boston Living Age, xxvii. 567; (from the London Spectator.) 14. Phila. Museum of For. Lit., vii. 473. 15. Lon. Quar. Rev., xc. 49.

II. Identity of Junius: 16. Dubl. Univ. Mag., xl. 20; same art., Boston Living Age, xxxiv. 385.

III. Junius Identified: 17. Boston Living Age, xxvii. 281.

IV. Letters of Junius: 18. N. Amer. Rev., lv. 419, (by C. F. Adams.)

V. Waterhouse's Essay on Junius: 19. Charleston South. Rev., vii. 486. 20. Boston Chris. Exam., x. 256, (by H. Ware, Jr.)

VI. Woodfall's Essay on Junius: 21. Phila. Analec. Mag., ii. 1.

VII. 22. Arguments in favour of the claims of Lachlan McLane to the authorship of Junius, in Waldie's (Philadelphia) Library, (by John Jay Smith, editor.)

In addition to these, the reader will find many excellent articles upon the general question, or specialties connected with it, in the London Athenæum, Blackwood's Mag., (see Index to vols. i.–l.,) and other periodicals. We would particularly instance a paper entitled, Sir Philip Francis not Junius, in the Lon. Gent. Mag., Feb. 1842, 166–168; and one by John Foster, entitled Who was Junius? (a review of Woodfall's ed. of Junius, 1813, 8vo,) in the Lon. Eclec. Mag., Feb. and April, 1813; repub. in Foster's Critical Essays, Lon., 1856, vol. ii. 72–105. We presume, however, that the reader will be satisfied with the bill of fare thus presented to him; and, as a stimulus to his investigations, we can assure him that those who have most thoroughly explored the field are generally those who avow themselves to be most in the dark upon the subject. After espousing and warmly advocating half a dozen theories on the subject, they usually end with no theory at all. Poor Sir N. Harris Nicolas, after diligently posting for many years, in mercantile-ledger style, the pros and cons in the Junius Papers, arrived at this very satisfactory result:

"So far from having any theory of our own on Junius's identity, we are as entirely free from bias on the subject, and confess ourselves as profoundly ignorant of the authorship of those celebrated Letters, as if, instead of having for many years constantly had the question in our mind, and having read, we believe, nearly every thing that has been written on the point, we had never bestowed a thought on the matter. We have indeed a strong impression that Junius was not any one of the numerous persons heretofore so confidently brought forward."

Not satisfied with this home-thrust at the "confident" Junius-discoverers, the worthy knight, wrought up to a high pitch of indignation by his ill-success, which forced him to speak his mind without restraint, proceeds in the following complimentary strain:

"However startling the idea may be to the many pseudo-discoverers of Junius on both sides of the Atlantic, we found much of the claim of our observations to attention in the very fact of our having no Junius of our own, and on our disbelief in each of theirs."

When we remember the eminence of Sir N. H. Nicolas as an antiquary, and the fact that the above was written as lately as 1848, we may estimate the probability of success in Junius-hunting. But Mr. Wade is quite confident that he has bagged the game; and perhaps he has.

Dr. John Mason Good concluded his investigations in 1812, in utter despair, and fifteen years later, only a few weeks before his death, writes to Mr. Barker, respecting this perplexing question,

"Many years ago, as you perhaps may be aware, I entered at full speed into this research, and beat the bush in every direction. At that time, however, the claims of Sir Philip Francis had not been advanced, at least not before the public. But had they been brought forward, the arguments by which it is obvious they may be met, and many of which you have yourself ably handled, would, I think, have succeeded in putting him as completely out of the list as all the other competitors appear to be just whose friends have undertaken to bring them forward. The question is nevertheless one of great interest as well on the score of national history as of literary curiosity. Yet, like many other desiderata, I am afraid it is likely to lie beyond the fathoming of any line and plummet that will be applied to it in our days."—Oct 13, 1820.

Charles Butler, one of the most acute of lawyers, and peculiarly well skilled in legal and literary controversy, and who had moreover examined this subject with the personal assistance of John Wilkes, the correspondent of Junius himself, writes to Barker, in 1828,

"I am sorry I cannot communicate to you any information of importance on the subject in which you take so great an interest. I have only to add, that it appears to me involved in as great obscurity as ever"

And now—to descend to smaller things—we are encouraged by the candour of these eminent individuals to emulate their frankness; and we will be magnanimous enough to own that our researches have placed us exactly in the position of Messrs. Good, Nicolas, Butler, and some thousands of others in "pursuit of knowledge under difficulties:"—we are altogether ignorant of the author-ship of the LETTERS OF JUNIUS. We have no claim to question the veracity of this mysterious personage, who declared, "I am the sole depository of my secret, and it shall die with me." We have already quoted a portion of the eloquent comments of Dr. Good upon Junius as a writer, but we are not willing to conclude this article without adding some further authorities on this point:

"I quote Junius in English, as I would Tacitus or Livy in Latin. I consider him as a legitimate English Classick. Botta's Dar ssuits of Literature.

"Junius burst into notice with a blaze of reputation which has rarely glared upon the world before; and while the public admires him as a monster makes a show. When he had once passed it for his safety by impenetrable secrecy, he had nothing to combat but truth and justice, enemies whom he knows to be lodged in the dark. Being then at liberty to indulge himself in all the animations of invisibility, out of the reach of danger he has been bold; out of the reach of shame, he has been confident. As a rhetorician he has the art of persuading when he seconded desire as a pleasure; he has convinced those who had no doubt before, as a moralist he has taught that virtue may disgrace; and as a patriot, he has gratified the mean by insults on the high. . . . It is not to be for bearance of imagery, his pungency of remark, or his fertility of allusion that he detains the city of London and the county of Middlesex. Of style and sentiment they take no cognizance."—Dr. SAMUEL JOHNSON On the Seizure of the Falkland Islands, 1771.

The citation of this passage may remind the reader that an eminent modern critic has brought the names of Johnson and Junius into juxtaposition in his remarks upon the chronological history of English style.

"Adam Smith was nearly the first who made deeper researches and more exact knowledge popular among us, and Johnson and Junius the first who again familiarized us with more glowing and sonorous diction, and made us feel the sameness and poorness of the serious style of Addison and Swift."—LORD JEFFREY Contrib. to Edin. Review, Lon., 1863, 77.

"How comes this Junius to have broke through the cobwebs of the law, and to range uncontrolled, unpunished through the land? The myrmidons of the Court have been long and are still, pursuing him in vain. They will not spend their time upon mice or you. No: they disdain such vermin when the mighty bear of the forest, that has broken through all their toils, is before them. But what will all their efforts avail? No sooner has he wounded one than he lays another dead at his feet. For my part, when I saw his attack upon the king, I own my blood ran cold. . . . In short, after carrying away our Royal Eagle in his pounces and dashing him against a rock, he has laid you prostrate. Kings Lords, and Commons are but the sport of his fury. Were he a member of this House, what might not be expected from his knowledge, his firmness and integrity! He would be easily known by his contempt of all danger, by his penetration, by his vigour. Nothing would escape his vigilance and activity. Bad ministers could conceal nothing from his sagacity; nor could promises nor threats induce him to conceal any thing from the public."—EDMUND BURKE: Speech in the House of Commons.

Kæmer, Francis, Surgeon, London. Paper in Ann. of Med., 1801.

Kane, Elisha Kent, M.D., a famous Arctic navigator, a great-grandson of Colonel John Kane, of the British Army, who emigrated from Ireland to New York about 1756, and a son of John K. Kane, Judge of the United States Court for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania, was b. in Philadelphia, Feb. 3, 1820; educated at the University of Virginia, and in the Medical Department of the University of Pennsylvania; and, after passing examination as a surgeon in the United States Navy, was appointed physician to the Chinese Embassy, and sailed in the frigate "Brandywine," May, 1843. He availed himself of his two years' absence from home to make the circuit of the globe, sailing around the coast of South America; across the Pacific Ocean to Southern and Eastern Asia, and returning by the overland route through Europe across the Atlantic to the United States. Returning to Philadelphia, he practised medicine until May, 1846, when he was ordered to the coast of Africa in the frigate "United States," under Commodore Reed. A violent attack of fever sent him home for medical care, from which he was glad to escape for the opportunity of service in Mexico,—obtaining credentials at Washington as bearer of despatches to General Scott, then in the capital of that country. Near Nopaluca, the Mexican spy-company with whom the Doctor travelled had an encounter with a band of guerillas escorting General Gaona (whose life was saved by the bravery of Kane) and other Mexican officers. After the conclusion of the war, in January, 1849, Dr. Kane was attached to the store-ship Supply, bound for Lisbon, the Mediterranean, and Rio Janeiro, and shortly afterwards was assigned to the Coast Survey, from which he was summoned to a field of duty with which his name will ever be gloriously connected. The Government of the United States had determined to share in the search for Sir John Franklin; and Dr. Kane, who had repeatedly volunteered his services, was made Senior Medical Officer and Naturalist of the expedition, which sailed in two vessels, "The Advance" and "The Rescue," furnished by the liberality of Henry Grinnell, Esq., of New York, under Commander De Haven. Of this sixteen months' cruise (rewarded by the discovery of Franklin's first winter-quarters and the graves of three of his men) an account was published under the following title: The United States Grinnell Expedition in Search of Sir John Franklin: a Personal Narrative, by Elisha Kent Kane, M.D., U.S.N., New York, Harpers, 1853, 8vo.

Of this work a new edition, Illustrated with many Plates and Wood-cuts, with a Biography of Sir John Franklin by S. Austin Allibone, (see p. 632, supra,) was published by Messrs. Childs & Peterson, Philadelphia, 1857, 8vo, pp. 552. The difficulties under which Kane's Second Polar Expedition was set afloat cannot be properly noticed here: they have been graphically portrayed in Dr. Elder's Biography of Elisha Kent Kane, 1858, 8vo, to which, as for other particulars, we refer the reader. On the day of the return of the Expedition, Oct. 11, 1855, more than fourteen years ago, we recorded (p. 633, supra) some of the results achieved. In September, 1856, Dr. Kane gave to the world: Arctic Explorations: The Second Grinnell Expedition in Search of Sir John Franklin during the Years 1853, '54, '55. Phila., Childs & Peterson, 1856, 2 vols. 8vo, (Lon., Nelson, 1860, or. 8vo; Far North: Explorations in the Arctic Regions by Dr. Kane, Simpkin, 1865, 12mo.) The work was handsomely printed and beautifully illustrated, under the intelligent superintendence of one of its publishers, Mr. George W. Childs, who liberally allowed the author double the usual rate of copyright interest, and had the pleasure of paying on this account, in the first year, sixty-five thousand dollars,—the proceeds of the sale of as many copies of the work. Of such success there are very few instances in literary history. But there was something more and better than this: the enthusiastic commendations, the hearty respect, the affectionate friendship, of many of the most eminent persons in Europe and America, were the well-deserved reward of this heart-stirring record of philanthropic toil, suffering, and peril.

"I read it," remarks Kane's illustrious predecessor in the fields of ice, Sir John Richardson, "with the deepest interest, combined with admiration of the skill and perseverance with which you accomplished your explorations, and the most heartfelt sympathy with you in your trials and privations. . . . With a less energetic leader the whole party would have perished."

"It is one of the most remarkable records I have ever met with," says Prescott the historian, "of difficulties and sufferings, and of the power of a brave spirit to overcome them."

"His constant self-possession during his long trials," observed Bancroft the historian, "his quickness of judgment, his unshrinking courage in danger, his fertility in resources in the hours of greatest difficulty, give him a very high place in the very first rank of Polar Navigators, as a leader, and commander, and man; and no one of them all has told the story of their adventures so charmingly as he has done."

We have before us similar tributes from Washington Irving, Edward Everett, Louis Agassiz, Alfred Tennyson, and many others, but must content ourselves, in this limited space, by referring the reader to London Athenæum, Nov. 1, 1856; London Saturday Review, Nov. 22, 1856; U. States Magazine, Dec. 1856; N. American Review, Jan. 1857; Westminster Review, Jan. 1857; N. British Review, Feb. 1857; Blackwood's Magazine, March, 1857; British Quarterly Review, April, 1857. The labour of the preparation of his volumes told severely upon a constitution weakened by privations and hardships; and on the 10th of October, 1856, Kane sailed from New York for Liverpool, in hopes of regaining strength; but his malady gained upon him, and on the 20th of December he took passage for Havana, which he reached on the 25th. Here he lingered until the 16th of February, 1857, when he breathed his last. As his body was carried from State to State to the city of his birth, honours were decreed such as grateful nations accord to kings and conquerors.

We have already directed the reader to Dr. Elder's Life of Kane, (see, also, SHIELDS, CHARLES WOODRUFF, D.D., No. 1;) and we also refer him to the Biographical Sketch, by Dr. Shields, prefixed to a new edition of Kane's Arctic Explorations, Hartford, 1868, 8vo; Famous Boys, and How they became Great Men, Bost., 1860, 18mo; A Tribute to Kane, and other Poems, by George W. Chapman, N. York, 1860, 12mo; Dr. Tweedie's Life and Works of Earnest Men, Lon., 1863, p. 8vo, 209–35; Dr. Kane the Arctic Hero: a Narrative, by M. Physical Geography of Greenland, from researches undertaken during three different scientific journeys to the Arctic regions, the last of which was in 1867. He has obtained the assistance of Dr. Hooker, Professors Oliver and Dickie, Mr. Lawson, Dr. L. Lindsay, Mr. Croal, Dr. Lutken, and Herr Otto Morch of Copenhagen. In 1868 a North-German expedition in the Germania, Captain C. Koldewey, visited Greenland; on Sept. 26, 1869, Captain C. F. Hall (supra) arrived at New Bedford after five years' residence in the Arctic regions; and in the same year (1869) five expeditions visited those inhospitable climes, viz.: I. American, under Dr. Hayes, accompanied by Bradford the artist, for the purpose of taking photographs, in "The Panther;" II. German, Dr. Bessel, in "The Albert;" III. English, Captain Iverson, in "The Diana;" IV. Norwegian, Captain Carlsen, in a small sloop; V. Russian, Captain Kieck, in "The George." From some of these adventurous spirits we may expect contributions to Arctic Bibliography.

4. The Large and Small Farm Question Considered in Regard to the Present Circumstances of Ireland, 1848, 8vo. Sir Robert recommends the formation of small farms. This question must soon be considered with reference to England; and the sooner it is settled in the manner required by the necessities of a superabundant population, the better for the prosperity of that great country. In 1775 there were about 200,000 land owners; in 1855 there were less than 35,000. How long will it be safe to crowd the cities and villages thus? Should English manufactures be driven from foreign markets by competition, what follows at home?

Keach, Benjamin, 1640–1704, a native of Stokeham, Buckinghamshire, a member of the Particular or Calvinistic Baptists, commenced preaching in his eighteenth year, and in 1668 became pastor of a congregation in Southwark, London, was cruelly persecuted for his bold advocacy of his opinions, and consoled himself by writing a great number of controversial and other tracts and religious poems, and several theological works of greater pretensions. It is said that he gave to the world no less than forty-seven publications,—three in folio, six in quarto, and the balance in octavo and smaller sizes. Of all these works, the following are the only ones now in much demand. 1. Travels of True Godliness, Lon., 1683. New ed., with Notes and Memoirs of the Author, by the Rev. Howard Malcom, of Boston, N. England, N. York, 1831, 18mo; last English eds., Lon., 1846, '49, 18mo.

"In point of theological accuracy, devout temper, and useful tendency, the Travels of True Godliness may bear comparison with Pilgrim's Progress. The admirers of Bunyan cannot fail to be pleased with Keach."—HOWARD MALCOM.

"Keach was but a poor imitator of John Bunyan."—ROBERT SOUTHEY: Lon. Quar. Rev., x. 124.

2. The Travels of Ungodliness; last ed., 1849, 18mo. 3. Tropologia: A Key to open Scripture Metaphors and Types, 1681, fol.; 1779, fol.; last eds., 1853, '56, r. 8vo. Keach received assistance in the preparation of his works from men of more learning than himself, and the first book of Tropologia was written by Thomas Delaune. The best of the old eds. (1779, fol.) had become so scarce before the new one of 1853, that a copy could seldom be purchased under £3.

"After an acquaintance with this excellent work for more than thirty years, I will take the freedom to recommend it to serious young Christians, to Masters of Families, to Students of Divinity, and younger Ministers of the Gospel. . . . A book full of the best riches, in the easiest language."—JOHN RYLAND.

"A most valuable treasure of human composition; a book without which no Christian Minister's Library can be complete, and which may be very useful to every attentive reader and lover of the word of God."—C. DE COETLOGON.

"I know not of any work that has treated the subject to such an ample extent."—THOMAS GIBBONS.

Also highly commended by W. Hervey, Jas. Hervey, John Conder, Benj. Francis, H. Peckwell, Saml. Medley, T. R. Valpy, and others.

"It is a work which a judicious preacher may consult with profit, but which a commonplace declaimer will never fail to abuse."—Dr. E. Williams's C. P.

"Many of his interpretations are very fanciful. The Introduction was translated from Glassius's Treatise de Typis et Metaphoris, in his Philologia Sacra."—Horne's Bibl. Bib. And see next article.

4. Gospel Mysteries Unveiled: or, An Exposition of all the Parables and many Express Similitudes contained in the Four Evangelists, &c.; with a Supp., 1701, 2 vols. fol. New ed., 1815, 4 vols. 8vo. This ed. omits the Preface, all the marginal summaries and notes, (with the exception of the references to texts,) and the indices. But a new edit., issued within about a year, (1856, r. 8vo,) lies before us, and this has the Preface, an Index, and, we presume, (but of this we are not certain,) the original notes.

"Many of the Parables are spiritualized almost to absurdity. The work, however, contains good materials, which persons of sober judgment may employ to advantage."—Horne's Bibl. Bib.

An eminent critic remarks of the two works last noticed:

"That Mr. Keach possessed a very familiar acquaintance with the Bible is obvious. The above works, however, are far from judicious. He frequently fails to distinguishing things that differ, and often confounds together the things which ought to be distinguished. He carries his illustrations too far,—the common fault of metaphor-hunters and parable-preachers. His works may be useful, but they are liable to be very much abused. If the reader is partial to this kind of interpretation, he would do well to consult the Rhetorica Sacra of Glassius, in the improved edition by Dathe."—Orme's Bibl. Bib.

"Bickerteth remarks that these works of Keach contain many useful suggestions."—Christian Student.

Walter Wilson says that Keach's works will be found "of great utility to the theological student, as containing many original observations upon various passages of Scripture that are obscure and intricate."—Hist. of Dissenting Churches, q. v.

Keatinge, Thomas. Treat. on Family Settlements and Devises, &c., Lon., 1810, 8vo.

Keats, John, 1796–1821, a native of Moorfields, London,—where his father and grandfather kept a stable,—after receiving some classical instruction at a school at Enfield, was in his fifteenth year apprenticed to a surgeon at Edmonton, but soon abandoned Galen and Æsculapius for the charms of poetical composition. Having made the acquaintance of Mr. Leigh Hunt, then editor of the Examiner, he was encouraged to publish some of his effusions in the columns of that periodical, and in 1817 he put to press a volume of poems dedicated to his literary patron. In the next year he gave to the world Endymion, a Poetic Romance,—a poem containing many beauties, and perhaps as many faults, and certainly indicative of most remarkable poetical powers. The book had hardly got fairly before the world when it was pounced upon with great severity by Mr. Gifford, whose critical dissecting-knife made such and havoc with the author's verses in the brief compass of three pages of the Quarterly, that poor Keats was crushed to the earth under the severity of the operation, and it was long believed by many that he actually died from its effects.

In 1820, he gave to the world a second volume, containing Lamia, Isabella, The Eve of St. Agnes, Hyperion, and some minor poems, which fully redeemed the promise of extraordinary poetical powers so clearly perceptible in his previous publications. In October of this year, he visited Italy for the benefit of his health, but received no advantage from the change, and died at Rome, on the 21st of February ensuing. As Mr Gifford's celebrated critique on Endymion is always a prominent topic when the merits of the author form the subject of discussion, we quote a few lines as a specimen of the whole:

"With the fullest stretch of our perseverance, we are forced to confess that we have not been able to struggle beyond the first of the four books of which this Poetic Romance consists. We should extremely lament the want of energy, or whatever it may be, on our part, were it not for one consolation, namely, that we are no better acquainted with the meaning of the book through which we have so painfully toiled than we are with that of the three which we have not looked into.

"It is not that Mr. Keats, if that be his real name—for we almost doubt whether any man in his senses would put his real name to such a rhapsody,—it is not, we say, that the author has not powers of language, rays of fancy, and gleams of genius, he has all these: but he is unhappily a disciple of the new school of what has been somewhere called Cockney poetry, which may be defined to consist of the most incongruous ideas in the most uncouth language. . . . The author is a copyist of Mr Hunt—but how many unintelligible, almost as ragged twice as diffuse and ten times more tiresome and absurd than his prototype!"—Lon. Quar. Rev., xix. 204–208, April, 1818.

"Such language poor Keats did not consider complimentary, and he was certainly right; but to charge Gifford with his murder is absurd. We quite agree with Mr. De Quincey:

"The friends who honour Keats's memory should not lend themselves to a story so degrading. He died, I believe of pulmonary consumption, and would have died of it, probably under any circumstances of prosperity as a poet."—Essays on the Poets &c.: John Keats, Bost., 1853, 87.

Nothing has given so much currency to this story (excepting perhaps Shelley's pathetic lines, both prose and verse) as Byron's stanza in the 11th Canto of Don Juan:

"John Keats who was killed off by one critique,
Just as he really promised something great,
If not intelligible,—without Greek
Contrived to talk about the gods of late,
Much as they might have been supposed to speak.
Poor fellow! his was an untoward fate:
'Tis strange the mind, that very fiery particle,
Should let itself be snuff'd out by an Article."

But this stanza should always be accompanied by the following comment by one of Keats's earliest, oldest, and warmest friends:

"When I was in Italy, Lord Byron showed me in manuscript the well known passage in Don Juan, in which Keats's death is attributed to the Quarterly Review,—the couplet about the fiery particle that was snuff'd out by an article. I told him the real state of the case, proving to him that the supposition was a mistake, and therefore, if printed, would be a misrepresentation. But a stroke of wit was not to be given up."—Leigh Hunt's Autobiography, chap. xvi., q. v.

Lord Byron, indeed, may have preferred Shelley's version of the matter to Hunt's; and he certainly seems to be sincere in the opinion expressed in this stanza. See (in Moore's Life of Byron) the MS. note, Nov. 12, 1821, to his Pamphlet in answer to Blackwood's Magazine, and his letters to John Murray, of April 26 and July 30, 1821.

Mr. Prescott, referring to Marcellier's comment on Charles V.'s ungrateful letter to Ximenes, "Cette terrible lettre qui fuit la cause de sa mort," remarks:

"Byron, alluding to the fate of a modern poet, ridicules the idea of > "'The mind, that fiery particle,

> Being extinguish'd by an Article.'

"The frown of a critic, however, might as well prove fatal as that of a king. In both cases, I imagine, it would be hard to prove any closer connection between the two events than that of time." —Ferdinand and Isabella, 11th ed., Bost., 1856, iii. 415, n.

But, whatever may have been the extent of the injury inflicted by Gifford's "Article," he has received sufficient abuse for it himself to make the account even, long before this time. To say nothing of the poetic invectives of "Adonais," Jeffrey, Hazlitt, Talfourd, and a host of other generous champions, have taken up the cudgel in Keats's behalf, and handled them with such hearty good-will and thorough execution that we feel almost inclined to take part with poor Gifford and rescue him from his enraged assailants.

"Mr. Keats," says Hazlitt, "was hooted out of the world, and his fine talents and wounded sensibilities consigned to an early grave."—The Spirit of the Age; Mr. Gifford.

"Mr. Keats," says Talfourd, "who now happily has attained the vantage-ground whence he may defy criticism,—was cruelly or wantonly held up to ridicule in the Quarterly Review,—to his transitory pain, we fear, but to the lasting disgrace of his traducer."—New Monthly Mag.; and in his Crit. and Miscell. Writings.

"The Editor of the Quarterly Review happened to be looking out for a victim," says Cunningham, "when the works of Keats appeared. . . . To such a review there was no other mode of reply but a horsewhip or a brace of pistols."—Biog. and Crit. Hist of the Lit. of the Last Fifty Years.

But why a poet should murder a reviewer, or a reviewer murder a poet, (for your duellist is in act or intention one of the worst of murderers,) because one does not like the other's poetry and the other does not fancy the former's critique, is more than we can understand. Two very spicy responses to Mr. Keats's self-deputed champions will be found, the one in the London Quarterly Review for March, 1840, (art. Journalism in France,) the other by Dr. Maginn, (Remarks on Shelley's Adonais,) in Blackwood's Magazine for December, 1841. The last will be found in Dr. R. S. Mackenzie's collection of The Odoherty Papers, N. York, 1855, ii. 190–200. But it is quite time that we had quoted some opinions upon the characteristics of a writer who now, at least, has acquired an unquestionable right to rank high on the illustrious roll of Britain's greatest poets. The present popularity of Keats is best proved by that unerring standard, the publishers' account-books. Among the late editions we must not omit to specially notice the one illustrated by G. Scharf, Jun., pub. by Moxon, Lon., 1854, sq. cr. 8vo, and The Eve of St. Agnes, (only,) illustrated by Wehnert, pub. by Low, Lon., 1856, cr. 8vo.

Mr. Gifford's terrible review of Endymion was pub., as we have seen, in the London Quarterly for April, 1818; it was not until more than two years later—in the Edinburgh Review for August, 1820—that the great critic of the "opposite faction," Francis Jeffrey, introduced the productions of Keats to his portion of the reading public. Of this "tardy justice" Christopher North complains to the Shepherd in Noctes Ambrosianæ for December, 1828:

"My brother [reviewer] praised Keats, it is true, but somewhat tardily, and with no discrimination; and, to this hour, he has taken no notice of his Lamia and Isabella, in which Keats's genius is seen to the best advantage; while, from the utter silence observed towards him in general, it is plain enough that he cares nothing for him, and that it is not unjust or unfair to suspect the insertion of the article on Endymion was brought about by a Cockney job of Hunt or Hazlitt's."

Jeffrey may have praised without discrimination, perhaps,—this is a matter of taste between critics,—but he certainly praised heartily.

"It [Endymion] is, in truth, at least as full of genius as of absurdity: and he who does not find a great deal in it to admire and to give delight cannot in heart see much beauty in the two exquisite dramas to which we have already alluded, [The Faithful Shepherdess of Fletcher, and The Sad Shepherd of Ben Jonson,] or find any great pleasure in some of the finest creations of Milton and Shakespeare. . . . We are very much inclined, indeed, to add, that we do not know any book which we would sooner employ as a test to ascertain whether any one had in him a native relish for poetry and a genuine sensibility to its intrinsic charm."

Of the second volume—Lamia, Isabella, The Eve of St. Agnes, and other Poems—the critic speaks in at least as high terms, with the exception of some comments on Hyperion, which exception it was, we presume, that irritated the amiable Christopher,—himself a terrible scourger when a poor songster did not suit his critical and somewhat fastidious ear. And yet we can see nothing at all smacking of severity in Jeffrey's few lines on Hyperion:

"There is a fragment of a projected Epic, entitled Hyperion, on the expulsion of Saturn and the Titanian deities by Jupiter and his younger adherents, of which we cannot advise the completion; for, though there are passages of some force and grandeur, it is sufficiently obvious, from the specimen before us, that the subject is too far removed from all the sources of human interest, to be successfully treated by any modern author. Mr. Keats has unquestionably a very beautiful imagination, a perfect ear for harmony, and a great familiarity with the finest diction of English poetry; but he must learn not to misuse or misapply these advantages, and neither to waste the good gifts of Nature and study on intractable themes, nor to luxuriate too recklessly on such as are more suitable."

The review from which we have just quoted is one of those which Lord Jeffrey selected for republication in his Contributions to the Edinburgh Review. To the article thus reprinted twenty-three years after its first publication his lordship appends the following note:

"I still think that a poet of great power and promise was lost to us by the premature death of Keats in the twenty-fifth year of his age, and regret that I did not go more largely into the exposition of his merits in the slight notice of them which I now venture to reprint. But though I cannot, with propriety, or without departing from the principle which must govern this republication, now supply this omission, I hope to be forgiven for having added a page or two to the citations by which my opinion of these merits was then illustrated and is again left to the judgment of the reader." —Ed. Lon., 1853, 526–534.

Lord Byron seems to have agreed with Jeffrey's disapprobation of Keats's choice of mythological dramatis personæ, but to have entertained a higher opinion of the merits of Hyperion:

"I think he took the wrong line as a poet, and was spoiled by Cockneyfying and suburbing, and versifying Tooke's Pantheon and Lempriere's Dictionary. . . . His fragment of Hyperion seems actually inspired by the Titans, and is as sublime as Æschylus. He is a loss to our literature; and the more so, as he himself, before his death, is said to have been persuaded that he had not taken the right line, and was reforming his style upon the more classical models of the language. . . . His Hyperion is a fine monument, and will keep his name."—Moore's Life of Byron.

Mr. Moir remarks of Endymion and two of its successors:

"It would be difficult to point out anywhere a work more remarkable for its amount of beauties and blemishes inextricably intertwined. Its mythology is Greek, and its imagery the sylvan-pastoral,—reminding us now of the pine-flavoured Idyllia of Theocritus, and now of the 'leaky bourne and bushy dell' of Milton's Comus. . . . His two latest were also his two most perfect compositions, yet completely opposite in their character.—The Eve of St. Agnes, of the most florid Gothic, remarkable for its sensuous beauty, and Hyperion, a fragment equally remarkable for its Greek severity and antique solemnity of outline."—Sketches of the Poet. Lit. of the Past Half-Century.

We may add that, of Keats's minor poems, perhaps the most admired are Lines written on Chapman's Homer, The Ode to a Nightingale, The Ode to a Grecian Urn, and the Ode to Autumn. Mr. Landor, comparing Chaucer, Burns, and Keats, does not hesitate to declare, after a brief review of the characteristics of the two former,

"Keats, in his Endymion, is richer in imagery than either; and there are passages in which no poet has arrived at the same excellence on the same ground. Time alone was wanting to complete a poet who already far surpassed all his contemporaries in this country in the poet's most noble attributes."

Mr. De Quincey censures the poem so highly lauded by Landor as warmly as he praises its successor:

"The Endymion displays absolutely the most shocking revolt against good sense and just feeling that all literature does now or ever can furnish. The Hyperion, as Mr. Gilfillan truly says, 'is the greatest of poetical torsos.' The first belongs essentially to the vilest collections of wax-work flagrec or gilt gingerbread. The other presents the majesty, the austere beauty, and the simplicity, of Grecian temples enriched with Grecian sculpture."—Essays on the Poets, &c.; John Keats.

Mr. Howitt—but, alas! we find, on casting our eyes over what we have already written, that we must conclude our article just as we are fairly launched upon a pleasant ocean of criticism. He, therefore, who wishes to dive more deeply into the theme, must trust to his own pilotage, which will be materially aided by following the subjoined chart, which we offer to his acceptance. Mr. Keble was joint editor, with Dr. Pusey and others, of the Bibliotheca Patrum Ecclesiæ Catholicæ, the publication of which began in 1838, a contributor, as we have seen, to the famous (Oxford) Tracts for the Times, and to the Lyra Apostolica, and the author of a much-lauded article in the 32d vol. of the London Quarterly Review, (211-252,) on Sacred Poetry. The periodical just named accorded a hearty welcome to Mr. Keble's Christian Year, one of the most popular vols. of religious poetry which has appeared in the English language.

"In this volume," says the enthusiastic reviewer, "old Herbert would have recognised a kindred spirit, and Walton would have gone on a pilgrimage to make acquaintance with the author."—Vol. xxxviii. 48, July, 1828.

The critic, however, does not fail to notice as a fault that,

"While it pursues the spirit, it is to our taste, too disdainful of the forms, of poetry: it is contented to lead us through a succession of soft and agreeable images, obscurely, if at all connected, while we are sometimes at a loss for the general scope and object of the poem."—Ibid., q. v.

See also a review of The Christian Year, Lyra Innocentium, and the Psalter in English Verse, in the London Quarterly Review for June, 1846; notices of the Christian Year in Blackwood's Magazine, xxiv. 928, xxvii. 837; N. The first American edit. of The Christian Year contains a Preface by the author's friend, Bishop Doane, of New Jersey, and a number of sacred poems selected by the bishop from the productions of the late Rev. William Croswell, of Boston, Massachusetts. Of the many enthusiastic eulogies which have been so freely lavished upon The Christian Year, we doubt if there have been any more gratifying to the author than the eloquent commendation of Professor Wilson, from which we can give only a brief extract:

"These and many other thoughts and feelings concerning the 'Vision and the Faculty divine,' when employed on divine subjects, have arisen in our hearts, on reading—which we have often done with delight—The Christian Year, so full of Christian poetry of the purest character. Mr. Keble is a poet whom Cowper himself would have loved; for in him piety inspires genius, and fancy and feeling are edunitalised by religion. We peruse his book in a tone and temper of spirit similar to that which is breathed on us by some calm day in spring, when

'Heaven and earth do make one imagery,' and all that imagery is serene and still—cheerful in the main, yet with a touch and tinge of melancholy which makes all the blended hues and beauty at once more endearing and profound. We should be more inclined to criticising such poetry than of criticising the clear blue skies, the soft green earth, the 'liquid lapse' of an unpolluted stream, that

'Doth make sweet music with the enamell'd stones,
Giving a gentle kiss to every flower
It courteseth on its pilgrimage.'

"Beauty is there,—purity and peace; as we look and listen we partake of the universal calm, and feel in nature the presence of Him from whom it emanated."—Recreations of Christopher North, Sacred Poetry; and in Blackwood's Magazine, xxvii. 637, June, 1830.

The Preface to his Fairy Mythology, and that to his Life of Milton, recently published, are certainly among the most curious chapters of literary history with which our researches have made us acquainted.

Kemble, Charles, 1775–1854, youngest son of Roger Kemble, brother of John Philip Kemble, and father of Mrs. Frances Anne Kemble, Adelaide Kemble, and John Mitchell Kemble, was distinguished as an actor, admired as a gentleman and a scholar, and has some claims to the honours of authorship. 1. The Point of Honour; a Play, Lon., 1800, 8vo. An adaptation of Mercier's Desertour. 2. The Wanderer, or The Rights of Hospitality; an Historical Drama, 1808, 8vo. An adaptation of Kotzebue's Edouard in Schottland. 3. Plot and Counterplot; a Farce, 1808, 8vo. An adaptation of Dieulafoy's Le Portrait de Michel Cervantes. These three pieces were successful. 4. Kamschatka, or The Slave's Tribute; a Drama, 1811. From the German of Kotzebue. Not successful. 5. The Child of Chance; a Farce, 1812. Original. Not successful. 6. The Brazen Bust; a Melo-Drama, 1813. From the French. Not successful. An interesting biographical notice of Mr. Kemble will be found in the Lon. Gent. Mag., Jan. 1855. See also Biog. Dramat. and the following articles.

Kemble, Frances Anne, celebrated both as an actress and as a poetess, is the eldest of the two daughters of the preceding, and was born in London, about 1811. In a preceding article (Gregory, David, p. 736) we have designated the family of Gregory as the most illustrious in the annals of British science: the Kembles may claim the same pre-eminence in the history of dramatic art, as the following list of members of the family who have trod the boards in the walk of Tragedy or Comedy, or both, amply testifies.

"Sir," said Charles Macklin, when nearly one hundred years old, addressing John Philip Kemble, "I have known your family from generation to generation. I have seen you act, young man; and I have seen your father, sir; and I have seen your grandfather, sir. Sir, he was a great actor."

Commencing then with this "great actor," we have—1. Fanny Kemble's great-grandfather. 2. Her grandfather, Roger Kemble, 1721–1802. 3. Her grandmother, Sarah Kemble, 1735–1806. 4. Her father, Charles Kemble, 1775–1854. 5. Her mother, Marie Therese Kemble, 1774–1838. 6. Her uncle, John Philip Kemble, 1757–1823. 7. Her uncle, George Stephen Kemble, 1758–1822. 8. Her uncle's wife, Mrs. George Stephen Kemble. 9. Her aunt, Sarah Kemble, afterwards Mrs. Siddons, 1755–1831. 10. Her aunt, Frances Kemble, afterwards Mrs. Twiss, 1759–1812. 11. Her aunt, Elizabeth Kemble, afterwards Mrs. Whitlock, 1761–1836. 12. Her cousin, Henry Siddons, a son of Mrs. Sarah Siddons. 13. Her cousin's wife, Mrs. Henry Siddons. Nor is it in the dramatic art alone that the family have acquired eminence. Fanny Kemble's youngest sister, Miss Adelaide Kemble, now Mrs. Sartoris, in early life gained great celebrity as an operatic singer; and the only brother of these ladies, John Mitchell Kemble, late of Trinity College, Cambridge, stands in the front rank of the learned men who have called the attention of the world to the treasures of Anglo-Saxon literature.

Fanny Kemble made her first appearance on the stage, in the character of Juliet, on the 5th of October, 1829. In 1834, during a visit to America, she was married to Mr. Pierce Butler, of Philadelphia, from whom she was divorced in 1849. For a number of years past, she has from time to time delighted large audiences in England and America by her Shakspeare Readings, by which many the most striking beauties of the immortal bard have been familiarized to the public mind,—thus happily instructed without that liability to injurious influences which seems inseparable from the actual drama of the present day. It does not, of course, enter within the scope of our work to consider this lady in that artistic capacity which first conferred upon her name a dramatic celebrity unequalled since the palmy days of her aunt, Mrs. Sarah Siddons,—the delight of the two preceding generations of wits and literary men,—whom the gruff Johnson complimented in his youth, and the courtly author of Waverley toasted in his old age. We pass on, then, as becomes our vocation, to the contemplation of Fanny Kemble the author, whilst those who desire to first learn the opinion of critics respecting Fanny Kemble the actress can refer to Mrs. Jameson's Female Characters of Shakspeare's Plays, in her Characteristics of Women; Sir Walter Scott's Diary, June 17, 1830, in Lockhart's Life of Scott; Sir T. Noon Talfourd's Miscellaneous Writings, (originally pub. in the New Monthly Magazine;) Sir Archibald Alison's Essays, Polit., Histor. and Miscell., Edin. and Lon., 1850, iii. 576–579, (originally pub. in the Dublin Univ. Mag., Dec. 1846;) Noctes Ambrosianæ,—Christopher North and others,—Aug. 1830 and Nov. 1832, in Blackwood's Mag., xxviii. 401, xxxii. 860. See also Blackwood's Mag., xxvii. 47, 112, xxxi. 677; Judge Story's Life and Letters, Bost., 1851, ii. 114, 117; the Court Journal, and other periodicals, for 1829, &c. We proceed to notice briefly Mrs. Kemble's publications.

1. Francis the First; an Historical Drama, Lon., 1832, 8vo. This was written when the authoress was not more than seventeen.

"The most extraordinary work which has ever been produced by a female at her age. . . . It is unquestionably a remarkable phenomenon that a youthful poetess, however nurtured in Shakspeare, should begin her dramatic career in placing her main strength in the vigorous delineation of historic character. In this respect there is certainly no dramatic author of the present day who might not be proud to own the Francis the First of Miss Kemble."—Lon. Quar. Rev., March, 1832, xlvii 245–246, 261, q. v.

"It will be allowed by all that there is great grasp of intellect—extraordinary, indeed, in so young a person—shown in the handling of a historical subject of such magnitude and variety, and in moulding somewhat complicated materials, necessarily of a difficult management, into cohesive and consistent form."—Blackwood's Mag. April, 1832, xxxi. 691

Read this sprightly article, (though written by an old man,) which contains some interesting reminiscences of the Kemble family.

"That it will be successful—permanently successful—is impossible: it wants concentration, there are effective scenes and clever scenes, but they have no connecting interest."—Lon. Athenæum, 1832, 170.

See also Lon. Month. Rev., cxxvii. 524, Amer. Month. Rev., iii. 473.

Francis the First met with great favour from the reading public, and at least ten edits. have been issued.

2. Journal of Frances Anne Butler, Phila., 1835, 2 vols. 12mo; Lon., 1835, 2 vols. p. 8vo. In this Journal we have an account of Miss Kemble's travels in the United States. It was reviewed with great severity both at home and abroad. The London Quarterly Review commences its critique by remarking,

"This is a work of very considerable talent, but both in its conception and execution, of exceeding bad taste."—Vol. liv. 39.

And the Athenæum says that

"The authoress of this lamentable Journal possessed a name which she had no right to abuse. We question whether the triple-headed Chancellor would not have granted an injunction to restrain the utterance of such a work as the present by a Kemble.—1835, 404.

In America the Journal was reviewed by Alexander H. Everett, in the North American Review, July, 1835, vol. xli. 109–144, with more indulgence than it received at home. Another review appeared in the Southern Literary Messenger, vol. i. 524. As we have quoted some adverse opinions on the Journal, it is only proper to give a line or two on the other side:

"Read Mrs. Butler's (Fanny Kemble's) Diary. It is much better than the reviews and papers will allow it to be. What is called vulgarity is useful and natural contempt for the excitable and superficial."—Rev. Sydney Smith to Sir Wilmot Horton, Bart., 1835; Memoir of the Rev. Sydney Smith.

In her last volume—A Year of Consolation—Mrs. Kemble has seen fit to criticize some portions of her Journal, and to these apologetic comments we must refer the reader.

3 The Star of Seville; a Drama, 1837, 8vo

"The Star of Seville is a dramatic poem, full of poetical beauties, strongly marked with originality, not of character, but of thought, tinted with imitations of the style of the old writers,— . . . the whole, distinguishing the writer as one capable of accomplishing a dramatic work not unworthy the regard of those who know the value of Massinger and Ford."—Lon. Athen., 1837, 258.

"Though Francis the First is better adapted to the stage, it is not stamped with the same originality, nor does it contain so many striking passages, as The Star of Seville."—Bethune's British Female Poets, Phila.

See also Fraser's Mag., xvi. 186.

4. Poems, Phila., 1844, 12mo; Lon., 1844, 12mo; 1844, 2 18mo; 1844, 24mo; 1849, 24mo.

"More than once we have had occasion to express admiration of Mrs. Butler's various and vigorous ability; but we own that the present volume, though including no piece of considerable length or in any ambitious form, has raised our estimate of her as a poetess. She has never written so simply or so strongly. Never before has she dealt so boldly with the realities of life, and yet never before, in our judgment, did she display an equal richness of imaginative power."—J. G. Lockhart: Lon. Quar. Rev., March, 1843, lxxi. 555.

Read the whole of this enthusiastic eulogy, which is not chilled by a word of censure or even qualification.

But the eminent critic next to be quoted is, if possible, more ardent in his admiration of Mrs. Kemble's poetry:

"If we would appreciate Mrs. Kemble's genius in its full dimensions,—if we would see what she was from the hands of Nature, and conceive what she might have become in her profession by the aid of steady effort and persevering energy,—we must study her poetry. In that department there is some room for unqualified admiration. Some of her sonnets will bear a comparison with the finest lyrical poetry in the English language,—with Moore's Melodies, Gray's Ode to Spring, or Heinans's Graves of a Household. . . . It is in painting the human heart—in unfolding by a few touches its inmost feelings, most secret thoughts—that the highest powers of poetry are shown. Miss Kemble may justly claim a very high place in this elevated style, the intensity of her thoughts, the vehemence of her affections, could find vent only in

'Thoughts that breathe and words that burn.' . . .

"After these extracts, it need not be said that Miss Kemble's poetical genius is of the very highest class, and that if she persevere in that brilliant career, and supersede learning and contemplation to her creative and imaginative powers, she will become one of the greatest lyric poets of England."—Sir Archibald Alison: Essays, Lon. and Edin., 1850, iii. 579, 581, 582.

Mr Rowton expresses the same opinion:

"I believe that in the course of a few years, when time shall have softened down the perhaps too vividly painted lines of her mental character and shall have corrected her hasty estimate of the world and of humanity, Mrs Butler will rank with the foremost poets of our land."—The Female Poets of Great Britain, Lon., 1848, 477–478

"Her versification is very bold and vigorous, and her rhythm is often melodious beyond any other writer of equal strength. Her sonnets, especially when she forgets herself, are among the finest in our language; and it is easy to see that, if a more comprehensive future uplifted her thoughts, those of a personal character would be closely allied to some of Milton's. As it is, she is nobly disdainful of all mawkishness or artificial conceit. She clothes in her manly idea with an honest earnestness which one can scarcely help believing is a principal trait of her character."—Bethune's British Female Poets.

"It is evident to us that Mrs Butler is indebted to Dante, as well as to Shakspeare and Milton, for the tone and temper of her poetic development. The volume before us strangely and strongly reminds us of the stern, severe, and comely touch which marks the lyrical and occasional verse of the great Italian lord. . . . There is a masculine strength and vigour in her verses, not a little remarkable when men are proud to write effeminately so delicately do they go so softly do they tread, like the Hebrew ladies of old, when they affect the poetic character. . . . The poems before us are lyrical, descriptive, and didactic with some few sonnets, but are all alike distinguished by an earnestness of purpose and energy of style."—Lon. Athen. 1844 787, 712.

See also N. York Ecice. Mag., v. 104; Democrat. Rev., xv. 567. Mr Alexander H Everett, one of the most accomplished critics of his age, evidently accepted the beautiful poem entitled Autumn, which first appeared in Mrs. Butler's Journal, as a pledge of future poetical excellence of no ordinary rank, (see North American Review, July, 1835,) nine years before the appearance of the volume to which the preceding extracts refer. Some comments upon her poetry will be found in the London Quarterly Review, September, 1847, in a review of

5. A Year of Consolation, 1847, 2 vols p. 8vo. This work is descriptive of Mrs. Kemble's tour through France to Rome, and of a residence in the latter city whilst on a visit to her sister, Mrs. Adelaide Sartoris.

"We know no other tourist who has so lovingly and picturesquely done justice to the natural beauty round about Rome; and therefore have expatiated perhaps disproportionately on what may be called the peculiar and principal grace and beauty of the book."—Lon. Athen., 1847, 435. See also p. 409.

"Her eye is headed in scene and dramatic effect, seizes differences at once, whether in mood or character, colour or costume. Fresh from the model republic, she has little reserve, and less respect for settled facts, forms, and persons: to her all the world is a stage, and she speaks out pleasantly, be the galanti-show in St. Peter's and the Pope himself but fiddler."—Lon. Quar. Rev., Sept. 1847, lxxxi 469.

This article—the most elaborate review of The Year of Consolation which has appeared, and which includes also a notice of Edmund Lear's Illustrated Excursions in Italy, 1847, 2 vols. fol.—should be read by all who have entered, and by all who expect to enter, the gates of the Eternal City. All of the critics unite in applauding Mrs. Kemble's descriptive powers —

"A Year of Consolation, though rather forced, and very remote, is animated and effective. The descriptions of external nature are often pictures of a very striking kind, bringing the characteristics of the things visibly before the reader."—Lon. Spectator.

To the same effect speaks one of the last travellers to Rome, who has favoured the world with the results of his observations:

"The great merit of the work consists in the admirable descriptions of scenery and nature which it contains. Her means of knowing—of the beauty of color especially—is very keen: and in conveying impressions to her reader she uses language with uncommon skill. A single expression, or even word, dashed with an apparently careless hand upon the canvas, produces a fine effect. She speaks of 'a milky-looking mountain,' of 'the unhesitating white' of Italian daisies; and, again, of 'wide-eyed daisies,' of 'a rusty donkey,'—a very happy though very obvious epithet,—and of 'snow-white drifts of hawthorn.' Her illustrations have sometimes the quaintness of Cowley; as when she compares the arches of an aqueduct to the vertebræ of some great serpent, whose marrow was the living water of which Rome drank for centuries; or the sky, seen through a window of the ruined Villa Mondragone, to a sparkling blue eye through the sockets of a skeleton."—Six Months in Italy, by George Stillman Hillard, 1st ed., 1853, Bost., 2 vols. 12mo.

Another notice of A Year of Consolation will be found in the Westminster Review, xlvii. 399. Other notices respecting Mrs. Kemble, whose genius, exemplary character, and various accomplishments have gained her "troops of friends" on both sides of the Atlantic, will be found in Fraser's Mag., xli. 327; Bost. Living Age, xx. 350.

Those of our readers who shall profit by the advice we have given them, and refer to some of the many notices of Mrs. Kemble's works indicated in the course of this article, will occasionally find statements and speculations relative to this accomplished lady's personal history for the last twenty years, and may consider the absence of all such allusions here an omission which requires some explanation. We must confess that we are not careful to answer in this matter. When we determined to treat of the works of the living in the present volume, we resolved at the same time to know them only as authors,—not as husbands and wives, not as members of society, not even as men and women: we recognise our dramatis personæ as intellectual abstractions only, and allow them the same liberty of classification in other relations as Hamlet, whilst yet in awe-struck ignorance, accorded to the spectral representative of the "majesty of buried Denmark." As we can hardly expect that each debatable question connected with religion, politics or literature, public policy or domestic grievance, will have a separate Biographical Dictionary to espouse its cause, we have felt it a duty to fairly represent all, and to be neither the champion nor the detractor of any. Permitted temporarily to occupy a position in the great Court of Literary Jurisprudence, we strive continually to bear in mind that that position is neither the office of the advocate who pleads, the judge who determines, nor the jury who decides, but rather that of the reporter who records the law or the clerk who registers the verdict. To express acquiescence, however, in that which is quoted on the authority of others, especially where no vexed points of controversy are involved, may be permitted to the humblest annotator; and, to return to our subject after rather prolix digression, we have much pleasure in expressing our hearty concurrence in the following eloquent eulogium of Mrs. Kemble by one of the most eminent critics of the age. Referring to that tone of sadness so observable in much of her poetry, Sir Archibald Alison remarks,

"Let her not rest in the mournful belief that she is alone in the world,—that no one sympathizes with, no one reverences her. It is often the melancholy fate of genius to be solitary so far as companionship goes. The highest mountains stand alone in their vastness. But she can never be alone, if the sympathy of minds is considered. She has struck a chord which will forever vibrate in the human heart: she will be united in thought, in every age, with the generous, the brave, the high-minded: and thousands who, like the author, know her only by the exquisite conceptions she has given to the world, will ever feel towards her the admiration of genius and almost the affection of friendship."—Essays, 1850, iii. 582.

"SONNET,

"ON MRS. KEMBLE'S READINGS FROM SHAKSPEARE.

"O precious evenings! all too swiftly sped!
Leaving us heirs to amplest heritages
Of all the best thoughts of the greatest sages,
And giving tongues unto the silent dead!
How our thoughts glow'd and trembled as she read,
Interpreting by tones the wondrous pages
Of the great poet who foreruns the ages,
Anticipating all that shall be said!
O happy Reader! having for thy text
The magic book whose Sibylline leaves have caught
The rarest essence of all human thought!
O happy Poet! by no critic vext!
How must thy listening spirit now rejoice
To be interpreted by such a voice!"

H. W. LONGFELLOW: Poems, Bost., 1857, vol. i. 339.

Kemble, George Stephen, 1758–1822, uncle of the preceding, and an actor of some repute, produced a dramatic piece (an alteration from a play of Heywood's) entitled The Northern Inn, a Farce, 1791. Not printed. See Biog. Dramat. In 1783, Mr. Kemble married the celebrated actress, Miss Satchell, afterwards generally known by the title of Mrs. Stephen Kemble.

Kemble, John Mitchell, b. 1807, only brother of Frances Anne Kemble, and one of the most eminent of Anglo-Saxon scholars, was educated at Trinity College, Cambridge. For his devotion to Anglo-Saxon literature he was greatly indebted to the master under whom he pursued his studies in Germany, the celebrated Professor Jacob Grimm. As an author, he is best known to the world by his excellent work entitled The Saxons in England: A History of the English Commonwealth until the Period of the Norman Conquest, Lon., 1848. 2 vols. 8vo; but antiquaries are not unacquainted with his learned publications of a more recondite character, the most important of which are editions of the Anglo-Saxon Poems of Beowulf, &c., 1833–37, 2 vols.; Codex Diplomaticus Ævi Saxonici, 1839–48, 6 vols. 8vo; The Anglo-Saxon Charters; The Vercelli Codex: Poetry of the Codex Vercellensis, Anglo-Saxon and Latin, with an English Trans., 1843; Dialogus of Salomon and Saturnius, with an English Trans., 1848; Twysden's Considerations upon the Government of England, 1849. For a number of years Mr. Kemble acted in the capacity of editor to the British and Foreign Quarterly Review: he now holds the office of Examiner of Plays under the Lord-Chancellor. A new work of his has appeared within the last few days, the title of which promises a rich repast to our historical "Oldbucks:"—State Papers and Correspondence, illustrative of the Political and Social State of Europe from the Revolution to the Accession of the House of Hanover. Edited, with Historical Introduction, Memoirs, and Notes, from originals hitherto unpublished, 1857, 8vo. See Lon. Gent. Mag., April, 1857, 439; London Athenæum, March 7, 1857. We have before us warm commendations of The Saxons in England, by the Westminster Review, Spectator, Inquirer, Critic, John Bull, Morning Chronicle, and Jerrold's News. From these we must content ourselves with one extract:

"In these volumes Mr. Kemble has given an admirable series of Essays illustrative of a most important period of our history. . . . The work will be found a comprehensive repertory of valuable information relating to the Saxons and the period during which they were possessors of the English soil: and what will be found to add to its value is the circumstance of the author having made himself especially familiar with Anglo-Saxon charters, and other documents of recent discovery throwing light upon that portion of English history, to which few previous writers appear to have had access."—Westminster Review.

Mr. De Vericour styles The Saxons in England "The best work, we believe, on the Anglo Saxon period."—Historical Analysis of Christian Civilization, Lon., 1850, 89.

When are we to be favoured with the continuation of this work which Mr. Kemble promises? The judicial proceedings, social condition, the arts, literature, and science, of these early days, will form a most valuable chapter of English history.

Since the above was written, this eminent scholar has ceased from his labours: he died March 26, 1857, of inflammation of the chest. He left unfinished the continuation of his Saxons in England, and a work on the Archæology of the Northern Nations, under the title of Horæ Feriales, which was to have been illustrated by numerous drawings from sketches by the author. Shortly before his death, he was commissioned by the Manchester Committee to form a Collection of Celtic and Anglo-Saxon Antiquities, as part of their forthcoming Exhibition of Art. Among his other unfinished projects was a new edition of the Anglo-Saxon Charters, which we hope will be undertaken by some competent scholar. See Lon. Gent. Mag., May, 1857; Lon. Athenæum, March 28, 1857.

Kemble, John Philip, 1757–1823, uncle of Frances Anne, Adelaide, and John Mitchell Kemble, and the most celebrated actor of his time, wrote Belisarius, a Tragedy, 1778, not printed; The Female Officer, a Farce, 1779, not printed; Lodoiska, an Opera, 1794, 8vo; altered 31 plays (principally Shakspeare's) for the stage; pub. an Essay on Macbeth and Richard III., 2d ed., 1817, 8vo; and a vol. of Fugitive Pieces, (Poems,) 1780, 8vo. The last vol. he endeavoured to suppress on the next day after publication. It has therefore become very rare, and copies have sold for £2 11*s.* and £3 5*s.* For further particulars respecting Mr. Kemble we must refer to a vol. already noticed by us,—his Life by James Boaden: see p. 211 of this Dictionary. See also Biog. Dramat.; Verses on Various Occasions, by John Taylor, 1795, 8vo; Boswell's Life of Johnson, and other biographies of the period; review of Boaden's Life of Kemble, by Sir Walter Scott, Lon. Quar. Rev., xxxiv. 197; Sir Archibald Alison's Essays, Edin. and Lon., 1850, iii. 565–567; and his History of Europe, 1815–52, chap. v.; Westminster Review, iii. 487.

"He was learned, a great antiquarian, and studied the dress, humour, and costume of the olden time with the most assiduous care."—SIR ARCHIBALD ALISON: Hist. of Europe, 1815–52, chap. v.

"We must cut short our history of Kemble as an actor, by brief mention of those Roman characters—Cato, Brutus, and Coriolanus—by means of which he transported us to the Capitol, as completely had he made the habits, manners, and mode of thinking of the ancients identically his own. They were, indeed, peculiarly suited to his noble and classical form, his dignified and stately gesture, his regulated yet commanding eloquence.

"'Pride in each port, defiance in each eye,
You saw the lords of human kind pass by.'"
Sir Walter Scott: Lon. Quar. Rev., xxxiv. 222.

Kemble, Mrs. Marie Therese, 1774–1838, the wife of Charles Kemble, and mother of Frances Anne, Adelaide, and John Mitchell Kemble, was a native of Vienna, and a daughter of George Louis De Camp, or, properly, De Fleury, a descendant of the ancient French house of that name. In 1806, this favourite actress became the wife of Charles Kemble. Mrs. Kemble was the author of First Faults, a Comedy, 1799, not printed: The Day after the Wedding, an Interlude, 1808, 8vo. There are also ascribed to her—Match-Making, a Comedy, 1808, not printed; Smiles and Tears, or The Widow's Stratagem, a Comedy, 1816. See Biog. Dramat.; Watt's Bibl. Brit.; Blackwood's Mag., xxxi. 677. It will be noticed that six of the Kemble family have been recorded in this volume as authors,—viz.: 1. Charles Kemble. 2. His daughter, Frances Anne Kemble. 3. His uncle, George Stephen Kemble. 4. His son, John Mitchell Kemble. 5. His uncle, John Philip Kemble. 6. His wife, Marie Thérèse Kemble.

Ken, Thomas, D.D., 1637–1710–11, a native of Berkhamstead, Hertfordshire, educated at Winchester School and New College, Oxford; Fellow of Winchester College, 1666; Rector of Brixton, Isle of Wight, and subsequently, in 1669, Preb. of Westminster; Chaplain to Lord Dartmouth, and afterwards to Charles II.; Bishop of Bath and Wells, 1684. He was one of the seven bishops committed to the Tower for disobedience by James II., but proved his loyalty by refusing to take the oaths to William and Mary, and was therefore deprived of his bishopric. He was a man of devoted piety, expansive benevolence, and great tenderness of spirit:

"His intellect was indeed darkened by many superstitions and prejudices; but his moral character, when impartially reviewed, sustains a comparison with any in ecclesiastical history, and seems to approach as near as human infirmity permits to the ideal perfection of Christian virtue."—T. B. Macaulay: Hist. of England, vol. i., 1848. See also vols. iii. and iv., 1855.

It is natural to remark, in reference to the above citation, that a wide difference will always exist in the minds of men as to what may be properly denominated "superstitions and prejudices" in matters of religion. See references at end of this article. As an author, this excellent man is known by a number of sermons, theolog. treatises, manuals of devotion, and poetical compositions, among which are some greatly-admired hymns, still to be found in collections suited to public and private worship:

"Bishop Ken's morning and evening hymns are admirable, and may be found in most collections of devotional poetry."—Lowndes's Brit. Lib., 431

"The simple and touching devoutness of many of Bishop Ken's lyrical effusions has been disregarded, because of the ungraceful contrivances and heavy movement of his narrative."—Rev. John Keble: Sacred Poetry in Lon. Quar. Rev., xxxii. 217.

The bishop's poetical works were pub., Lon., 1721, 4 vols. 8vo, accompanied by two of his sermons, and a Life of the author by W. Hawkins, Esq., his great-nephew and executor. Hawkins's Life of Bishop Ken had been previously pub. in 1713, 8vo. A collective ed. of his Prose Works, with some of his letters, (never before pub.,) collected by J. T. Round, with Life by W. Hawkins, appeared in 1838, 8vo; 1853, 8vo. Of separate works, there have been recent eds. of:—1. Poems, Devotional and Didactic, 18mo. 2. Manual of Prayers, 1828, 12mo; 1840, 18mo.

We have already noticed the English trans. of Olshausen's Commentaries (pub. in Clark's Edinburgh Foreign Theol. Lib.) in our article on THOMAS BROWN, p. 260 of this Dictionary. That translation is the basis of the present edition, but it has been thoroughly revised and greatly improved by the critical labours of Professor Kendrick. He has also translated the Greek words and phrases which occur in the text, and added a few brief notes when the expositions of the author seemed to demand animadversion. The treatise of Olshausen on the genuineness of the writings of the New Testament translated by Mr. Fosdick is prefixed to this edition. It will form a most valuable addition to the American Theological Library. See JUDSON, Mrs. EMILY C.

Kennedy, John. Serm., Ephes. iii. 8, s. a.

Kennedy, John Pendleton, equally distinguished in the controversies of politics and the amenities of letters, was born in Baltimore, Oct. 25, 1795, and graduated at the college of his native city in 1812. Admitted to the practice of the law in 1816, he soon gave evidence of that aptitude for public business and power of influencing other minds which in America is an almost certain guarantee of political distinction. In 1820, 1821, and 1822, he was elected to the House of Delegates of Maryland; in 1838, 1841, and 1843, was sent to the House of Representatives at Washington; and in 1846 again entered the Maryland House of Delegates, and officiated as Speaker. In Congress he exercised great influence over his party, and his political papers and reports carried this influence beyond the sound of his voice. The best-known of these productions is A Defence of the Whigs, &c., pub in 1844. Mr. Kennedy's public services were honourably closed (at least for a season) in 1852, under the Fillmore administration, by his appointment to the post of Secretary of the Navy of the United States. In this chair he had been preceded by two distinguished literary brethren,—James K. Paulding and George Bancroft. We should not omit to notice that in 1849 Mr. Kennedy was chosen Provost of the University of Maryland. He is also Vice-President of the Historical Society of Maryland.

We have now to consider the watchful public guardian of the material interests of the people in his capacity of censor for their intellectual gratification. Mr. Kennedy commenced authorship in 1818, by the publication, in conjunction with Peter Hoffman Cruse, of (1) The Red Book, a series of miscellaneous papers in prose and verse, issued in Baltimore about every fortnight. These (continued through 1818 and '19) were subsequently collected into two vols. Kennedy's other publications were as follows: 2. Swallow Barn; or, A Sojourn in the Old Dominion, 1832. This work, consisting of a number of sketches of Virginia life and manners, was very favourably reviewed by Edward Everett in the North American Review for April, 1833, vol. xxxvi. 519-544. See also South. Quar. Rev., xxi. 71. 3. Horse-Shoe Robinson; a Tale of the Tory Ascendancy, 1835. The preceding work was very favourably received by the public, but Horse-Shoe Robinson seems to have met with even more success. It is an historical novel, dealing largely with the personal experiences of a soldier of the Revolution, whose title the book carries on its front. See South. Quar. Rev., xxii. 203. 4. Rab of the Bowl; a Legend of St. Inigoes, 1838. Here we have much historical matter connected with the religious troubles between the Roman Catholics and Protestants in Maryland in the days of Cecilius Calvert, Lord Baltimore. The three preceding works were republished in 3 vols., (uniform,) with revisions and illustrations, in 1852, by G. P. Putnam, of New York. 5. Annals of Quodlibet, 1840. This is a political satire upon some of the scenes in the Presidential canvas which resulted in the election of General Harrison. 6. Memoirs of the Life of William Wirt, Attorney-General of the United States, Phila., 1849, 2 vols. 8vo; 2d ed., revised, 1850, 2 vols. 12mo. In the preparation of this work, the author had the advantage of the whole of Mr. Wirt's papers, correspondence, diaries, &c. It throws light upon much of the political history of the times, and should be consulted by the historical student "In itself, the Memoir is not what the reading world calls interesting. There is no action and little incident. The letters are the best portion. . . . Mr. Kennedy has done what he had to do with zeal and ability. But the book is not likely to take much hold of English readers, from the absence of all stirring incident in the narrative."—Lon. Athenæum, 1850, 805–808.

Mr. Kennedy had, as early as 1834, delivered a Discourse on the Life and Character of his friend Mr. Wirt, Balt., 8vo. Among other of his minor publications are An Address delivered before the Baltimore Horticultural Society, in 1834, and A Discourse at the Dedication of Green Mount Cemetery, in 1839. He has contributed quite a number of articles to periodicals,—we suppose enough to fill several octavo volumes; and would that they were gathered into volumes! Will not the author see to this? For further information respecting this popular writer and his works, in addition to authorities above cited, see Homes of American Authors, N. York, 1853, 241-246; Amer. Whig Review, (with portrait,) xiii. 13; N. York Rev., x. 114; Amer. Month. Rev., ii. 255; South. Lit. Mess., i. 522; Internat. Mag., iv. 151. From the complimentary notices before us of Mr. Kennedy's works, we do not think we can make a better quotation than the following lines, which commence a review of Swallow Barn by one of the most eloquent orators and distinguished scholars of the age:

"This is a work of great merit and promise. It is attributed to a gentleman of Baltimore, already advantageously known to the public by several productions of less compass and in various styles, but all excellent in their respective ways. The present attempt proves that he combines, with the talent and spirit which he had previously exhibited, the resource, perseverance, and industry that are necessary to the accomplishment of extensive works. We do not know that we can better evince our friendly feeling for him than by expressing the wish that the success which this production has met with may induce him to withdraw his attention from other objects and devote himself entirely to the elegant pursuits of polite literature, for which his taste and talent are so well adapted, and in which the demand for labour—to borrow an expression from a science to which he is no stranger—is still more pressing than in law, political economy, or politics."—Edward Everett: N. Amer. Rev., xxxvi. 519-544, April, 1833.

This is one of the many instances in which Mr. Everett has evinced the foresight to discern, and the generosity to encourage, the early indications of that literary excellence of which he himself is so illustrious an example. We had not intended to add any thing to these lines; but it may be well to cite some opinions of a later date, to show that in the estimation of competent critics Mr. Kennedy has not

"Untrusted the promise of his spring."

"Mr. Kennedy is altogether one of our most genial, lively, and agreeable writers. His style is airy, easy, and graceful, but various, and always in keeping with his subject. He excels both as a describer and as a raconteur. His delineations of nature are picturesque and truthful, and his sketches of character are marked by unusual freedom and delicacy. He studies the periods which he attempts to illustrate with the great[est] care, becomes thoroughly imbued with their spirit, and writes of them with the enthusiasm and the apparent sincerity and earnestness of a contemporary and an actor. He pays an exemplary regard to the details of costume, manners, and opinion, and is scarce ever detected in any kind of anachronism. There are some inequalities in his works, arising perhaps from the interruptions to which a man in active public life is liable; there is occasional diffuseness and redundance of incident, as well as of expression; but his faults are upon the surface, and could be easily removed."—Griswold's Prose Writers of America, 4th ed., Phila., 1852, 345.

"Swallow Barn is an admirable delineation of Virginia life in the olden time. Another work by the same author, Horse Shoe Robinson, is of quite as much merit. Mr. Kennedy deserves a place in the front rank of American literature."—PRESIDENT KING, of Columbia College.

Kennett, Basil, D.D., 1674–1714–15, a native of Postling, Kent, younger brother to Bishop White Kennett, entered Corpus Christi College, Oxford, 1690, and became its President in 1714; Chaplain to the English Factory at Leghorn, 1706. His best-known works are—1. Romæ Antiquæ Notitia; or, The Antiquities of Rome, Lon., 1696, 8vo. Many edits.; the 13th in 1763, 8vo. Indeed, for nearly a century this was the standard school-book on the subject. It was superseded by Dr. Alexander Adam's work on the same subject, (1st ed., Edin., 1791, 8vo,) which in its turn has given way to manuals embodying the results of late investigations. 2. Kennett, White, D.D., 1660–1728, a native of Dover, England, entered of St. Edmund Hall, Oxford, 1678; Vicar of Amersden, Oxfordshire, 1684; Rector of Shottesbrook, Berkshire, 1693; minister of St. Botolph, Aldgate, London, 1699; Dean of Peterborough, 1707; Bishop of Peterborough, 1718. Bishop Kennett was a man of great learning, and a zealous antiquary. He was considered a high-churchman before the Revolution and a low-churchman after its occurrence. He pub. fifty-seven works,—principally single serms., tracts, letters, &c. His most important publications are: 1. Life of Mr. Somner, Oxf., 1693, 8vo. See Dibdin's Lib. Comp., ed. 1824, 162. 2. Parochial Antiquities of Oxon. and Bucks, 1695, 4to. A few specimens on large paper. Greatly enlarged from the author's MSS. Notes, 1818, 2 vols. 4to, £3 3s. Edited by the Rev. B. Bandinel, D.D.

"Will be duly valued as long as ecclesiastical history bears any repute amongst us."—Bp. Nicolson's Eng. Hist. Lib., ed. 1776, p. 8

3. Ecclesiastical Synods and Parliamentary Convocations of the Church of England historically and justly vindicated from the misrepresentations of Mr. [afterwards Bishop] Atterbury, Lon., 1701, 8vo. In answer to Atterbury's Rights, Powers, and Privileges of an English Convocation, 1700, '01, 8vo. See Nicolson, ubi supra, p. 135. Both writers pub. more upon this subject subsequently. 4. A Compleat Hist. of England, with the Lives of all the Kings and Queens thereof, from the earliest accounts of Time to the death of William III., 1706, 3 vols. fol.; 2d ed., enlarged and corrected, 1719, 3 vols. fol. The notes signed J. S. are said to be by John Strype. Vols. i. and ii. are a compilation from various authors of fourteen royal lives,—with Milton's Hist. of England, up to the Conquest, prefixed. These vols. are said to have been compiled by a Mr. Hughes, who also has the credit of having written the general Preface. Vol. iii. contains the lives of Charles I., Charles II., James II., and William III., "all writ by a new and impartial hand," supposed to be Kennett. This work—the 2d ed.—should be in every large historical library. The lives in vols. i. and ii. were written by Daniel, Habington, Sir Thomas More, Hall, Holinshed, Buck, Lord Bacon, Lord Herbert, Hayward, Hughes, Camden, and Arthur Wilson. The Compleat History was severely handled by Roger North (q. v.) in his Examen, 1740, 4to. 5. Serm. at the Funeral of the Duke of Devonshire, 1707, 8vo; with Memoirs of the Family of Cavendish, 1708, 8vo. New ed., 1797, 8vo. Nearly all the copies were destroyed by fire. This sermon gave great offence, was severely criticized by John Dunton in his Hazard of a Death-Bed Repentance, and satirized by Pope in his Imitations of Horace. 6. Bibliothecæ Americanæ Primordia; an Attempt towards laying the Foundation of an American Library, &c., 1713, 4to. Dr. Dibdin states (infra) that there was a reprint of this catalogue in 1791, but the Bibliotheca Americana to which he refers is another and a very inferior work. The collector of American books should secure Kennett's Bibliotheca when he can.

"This, as far as it goes, is the best catalogue of books relating to America extant, the titles being copied at full length with the greatest exactness, together with the name of the printer, and the number of pages in each volume. It unfortunately contains only the books given to the Society for Propagating the Gospel in Foreign Parts, by White Kennett, Bishop of Peterborough, and a few others, many of them not relating to America. It is, however, rich in English tracts relating to New England. The catalogue was drawn up by Bishop Kennett, but the very complete index, which occupies nearly half the volume, was formed by the Rev. Robert Watts."—Rich's Bibl. Amer. Nova, i. 21–22.

It is hardly necessary to say that Mr. Rich's invaluable Bibliotheca must accompany Kennett's. To sharpen the appetite of the collector, we extract a few lines from the Preface to the last-named work:

In this short catalogue will be found about twenty original tracts relating to Newfoundland; above fifty concerning Virginia; one hundred, or more, of New England; and so on in proportion to the other colonies."

Some of these tracts are supposed to be entirely lost. The collection itself has disappeared. Some years since a gentleman from New York essayed to find it, but a few scattered vestiges in one of the rooms of the Society at Lambeth were all that rewarded his bibliographical zeal. Dibdin remarks of the Bibliotheca,

"Both original and reprint [see above] are at this moment [1825] sticking on stalls at some two shillings each. The book is invaluable to a collector; and the spirit that is now abroad in America should lead some Bostonian, or New Yorkite, or Philadelphian, to bring the catalogue of publications down to the present time".—Lib. Comp., ed. 1825, 467.

We have already briefly referred, and shall hereafter more fully refer, (see RICH, OBADIAH,) to the services of Mr. Rich in the cause of American Bibliography; and we are induced by Dr. Dibdin's comments to hint at the fact that a gentleman of Philadelphia has been long engaged upon an enlarged catalogue raisonné of books relating to America. We ourselves, in the present volume, have, we hope, contributed something to this direction. See LUDEWIG, HERMANN E. 7. The Wisdom of Looking Backwards, &c., 1715, 8vo. This is a record of the speeches, writings, &c. of the preceding four years, and "fills up a gap in our literary history." But the design was more fully carried out in the work next noticed. 8. Register and Chronicle, Ecclesiastical and Civil, towards discovering and correcting the true History of England, from the Restoration of King Charles II., vol. i., 1728, fol.; 1741, fol. This work—which should be used as a sequel to Whitelock's Memorials and studied with Rushworth's Collections—is a diary of matters of fact "delivered in the words of the most authentic books, papers, and records."

"One of those astonishing labours which could only have been produced by the pleasure of study urged by the strong love of posterity."—Disraeli's Calamities of Authors, ed. 1840, 86.

The author calls it a "tedious, heavy book," and remarks, "The volume, too large, brings me no profit." So he gave it to his publisher, who, we presume, made as little on it as the author did. But it is from such contemporaneous records that all true history must be compiled. As regards the "astonishing labours" to which Disraeli refers, Kennett delighted in such toil. If any one doubt this, let him visit the Lansdowne department of the British Museum Library of MSS., from No. 933 to No. 1027, which were the good bishop's; and there is contained these cemeteries of knowledge much matter which he never communicated to the public. For further information respecting this learned antiquary, industrious annalist, and excellent prelate, see the Rev. Wm. Newton's Life of Bp. Kennett 1730, 8vo; Athen. Oxon.; Gent. Dict.; Biog. Brit.; Nichols's Literary Anec.; Gent. Mag., vol. lxxvi., &c.; Dibdin's Quarrels of Authors, 1840, 2:6. We must not omit to notice that in 1850 one Mr. S. F. Wood and Mr. Ed. Baddeley pub., for the author, (at that time,) from the author's MSS., a work of Bp. Kennett on Lay Impropriations.

Kennicott, Benjamin, D.D., 1718–1783, a native of Totnes, Devonshire, entered of Wadham College, Oxford, 1774; became Fellow of Exeter College, and subsequently Vicar of Culham, Oxfordshire; Radcliffe Librarian, 1767; Canon of Christ Church, 1770. He pub. two or three single sermons, some theolog. treatises, an ed. of the Hebrew Bible, and Accounts, &c. connected with the last. We notice the following publications: 1. On the Tree of Life in Paradise; a Crit. Dissert. on Gen. ii. 8–24, 1747, 8vo. 2. On the Oblation of Cain and Abel; a Crit. Dissert. on Gen. iv. 1–5, 1747, 8vo; 2d ed. of both printed together, Oxf., 1747, 8vo.

"The object of the first is to show that the tree of life was not an individual tree, but a species of tree which grew in Paradise, which he seems to make out satisfactorily. His design in the second is to prove that Cain's oblation was only a bread or thank offering; while Abel's was both that and a sacrifice or peace-offering."—Orme's Bibl. Bib.

3. The State of the Printed Text of the Old Testament Considered; a Dissert. in two Parts, 1753–59, 2 vols. 8vo. In Latin by W. A. Teller, Lips., 1756–64, 2 vols. 8vo. 4. Answer to T. Rutherforth's Letter, &c., [relative to No. 3,] Lon., 1762, 8vo. In these Disserts. the author proved the necessity of a revision of the Hebrew TEXT. See Bp. Marsh's Divinity Lectures, No. XI.; Orme's Bibl. Bib.; Horne's Bibl. Bib.; and authorities cited at conclusion of this article. A subscription of between nine and ten thousand pounds sterling was made to defray the expenses of the collation of MSS., printed eds. of the Old Testament, Jewish and early Christian writers, &c. The collation was vigorously carried on from 1760 to '69, and an annual Account was pub. by Dr. K. of the results. These ten Annual Accounts were pub. collectively, in one 8vo vol., in 1770, and should accompany the work to which they refer, which at last appeared, (5,) Vetus Testamentum Hebraicum, cum variis Lectionibus, Oxf., 1776, 2 vols. fol. This is the most splendid ed. of the Hebrew Scriptures ever published.

"The greatest and most important work that has been undertaken and accomplished since the revival of letters."—Bishop Lowth.

"Kennicott did not confine his collation to MS. and editions. He had recourse to the most distinguished among rabbinical writings, but particularly the Talmud (the text of which is as ancient as the third century."—Bishop Marsh.

For a particular account of this great work—for such, notwithstanding some errors and imperfections, it certainly is—we must refer the reader to authorities cited at conclusion of this article; also to Marsh's Divinity Lects., No. XI., Horne's Bibl. Bib.; Orme's Bibl. Bib.; Lowndes's Brit. Lib., 13–14; Dibdin's Lib. Comp., Lon. Month. Rev., O.S., lv. 92–100, lxiv. 173–182, 321–328, lxv. 121–131. Those who have Kennicott's Vetus Testamentum Hebraicum must add to it M. de Rossi's supplement, pub. at Parma,—Variæ Lectiones Veteris Testamenti, 1784–87, 4 vols. 4to, and Appendix, 1798. This work and Kennicott's ed. form one complete set of collations. An ed. of the Hebrew Bible, containing many of the most important of the readings in Kennicott's and De Rossi's vols., was pub. by Doederlein and Meissner, Leip., 1793; and a far better one by John, Vienna, 1806, 4 vols. 8vo. See BOOTHROYD, BENJAMIN, D.D., p. 249 of this Dictionary. Of Kennicott's ed. the learned Henry Owen declares,—

"It is a work which contains, with all the acknowledged defects, a vast treasure of Hebrew learning, which judiciously applied, will enable many to rectify and restore the Hebrew text than all the methods hitherto practised."

Kennicott's Dissertatio Generalis—or Prolegomena in fact—annexed to vol. ii. of his ed. of the Hebrew Bible, should be carefully studied by the divinity student.

"Though inquiries of this description unavoidably contain matters of doubtful disputation, though the opinions of Kennicott have been frequently questioned and sometimes justly questioned, his Dissertatio generalis is a work of great interest to every Biblical scholar. . . . The Dissertatio generalis, therefore, is the work which is always to be examined in the first instance by those who are desirous of obtaining information on any Hebrew manuscript which had been collated before 1770, when Kennicott's collation was closed."

Dr. Mason's non plus.

"Kennicott was a learned and most diligent scholar; but his fame must rest chiefly on his labours as a collector of Hebrew MSS. He does not now rank in the first line of Hebrew or Oriental scholars, and many of his criticisms in the above works [1, 2, 3, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10] have been disputed by writers of distinction."—Orme: ibid. ib.

We should add that the Dissertatio Generalis was printed separately at Oxford, 1780, fol., and at Brunswick by Prof. Reuss, (an associate in the collations,) 1783, 8vo.

"Kennicott's own Dissertation upon the state of the Hebrew text, (see N. 3,) with his annual accounts, are a mine of theological learning."—Dibdin's Lib. Comp.

6. Remarks on select Passages in the Old Testament. To which are add[ed] eight sermons, Lon., 1787, 8vo.

"Contain many useful hints."—Orme's Bibl. Bib.

See Lon. Month. Rev., O.S., lxxvii. 477–489. The author of so many criticisms could not hope to escape criticism himself; many publications in opposition to his expressed views on different points were put forth from time to time. Mr. Dyer, of Exeter, (or some person from whom he purchased,) took the pains to make a collection of these pieces, together with all of Kennicott's works; and a catalogue of the whole will be found in Dyer & Co.'s Catalogue of English Divinity for 1829. This collection should be in the Bodleian Library,—perhaps is by this time, (1857.) Further information respecting this learned critic and excellent man will be found in Nichols's Lit. Anec.; Jones's Life of Bishop Horne; Polwhele's Hist. of Devonshire; Lon. Gent. Mag., lix. 289; N. Amer. Rev., x. 9. The testimony of Dr. Kennicott, after his many years of labour in his abstruse studies, and the examination, by himself and his associates of above six hundred Hebrew MSS. and sixteen MSS. of the Samaritan Pentateuch, is the unequivocal character of these documents, is too valuable to be omitted. When he appeared himself before the king to present his great work, his majesty asked him, what, upon the whole, had been the result of his learned and laborious investigations? To this question Kennicott replied that he had found some grammatical errors, and many variations, in the different texts, but not one which in the smallest degree affected any article of faith or practice. To the same effect is the testimony of James Smith, of Jordan Hill:

"It may be satisfactory to those who look with suspicion upon the numerous various readings appended to critical editions, to know that, in that very considerable portion of the Gospels which I have copied, I have not been able to detect a shade of difference in the meaning, either doctrinal or historical. But the differences between the earlier and the later MSS., although unimportant as to the matter, are of great importance in an inquiry like the present, [Origin and Connection of the Gospels,] where so much depends upon verbal expression."

The new edit. will contain, among other additions, a Catalogue of the Fathers and Ecclesiastical Writers, with an accurate description of their genuine works as distinguished from others that have passed under their names. This edit., which will be in 3 vols. 8vo, will appear under the especial sanction of the Cardinal Archbishop of Malines, who has expressed a very favourable opinion of the work.

Kenrick, John. Serm., 1814.

Kenrick, John, a son of the late Rev. Timothy Kenrick, (post,) was classical tutor in the College of York until 1840, since which he has been Professor of History in the New College of Manchester. 1. Trans. of Zumpt's Latin Grammar; 5th ed., Lon., 1839, 8vo. 2. Abridgt. of do., 1839, 12mo. 3. Exercises on Latin Syntax; new ed., 1838, 8vo; adapted to No. 1. 4. Key to No. 3, 5th ed., 1842, 8vo. A review of Zumpt's Latin Grammar, by Professor Thomas Hewitt Key, will be found in No. 1 of the Journal of Education, pub. by the Society for the Diffusion of Useful Knowledge. 5. Greek Exercises. Pts. 1 and 2; 3d ed., 1839, each 12mo. A Key to each Pt. 6. Index to Quotations in Matthiæ's Greek Grammar; 2d ed., 1841, 8vo. 7. Essay on Primeval History, 1846, p. 8vo. 8. Ancient Egypt under the Pharaohs, Lon., 1850, 2 vols. 8vo. A review of this work, from the London Times, will be found in the New York International Magazine, ii. 322–326. Mr. Kenrick has given us reason to think that he will publish a work on Syria and Phœnicia. We beg to remind him that it is quite time it had appeared.

Since the above was prepared for the press, the vol. respecting which we were jogging Mr. Kenrick's memory has made its appearance, viz.: Phœnicia, by John Kenrick, M.A.; forming the new volume of his History of the Civilized Nations of Antiquity, in continuation of "Ancient Egypt under the Pharaohs," 1857, 8vo.

"Another very valuable contribution to the exact knowledge of ancient history, already enriched by his two volumes on Egypt under the Pharaohs, and by his admirable and philosophical Essay on Primeval History."—Lon. National Review.

Kenrick, Timothy, 1759–1804, father of the preceding, was for twenty years minister of a Unitarian congregation at Exeter, England. 1. Discourses on various Topics relating to Doctrine and Practice, 1805, 2 vols. 8vo. 2. Expos. of the Histor. Writings of the N. Testament, with Reflections; with Memoirs of the Author, Lon., 1809, 3 vols. 8vo.

"The character of the work is great plainness; the corrections and comments are in the true style of criticism."—Lon. Month. Review.

See Memoirs prefixed to this work, and Murch's Presbyterian Churches.

Kenrick, William, LL.D., d. 1779, a critic of equal ability, impudence, and literary ferocity, was for a long time—first in the Monthly and subsequently in the London Review—the terror of the new scribes, and the object of disgust to the old authors, of his own day. Goldsmith, Akenside, Johnson, Colman, Boswell, Garrick, and a host of others, were in turn made to suffer for having gained that popularity or notoriety which the public denied to him. We have already had something to say of this "Literary Ishmaelite" in our lives of Goldsmith (see p. 689) and Dr. Johnson, (see p. 976,) and have little to add in this place. His productions—consisting of poems, poetical epistles, philosophical and philological speculations, comedies, letters, &c., pub. from 1751 to 1773—are now forgotten, save in connexion with the better men whom he attacked; nor would the world be much benefited by a revival of this lost knowledge. But those who desire to explore further may consult the Monthly Review and (Kenrick's own child) the London Review; Gent. Mag.; Chalmers's Biog. Dict.; Boswell's Life of Johnson, and other literary records of the day, and the Encyc. Brit. His most ambitious publication was A New Dictionary of the English Language: to which is prefixed a Rhetorical Grammar, Lon., 1773, 4to. The Rhetorical Grammar was also pub. separately in 1784, 8vo.

"After him, [Elphinstone—Principles of the English Language,] Dr. Kenrick contributed a portion of improvement, by his Rhetorical Dictionary; but he has rendered his Dictionary extremely imperfect, by entirely omitting a great number of words of doubtful and difficult pronunciation,—those very words for which a Dictionary of this kind would naturally be consulted."—Pref. to Walker's Dictionary, 1st ed., Lon., 1791, 4to.

Dr. Noah Webster thus comments on the above criticism:

"Let it be noted that the same objection lies in full force against Sheridan, Walker, and Jones."—Pref. to Webster's Dictionary, 1st., Springfield, 1852, 4to.

"Dr. Kenrick," says Disraeli, "was a man of talents, who ran a race with the press, could criticize all the genius of the age faster than it was produced, could make his own malignity look like wit, and turn the wit of others into absurdity by placing it topsy-turvy. . . . The turn of his criticism, the airiness or the asperity of his sarcasm, the arrogance with which he treated some of our great authors, would prove very amusing, and serve to display a certain talent of criticism."—Calamities of Authors, ed. Lon., 1840, 109.

Washington Irving—referring to Kenrick's attack upon Goldsmith's Inquiry into the Present State of Polite Learning in Europe—remarks,

"It may be well, however, in passing, to bestow our mite of notoriety upon the miscreant who launched the slander. He deserves it for a long course of dastardly and venomous attacks, not merely upon Goldsmith, but upon most of the successful authors of the day."—Life of Goldsmith, ed. N. York, 1854, 128.

Mr. Macaulay takes care to introduce Kenrick into one of his piquant Newgate Calendars:

"There was no want of low minds and bad hearts to the generation which witnessed her [Madame D'Arblay's] first appearance. There was the envious Kenrick and the savage Wolcott, the ape George Steevens, and the polecat John Williams."—Crit. and Hist. Essays, Lon., 1854, iii. 308.

Let us see what the gruff Johnson thought of his assailant:

"Though he [Kenrick] certainly was not without considerable merit, he wrote with so little regard to decency, and principles, and decorum, and in so hasty a manner, that his reputation was neither extensive nor lasting. I remember one evening, when some of his works were mentioned, Dr. Goldsmith said he had never known [them; upon which Dr. Johnson observed, 'Sir, he is one of us many wh. have made themselves public without making themselves known."—Boswell's Life of Johnson, ed. Lon., 1848, 171.

Yet, after all the abuse which has been for three generations so profusely lavished upon Kenrick, he was, according to Johnson's own principles, a great benefactor to the unthankful authors whom he so ruthlessly impaled. It was, indeed, in reference to this very critic that Boswell tells us

"He [Johnson] remarked that attacks on authors did them much service. 'A man who tells me my play is very bad is less my enemy than he who lets it die in silence. A man whose business it is to be talked of is much helped by being attacked.'"—Ubi supra, 358.

We did not intend to make this article so long, but nothing is more natural than that an author who expects soon to place a huge Dictionary before the Argus-eyes of the critics, and who anticipates a large share of the belligerent philanthropy so warmly extolled by Dr. Johnson, should quote the lexicographer's encouraging dictum.

Kent, James, LL.D., July 31, 1763–Dec. 12, 1847, one of the most eminent of modern jurists, a native of Fredericks, Putnam county, New York, graduated at Yale College, 1781; commenced the practice of the law, 1785; elected a member of the New York State Assembly, 1790 and '92; Professor of Law at Columbia College in the city of New York, 1793–98; Master in Chancery, 1796; elected a member of the legislature from the city of New York, 1796; Recorder of the city, 1797; Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of New York, Feb. 6, 1798; Chief-Justice of the same court, July 2, 1804–Feb. 2., 1814; Chancellor of New York, Feb 2., 1814–July 31, 1823. On becoming a judge, Mr. Kent returned to Poughkeepsie, (where he had commenced the study of the law;) but in the following year he removed to Albany, where he continued to reside until 1823. Having at this date attained his sixtieth year, though in the very prime of intellectual (and in his case physical) life, he was obliged, by the most absurd provision of the Constitution of his State, to relinquish his office, and yield to some successor who, if he had the disadvantage of less wisdom and learning, had the redeeming merit of fewer years. We all remember Mr. Pitt's (or rather Dr. Johnson's) admission of the "atrocious crime of being a young man:" Chancellor Kent was obliged to plead guilty to the imputed criminality of having attained middle-age! But finding nature stronger than legislative enactments, and his euthanasia not hastened by the edict of senators, he added to his turpitude by living twenty-four years of mental and physical vigour and professional activity, and composing four volumes of immortal Commentaries. About twenty years after the Burial-Service of the New York Statute Book had been read over the late chancellor, he writes to Mr Webster,

"I am indeed in my eightieth year, but, thank God I am wonderfully well and active, and my ardour for reading and my susceptibilities, are, I think, as alive as ever to the charms of nature, of literature and society. . . . My reading is regular and constant; all the reports of law-decisions as fast as I can procure them all the periodicals, foreign and domestic, and old literature and new books, are steadily turned over."—New York, Dec 12, 1842, Private Correspondence of Daniel Webster, Bost., 1857, i. 161

What obstinate vitality!

In 1823, he again took up his residence in the city of New York, and consented to reassume the duties connected with the Law Professorship of Columbia College. The Lectures delivered by him in 1824 were, as may readily be supposed, upon a more comprehensive plan than those which had introduced him to the students who attended his first instructions in the lore of the bench and the forum. Of these last, the Introductory was pub. by the trustees, and in 1795 the lecturer pub. in a small vol. (Dissertations, &c.) three others delivered as preliminary to his Course. He also edited, in conjunction with Mr. Radcliffe, The Revised Laws of the State of New York, 1802, 2 vols. 8vo, (continued by Messrs. C. & G. Webster, in four supplemental vols.,) pub., in 1824, A Summary of the first ten Lectures of the Professor of Law in Columbia College; in 1828, an Anniversary Discourse before the New York Historical Society; in 1831, an Address before the Phi Beta Kappa Society at Yale College;—and in 1836, one before the Law Association of New York. In 1840, he drew up a Course of Reading for the benefit of the Mercantile Library Association of New York,—a useful little manual, of which a new ed., (if we should not, indeed, say a new work,) with additions by Charles King, LL.D., President of Columbia College, and Henry A. Oakley, editor, was pub. in 1853. A portion of his decisions as Chancellor—the cases and opinions selected by himself—will be found in the seven vols. of Johnson's Chancery Reports, 1814–23, already noticed: see Johnson, William, No. 3, p. 982. The character of these decisions is too well known to require any commendation in this place,—especially from a law; but a few lines of eulogy indited by eminent jurists will not be deemed impertinent:

"In his decisions we can everywhere trace the happy use of that marvellous system of doctrines which Justinian collected with so much care, and which stands unrivalled in the world for its general equity and nice adaptation to the necessities of mankind. . . . Let those who now doubt the importance of the study of the civil law to common lawyers read diligently the opinions of Mr Chancellor Kent, and they will find all the objections raised by indolence, and ignorance, and prejudice, practically refuted, and the civil law triumphantly sustained. They will perceive the vivid light which it casts on the paths of juridical science, and they will be instructed and cheered in the pursuit, though they may not hope to move in the brilliant career of such a judge with equal footsteps. . . . As to the Chancery decisions of Mr Chancellor Kent, they are as full of learning, and pains-taking research, and vivid discrimination, as those of any man that ever sat on the English woolsack."—Judge Story: Miscell. Writings, Bost., 1852, 150, 178; originally pub. in N. Amer. Rev., xi. 141-166 July, 1820.

Read this article, which contains a truly eloquent summary of the judicial character of Chancellor Kent. The latter expressed his acknowledgments to the writer in a letter dated August 7, 1820, which will be found in Story's Life and Letters, i. 377. In the words of another jurist, Kent's decisions are "more equally entitled to respect than those of any English chancellor since the American Revolution, with the single exception, perhaps, of Lord Eldon."—Judge Gibson: 3 Rawle, 130.

"I do not scruple to affirm that they form a series of unequalled excellence and to the equity lawyer of inestimable value: they are the most precious treasure his library contains. None who reflect on the nature and amount of instruction that those volumes supply, and on the method and style in which that instruction is conveyed, will be able to make the comparison will refuse to admit that there is no series of Reports in England or in the United States, that, in these distinctive points of a superior and permanent value, resemble or approach them."—James John Dyer: A Discourse on the Life, Character, and Public Services of James Kent, N. York, 1848, 60.

"His decisions must forever remain a monument of judicial wisdom, learning, and eloquence, without superiour in those of any country or any age."—Hoffman's Leg. Stu., 1836, 168.

"His researches on every point were so full as to leave little or nothing to be supplied by those who might afterwards wish to know his decisions ascertained or to test the correctness of his conclusions. . . . His judicial opinions are uncommonly interesting and instructive to all, but especially to those who have commenced the study of the law and aspire to eminence in that profession."—William Johnson, Reporter. Life of Chancellor Kent, in the National Portrait-Gallery of Distinguished Americans, 1852, vol. ii.

We may indeed claim for Chancellor Kent the honour of having erected the New York Court of Chancery. Judge Duer, after an exposition of the imperfect character of that court before 1814, continues:

"It is therefore not extravagant to say that, although, when he was appointed to the office of Chancellor, a Court of Chancery existed, yet a Court of Equity, in the true sense and full significance of the term was still to be created; and it was his peculiar glory that by his genius, his energy, and his labours during the nine years that he acted as Chancellor, this necessary Court, in all the amplitude of its just dimensions was created."—Discourse, &c., 55

"It required such a man, with such a mind, at once liberal, comprehensive, ex and methodical, always reverencing authorities and bound by decisions true to the spirit, yet never to the letter, of the law, pursuing principles with a severe and scrupulous logic, yet blending with them the most persuasive equity,—it required such a man, with such a mind, to unfold the doctrines of chancery in our country, and to settle them upon immovable foundations."—Judge Story: Miscell. Writings, 1852, 160, and in N. Amer. Rev., xi. 142, July, 1820.

For other opinions upon Kent's Decisions, consult the authorities at conclusion of article Johnson, William, (the Reporter,) p. 982. Kent's Commentaries upon American Law (dedicated to William Johnson, the Reporter) were pub., vol. i., 1826; ii., 1827; iii., 1828; iv., 1830; 2d ed., carefully revised and greatly enlarged, 1832, 4 vols. The 6th ed. was the last revised by the author shortly before his death. The 7th ed. (1851, 4 vols.) and the 8th ed. (1854) were edited by the author's son, William Kent, and the friend of the latter, Dorman Bridgman Eaton. We presume that a new ed. will be required within a year or two from the date at which we are writing (1857.) It is said that there were sold to the year 1853, edits. 1–7 inclusive, 21,000 sets, or 84,000 vols., at a profit to the author and his heirs of $120,000.

In 1839 was pub. J. Eastman Johnson's Analytical Abridgments of Kent's Commentaries, N. York, 8vo: in 1840, 8vo, the 2d ed. (a 3d has since appeared) of The Most Important Part of Kent's Commentaries on American Law, reduced to Questions and Answers, and in 1837, Edin., 8vo, a republication of part of the Commentaries, under the title of A Treatise on Commercial and Maritime Law. We do not feel willing to conclude this article, long as it is, without the citation of some English and American eulogiums upon the invaluable Commentaries on American Law.

English Opinions on the Commentaries:

"They may be recommended to the English law-student of the present day as a substitute for Blackstone. They contain not only a clear statement of the English law, with all the alterations that have taken place since the time of Blackstone, but a full account of the main principles of Equity, on topic on which the English commentator is confessedly deficient; also a review of the modifications engrafted on the English law by the different States of the Union, and, on all important questions, an instructive parallel between the English, American, Modern Continental, and Civil Laws."—Johnes's Chancery Reform, 22, n

"They are fine examples of lucid and manly reasoning, and the style in which they are written is perspicuous and forcible. From the nature of the work, Chancellor Kent was only able to devote a small portion of his treatise to the Law of Nations; but their brevity is the only thing that is objectionable in these lectures, for all that the author does give us is valuable."—Manning's Law of Nat., 44.

"We have never in any English work met with a more full and satisfactory account of the rights and liabilities of infants than is contained in the work before us. Before quitting this book we wish to say a few words as to its style, and of this we can scarcely speak in terms of sufficiently warm commendation. It is easy, clear, vigorous, and unaffected."—Prof. Whitside: Lect. before the Dublin Law Institute.

"We have learned the respect that is due to Professor Kent, the late Chancellor of the State of New York, author of the Commentaries on American Law, a name probably not inferior, as a legal writer, to any of the present day."—Robertson on Personal Succession, 78, n.

"We shall conclude with the following judicious and accurate estimate of the Civil Law contained in the Commentaries of Chancellor Kent, to whom we have been so frequently indebted during the course of this work."—Warren's Introduc. to Law Studies, 2d ed., Lon., 1845, 804.

Mr. Warren adds in a note, after referring to the "masterly and elaborate account of the Civil Law" in the forty-fourth chapter of Gibbon's Decline and Fall,

"Chancellor Kent gives also a very able sketch of the Civil Law in the twenty-third Lecture, which concludes the first volume of his Commentaries, and from which has been taken the foregoing extract."

"It will be a proud distinction to Kent and Story that they have done more than any other men to put an end to the indifference of English lawyers to the learning of their American brethren. Story, mentioning the praises given to Kent's Commentaries in some English legal publications, adds, 'This is as it should be; for England is deeply interested in cultivating a thorough knowledge of American Jurisprudence; and it would betray a lamentable want of professional ambition not to master a work which has become our first juridical classic,'—the American Blackstone, or something more."—Edin. Rev., xcvi. 340; Review of Life and Letters of Mr. Justice Story.

"Lord Campbell, speaking of American as compared with English jurists, says, 'I really hardly know any name which we can so much boast of as the Americans may of that of Professor Story and Chancellor Kent, and others of very great distinction."—H. H. Joy's Letters on Legal Education.

"I have studied Chancellor Kent's Commentaries," remarked the present Emperor of France, "think highly of them, and regard him as the first of your jurists. I would be glad to know him personally."

American Opinions on the Commentaries.

No one hailed the appearance of this work with more delight than the eminent jurist from whom we have already more than once had occasion to quote:

"The work is but a new proof of your accurate learning, extensive research, and unwearied diligence. It does honour to your talents and public spirit, and I am persuaded that it will give a permanent increase to your reputation. It will become an American text-book, and range on the same shelf with the classical work of Blackstone in all our libraries. If one were tempted to envy you any thing, it would be this proud distinction."—Letter to James Kent, Salem, Dec. 15, 1827: Story's Life and Letters, 1851, i. 526.

Nine years later (Oct. 15, 1836) Judge Story remarks, in a letter to the author,

"Since I last wrote you, I have found time to examine various parts of your Commentaries in the last edition with more care than I had previously done. You have everywhere improved the text by your additions, and infused into it the new and fresh resources of your daily-augmenting learning. I rejoice to find also that in America the various merits of this admirable work are now universally and familiarly established. Abroad also it is acquiring a solid and imposing character: and I find, from incidental notices of it here and there in legal publications in England, that it receives a just and liberal praise. This is as it should be, for England is deeply interested in cultivating a thorough knowledge of American jurisprudence, and it would betray a lamentable want of professional ambition not to master a work which has become our first juridical classic."—Ubi supra. xi. 219.

"These Commentaries have already acquired the reputation of a juridical classic, and have placed their author in the first rank in the benefactors of the profession. They embody the principles of Law in pages as attractive by the persuasive eloquence of their style as they are instructive by the fulness and accuracy of their learning."—Story: On the Conflict of Laws; Dedication.

See also Story's Eq. Jur., 6th ed., 1853, i. 65, n.

"It is the character of the Commentaries as a national work, and their masterly execution as such, that have stamped upon them a peculiar value. It is to those causes that the extent of the influence which they rapidly acquired and now exert on the jurisprudence, not of a single State, but of all, must be ascribed. . . It is now in the hands of every student and of every practitioner of the law, and it ought to be in the hands of every legislator and statesman, and indeed of every man of cultivated mind and liberal studies."—Judge Duer: Discourse, &c., 76, 79.

In the last sentiment expressed by Judge Duer—the advantage of legal learning to laics—we have more than once in this volume added our lay testimony, and especially in our life of Edward Everett, p. 571. In this connexion we beg to recommend to our lay brethren some excellent remarks upon this subject, originally pub. in the North American Review, and appended by Mr. Johnson (Reporter) to his life of Chancellor Kent, in the National Portrait-Gallery, 1852, vol. ii. Who will not coincide with Mr. Johnson's remarks on the Commentaries?

"In the full maturity of his understanding, with a ruin[illegible] long habituated to legal investigations and researches, and with sound and enlightened views of jurisprudence, no man, perhaps, could have been found better fitted than Chancellor Kent to execute such a work, and it may diminish in some degree the regret felt for the loss sustained by the public and the legal profession in being deprived of his valuable services on the bench, to know how usefully to the world and honourably to himself he employed his time and talents in its performance."—Ubi supra.

In the page from which we have just quoted, Mr. Johnson draws a brief comparison between the Commentaries of Blackstone and those of Kent, and a fuller one will be found in Judge Duer's Discourse, &c., 76–79. And see quotation below. Doubtless all enlightened jurists—unless, indeed, we are to except Mr. Austin and some of his pupils as regards the reference to Blackstone—will endorse the dictum of Judge Sharswood:

"Blackstone and Kent should be read, and read, again and again. . . . These elementary works, with some others of an immediately practical cast,—Tidd's Practice, Stephen's Pleading, Greenleaf's Evidence, Leigh's Nisi Prius, Mitford's Equity Pleading,—well conned, make up the best part of office-pleading."—Profess. Ethics, Append., 110, 1855.

Mr. Hoffman, in his notice of one of the early edits. of the Commentaries, after praising "the deep research, the classical embellishments, the apt illustrations, and the clear and manly style, which characterize every portion of this able work," proceeds to point out some defects, ("if they be defects,") which, however, he remarks, "are trivial and easily remedied."—Leg. Stu., 166–168; vide also Note 2 on Title IV.

"England has only furnished one Blackstone, and the American rival equals him in classic purity and elegance of style, and surpasses him in extent and copiousness of learning. What do Sir William Blackstone's Commentaries contain of Equity Jurisprudence, of the Law of Nations, and the several titles of Commercial Law, which are discussed with such richness and accuracy by Chancellor Kent? Scarcely nothing: and a comparison of other titles in the two works shows the American author to have surpassed his rival in comprehensiveness of research and fulness of illustration, and to have equalled him in clearness and cogency of reasoning."—Marvin's Leg. Bibl., 438.

See also Lieber's Leg. and Polit. Hermeneutics, 221, 6 Pick., 316; 1 Angel's Law Intel., 9, ii. 231; 24 N. Amer. Rev., 345, (by W. Phillips;) 2 U. S. Rev. and Lit. Gaz., 81; 24 Amer. Jur., 102, xxv. 114; 3 Law Rep., 402, vi. 289; Amer. Quar. Rev., 162; 2 South. Rev., 72; 6 U. S. Lit. Gaz., 81.

We may remark, in conclusion, that the value of Kent's Commentaries as a library-book of reference for the historical student, or general reader, who seeks for a solution of difficulties occurring in the course of literary investigations, is hardly to be overrated. For instance: the eloquent historian of the Conquest of Mexico, after briefly noticing the various theories of the right of title to territory, sends the reader for further information on this knotty point to those who may be presumed to speak as authority upon matters peculiarly pertaining to their profession;

"For a brief view of the discussion, see Vattel, (Droit des Gens, sec. 209,) and especially Kent, (Commentaries on American Law, vol. iii. lec. 51,) where it is handled with much perspicuity and eloquence."—Hist. of the Cong. of Mexico, 23d ed., Bost., 1855, 33, n.

We have already, in the course of this article, indicated those sources to which the reader may profitably refer who desires to linger a few moments more (whilst we necessarily pass to the discharge of other biographical duties) on the character of this distinguished jurist, useful citizen, and excellent man. We may add to our list of references, Life and Letters of Judge Story, i. 144-145, 156, 232, 425, ii. 97, 312; Works of Daniel Webster, 8th ed., 1854, i. 214; Webster's Private Correspondence, i. 287, ii. 160-162; N. York Church Rev., i. 104. It is understood that Mr. William Kent is now (1857) engaged upon a biography of his late eminent father. When completed it will be a fit companion of the Life of the late Judge Story, also written by his son, and both will be treasured as heirlooms by the future sons of America, when "all of us who now live shall be mute, and most of us forgotten." That at least we may not prove entirely useless to the day and generation in which our lot is cast, let us strive to emulate the noble example of him of whom his friend could say,

"For myself, when his character, as developed in the narrative that has now been given, rises before me, in all its integrity and truth, its nobleness and purity,—and when I reflect on the magnitude of his labors and upon their vast and most beneficent results,—I feel emboldened to say—and I feel assured of your sympathy in saying—that, great as our country is in all the elements of a just renown, and illustrious as its annals have become by the labors and by the exploits of statesmen and of heroes, it may yet be doubted whether, hitherto, it has produced a man more worthy of its entire veneration, gratitude, and love, than him whose services to his country and to his race we are this day met to commemorate.

"Regio."

"Rebus opima bonis, multa munita virum vi,
Nil tamen hoc habuisse viro præclarius in se,
Nec sanctum magis, et rarum carumque videtur."

The critic of Blackwood eulogizes Mr. Kenyon's poems, on the whole, very highly, but remarks,

"There are many pieces of moral meditation in the volume, which, though good in musical prose, and just in conception, yet lack the Muse's stamp."—xliv. 793, Dec. 1838.

Miss Mitford was a great admirer of Mr. Kenyon's poetry:

"Mr. Kenyon is a disciple in that good old school, [Delille, Racine,] Unsparing of the limæ labor, he does his best to put as much concentrated meaning as possible into the fewest possible melodious verses; and on the shelf which holds Cowper, Rogers, Crabbe, may, be found a corner for his third poetical volume, as for his first and second. It deals, as they did, with the same mixed region of the familiar and imaginative, throws the hues of fancy over the plainest lessons of experience, and expresses the elevation of poetry in the language of real life."—Lon. Examiner.

Mr. Kenyon was a man of large fortune, and not only "devised liberal things," but during his life aided the straitened sons of song who were afflicted by the res angusta domi. But, like Samson of old, he probably destroyed more of the Philistines (anxiety, despondency, and care) in his death than he had done in his life. Eighty legatees mourned their friend and blessed their benefactor with the same breath. Among those so kindly remembered were his cousin Elizabeth Barrett Browning, (£4000,) her husband, Robert Browning, (£4500,) Barry Cornwall, (£5000,) and Dr Henry Southey, (£8000.)

"By the inner world of English poets and London society Mr. Kenyon will be missed and remembered as a man of graceful and genial mind who had been the intimate and helpful friend of Wordsworth, Coleridge, and Southey, who delighted in the exercise of hospitality, and whose munificence was as wide as it was delicately administered."—*Lon. "Lord Kenyon was an honest, intelligent and learned magistrate; but from habit and education, and perhaps original cast of mind, he does not seem to have entered into the true spirit of commercial jurisprudence. Kettell, Samuel, 1800–1855, a native of Newburyport, principal editor of the Boston Courier from 1848 until his decease, and a Representative in the Massachusetts Legislature from Boston in 1851 and 1852, is best known as an author by his Specimens of American Poetry, with Critical and Biographical Notes, Bost., 1829, 3 vols. 12mo. A review of this vol., by S. A. Eliot, will be found in the N. Amer. Rev., xxix. 487–496. Mr. Kettell had a remarkable facility in learning languages, and held the pen of a ready writer. He has already been noticed on a preceding page as a literary assistant of the famous Peter Parley: see GOODRICH, SAMUEL GRISWOLD.

Key, Francis Scott, 1779–1843, a native of Frederick county, Maryland, educated at St. John's College, Annapolis; in 1801, commenced the practice of the law at Fredericktown, subsequently removed to Washington, D.C., and became District Attorney of the city. He continued to reside at Washington for the rest of his life. He was the author of a number of poems, which have only been collected within the last few weeks, Baltimore, 1857, edited by H. V. D. Johns, of Baltimore. Of these the best-known is The Star-Spangled Banner, inspired by the author's position as a prisoner with the British in 1814, during the bombardment of Fort McHenry, which guards the entrance to Baltimore. An interesting account, by Chief-Justice Taney, Mr. Key's brother-in-law, of the circumstances connected with the composition of this stirring song, will be found in the preface to the vol. of Key's poems just noticed. See North American Rev., lxviii. 311; Princeton Rev., xvii. 357; Method. Quar. Rev., v. 427, (by R. West.)

"Mr. Kidder is in every respect admirably qualified to supply this marked and important defect in historical and statistical literature. He is an accomplished scholar, and has given much attention to the preparation of this work."

This work is highly esteemed in England, and is embodied in one of the Blue-Books of Parliament. It is now out of print, but we are pleased to see the announcement (Phila., 1857, 8vo) of Brazil and the Brazilians, by the Rev. D. P. Kidder, and the Rev. J. C. Fletcher, of the Presbyterian Church, late American Chaplain at Rio de Janeiro, and for a time Acting Secretary of the American Legation in that city. The publishers promise a splendid volume, illustrated by more than 150 engravings on steel, wood, and stone, and uniform with Dr. Kane's Arctic Explorations. This will contain the substance of the first-named publication, with many important additions. The value of a well executed work of this character—the importance of making Brazil and the Brazilians better known to Europeans and North Americans—need hardly be enlarged upon in this place. In the last year (1856) Brazil exported sixty millions of dollars' worth of her productions, and imported to the amount of fifty-three millions of dollars. Europe brings Brazil in debt annually, but the United States are debtors to the latter every year about some twelve to fifteen millions of dollars. To the naturalist the flora and fauna of Brazil offer special attractions.

We notice another valuable work on Brazil, in addition to several already recorded in our Dictionary: Travels in Brazil, in the years 1817, 1818, 1819, and 1820. Undertaken by the command of His Majesty the King of Bavaria, and published under his special patronage. By Dr. John Von Spix and Dr. Charles Von Martius, members of the Royal Bavarian Academy of Sciences. Translated from the German. Vols. i. and ii., 8vo, with plates.

"The gentlemen fixed on for the mission appear, from the work before us, to be admirably qualified for the purpose, and to have pursued the object of their journey with a zeal and diligence rarely equalled. . . . We shall reserve till the appearance of the remaining [two] volumes an account of the interesting observations which they have made on the Botany, on the Animal Productions, on the Geology and Mineralogy, and on the various Agricultural and Mining Establishments."—Lon. Quar. Rev.

The whole of the country, from the twenty-fourth degree of south latitude, to Pará under the equator, and thence to the frontiers of Peru, is described.

Dr. Kidder's coadjutor in the preparation of Brazil and the Brazilians—the Rev. J. C. Fletcher—studied theology at Princeton, New Jersey, and at Geneva, Switzerland. He was for a number of years, as above noticed, chaplain at Rio de Janeiro. He has contributed a number of papers to the periodicals of the day, and whilst in Europe communicated the results of his observations in letters which appeared in the public journals: some of these epistles attracted considerable attention, and were republished in Calcutta.

We continue the enumeration of Dr. Kidder's literary labours:

Translated from the Portuguese, Demonstration of the Necessity of abolishing a constrained Clerical Celibacy, exhibiting the evils of that Institution, and the remedy, by Feijo, ex-Regent of the Empire of Brazil, &c. &c., 1844, 18mo.

Edited, 1844 to '56, The Sunday School Advocate, an official periodical of the Methodist Episcopal Church, circulating more than 100,000 copies. Edited also, during the same period, more than eight hundred volumes of Sunday school books, besides numerous tracts, &c.

He was a profound Orientalist, and an excellent man. He pub. a number of serms. and theolog. treatises, and the following works, by which he is best known:

She was an accomplished scholar, an excellent painter, and the author of a number of poetical compositions which were pub. in the year after her death, Lon., 1686, 4to. She is best known, however, as the subject of a celebrated ode of Dryden's, already noticed in our Life of that poet. See also Wood's Athen. Oxon.; Recreations of Christopher North, originally pub. in Blackw. Mag., xxxv. 186. The following lines—something in the style à la Wren—prove that this lady did not despair of immortality through the medium of her own poetry:

"EPITAPH WRITTEN BY HERSELF.

"When I am dead, few friends attend my hearse,
And for a monument I leave my verse."

Killigrew, Catherine, 1530?–1600? the fourth daughter of Sir Anthony Cooke, the wife of Sir Henry Killigrew, and the aunt of the great Lord Bacon, was an excellent scholar, and a poetess of no mean pretensions. Sir John Harrington gives us some specimens of her poetry in his notes to his trans. of Ariosto, and Fuller copies some of her Latin verses in his Worthies of England, (ed. 1840, i. 309.) Fuller remarks of the daughters of Sir Anthony Cooke,

"Indeed, they were all most eminent scholars, the honour of their own and the shame of our sex, both in prose and poetry."—Ubi supra.

Killigrew, Thomas, 1611–1682, brother of William Killigrew, (post,) and Henry Killigrew, (ante,) was page of honour to Charles I., a companion of Charles II. in his exile, and after the Restoration groom of the bedchamber to the latter. In 1651, he was English ambassador to Vienna. He wrote nine plays during his travels, and two at London, all of which were pub. in 1664, Lon., fol. Two of his Tragi-Comedies—The Prisoners and Claricilla—were pub. in 1641, 12mo, and he pub. a letter rel. to some Nuns at Tours, in 1635, fol. See Biog. Dramat. Killigrew talked better than he wrote, and Cowley wrote better than he talked, which induced a contemporary to remark,

"Had Cowley ne'er spoke, Killigrew ne'er writ, Combin'd in one, they'd made a matchless wit."

King, Edward, 1735–1807, a native of Norfolk, pub. several works on subjects connected with theology, politics, political economy, and antiquities, 1767–1805, and contributed papers to Archæol., 1774–82, and to Phil. Trans., 1767–79. His best-known works are—1. Essay on the English Constitutional Govt., Lon., 1767, 8vo. 2. Observ. on Ancient Castles, 1777, 4to; 1782, 4to. 3. Morsels of Criticism; tending to illustrate some few Passages in the Holy Scriptures upon Philosophical Principles and an enlarged View of things, 1788, 4to; 2d ed., 1800, 3 vols. 8vo. Supp., or vol. ii., 1800, 4to. Contents of the whole work: On the word Heaven in the Lord's Prayer; Septuagint translation of Genesis; John Baptist being Elias; Future Coming of Christ; Day of Judgment; Series of events in the Revelations; Daniel's Prophecies; Deaths of Ananias and Sapphira; Dissertations concerning Light, the Heavens, Stars, Fluid of Heat; Miracles; Jacob and Esau; Soul, Body, Spirit, &c.

"The author of it appears to me (I speak from his book) to be a gentleman of extensive erudition and ingenuity, and of accurate biblical knowledge, perhaps a little too fond of theory, and perhaps a little whimsical in his application of natural philosophy, but [illegible] without a serious attention and a profound piety."—Forsaith of Lit.

Read this long note, which elicited the 2d ed. of The Morsels of Criticism.

"Mr. King's particular aim is to provide answers to the more subtile opponents of Christianity, and to trace the completion of the sacred oracles. . . . We cannot take our leave of this valuable work without expressing our admiration of the singular union of ingenuity and piety which appears in every page."—Brit. Critic. O. King, William, D.D., 1650–1729, a native of Antrim, Ireland, was educated at Trin. Coll., Dublin, presented to a prebend 1676, and afterwards to a precentorship of Tuam; promoted to the chancellorship of the Cathedral of St. Patrick's, and to the parish of St. Werburgh, Dublin, 1679; Dean of St. Patrick's, 1688; Bishop of Derry, 1691; Archbishop of Tuam, 1702. His lordship pub. a number of serms., some theolog. treatises, principally controversial, against Papists and Presbyterians, and the following works, by which he is best known. 1. The State of the Protestants in Ireland under the late King James's Government, Lon., 1691, 4to; 3d ed., 1692, 8vo; Dubl., 1730, 8vo.

"The state of the Protestants in Ireland under the government of King James the Second is accurately and methodically represented by Dr. William King, the present Archbishop of Dublin, who has fully discovered their unparalleled sufferings in every thing that was dear and valuable to them."—Bishop Nicolson: Irish Hist. Lib., ed. 1776, 23

"This copious history is so well received, and so universally acknowledged to be as truly as it is finely written, that I refer my reader to the account of those matters which is fully and faithfully given by that learned and zealous prelate."—Bishop Burnet: Own Times.

But hear the other side:

"There is not one single fact I inquired into but I found it false in whole or in part, aggravated or misrepresented, so as to alter the whole face of the story and give it perfectly another air and turn, insomuch that, though many things he says were true, yet he has hardly spoke a true word, that is, told truly and nakedly, without a warp."—Charles Leslie: Answer to the State of the Protestants in Ireland, &c., 1692.

"A work of which the great object was to combat the Optimism of Leibnitz and the Manicheism imputed to Bayle."—Dugald Stewart: 1st Prelim. Dissert. to Encyc. Brit., q. v.

"Pope has evidently borrowed his doctrine of 'whatever is, is best,' from this work."—Green's Diary of a Lover of Lit., Ipswich, 1810, 71, q. v.

In reference to this opinion, see Boswell's Life of Johnson, ed. Lon., 1848, r. 8vo, 635, n.

Leibnitz, notwithstanding his published objections to this book, admitted that it was "full of elegance and learning." Bayle also took up the cudgels in defence of his own principles. See also Biog. King, William, LL.D., 1663–1712, a native of London, educated at Westminster School, and at Christ Church, Oxford, Judge of the High Court of Admiralty in Ireland about 1702, pub. a number of theolog. treatises, translations, poetical, classical, political, and other works, of which a collective ed. was pub. by John Nichols, with Notes and Memoirs, Lon., 1776, 3 vols. sm. 8vo. Among the best-known of his publications are The Art of Love and The Art of Cookery. See Memoirs as above; Biog. Brit.; Coote's Cat. of Civilians; Johnson's Lives of the Poets; Disraeli's Quarrels of Authors. King was a great humorist:

"After this narration, it will be naturally supposed that his poems were rather the amusements of idleness than efforts of study,—that he endeavoured rather to divert than to astonish,—that his thought seldom aspired to sublimity,—and that, if his verse was easy and his images familiar, he attained what he desired. His purpose is to be merry; but perhaps, to enjoy his mirth, it may be sometimes necessary to think well of his opinions."—Dr. Johnson: ubi supra.

"Dr. King may be considered as the inventor of a new species of satire. He moves the risible muscles of his readers; he was a wit who lived on the highway of Literature, appropriating for his own purpose the property of the greatest passengers by a dexterous mode no other had hit on. What an important lesson the labours of King offer to real genius! Dr. King's dispersed works have fortunately been collected by Mr. Nichols, with ample illustrations, in 3 vols. 8vo, 1776."—Disraeli's Quarrels of Authors.

King, William, LL.D., 1685–1763, a native of Stepney, Middlesex, educated at Baliol College, Oxford, Principal of St. Mary Hall, 1719–22, pub. a number of Latin pieces, &c., but is best known as the author of a production never pub., entitled The Toast, an Epic Poem, 1736, 4to; 1747, 4to; Dublin, printed; London, reprinted. This is a satire upon the Countess of Newburg, elicited by a lawsuit relative to an estate in Galway. For a key to the characters, see Wm. Davis's Second Journey round the Library of a Bibliomaniac, 1825, sm. 8vo. King also printed (not pub.) Opera Latina, (including The Toast,) 3 vols. in 1, 4to; Oxon., 1756, &c. On the death of the author the whole impression save sixty copies was destroyed by his executors. Reed's copy, (2204 of his cat.,) with MS. Key to The Toast, was sold for £10 10s. His Apology, in which he defends himself against his Whig opponents, was pub. about 1754, 4to. He also gave to the world the first five vols. of Dr. South's Sermons. In 1818, cr. 8vo, (2d ed., 1819, 8vo,) there was pub., from his original MS., Political and Literary Anecdotes of his Own Times, by Dr. Wm. King. Reviews of this work will be found in Edin. Rev., xxxii. 74–88, (by Lord Brougham: see his Contrib. to Edin. Rev., 1856, vol. iii. 405–418;) Lon. Month. Rev., lxxxviii. 155; Edin. Month. Rev., i. 460; Philo. Analec. "The anecdotes are related in an easy and agreeable manner, and follow each other like a table-talk, without any regard to order, or merely with that kind of connexion which arises from one story suggesting another."—Lord Brougham: ubi supra.

Kinghorn, Joseph, a Baptist minister, is best remembered as the opponent of Robert Hall: the latter advocated "Mixed Communion," whilst Kinghorn espoused "Exclusion." Kinghorn also pub. a few sermons, and theolog. treatises, 1795–1814. See Hall, Robert, pp. 765, 767; Bickersteth's C. S.; Lowndes's Brit Lib., 787; Watt's Bibl. Brit.; Darling's Cyc. Kinglake, John Alexander, a London barrister, b. 1802, at Taunton, Devonshire, educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, called to the bar in 1837, has contributed to the London Quarterly Review and other periodicals, and pub. a very popular book, entitled Eothen: or, Traces of Travel brought home from the East, Lon., 1844, 8vo; 5th ed., 1846, 12mo.

"If the brilliant author of Eothen has produced one of the most striking pictures of the East that ever was presented to the minds of the West, another artist, [Eliot Warburton, whose pencil has, as it were, been 'dipped in the orient hues of heaven,' has been prematurely snatched from his admiring country."—Sir Archibald Alison's Hist. of Europe, 1815–52, chap. v.

"We hazard little in prophesying that Mr. Curzon's work [Visit to Monasteries in the Levant] will be more popular than any other recent set of Oriental descriptions, except Mr Kinglake's; and, however that remarkable writer may claim the superiority in wit, point, and artistical finish," &c.—Lon. Quar. Rev., lxxxix. 462–463.

"Nothing so sparkling, so graphic, so truthful in sentiment, and so poetic in vein, has issued from the press in many a day."—Lon. Orthodox.

"The best book of Eastern travels we know."—Lon. Examiner.

"A charming work of travels, written with good taste and excellent judgment."—President King, of Columbia College.

Mr. Kinglake is at this moment (Feb. 1857) a candidate for Parliament. Since the above was written, Mr. Kinglake has been withdrawn, (April, 1857.)

Kingsborough, Rt. Hon. Edward King, Viscount, 1795–1837, eldest son of the third Earl of Kingston, was educated at Exeter College, Oxford; represented his native county (Cork) in the Parliament of 1820–34, and subsequently devoted himself to the preparation of his great work.—The Antiquities of Mexico; comprising Fac-similes of Ancient Mexican Paintings and Hieroglyphics preserved in the Royal Libraries of Paris, Berlin, and Dresden; in the Imperial Library of Vienna; in the Vatican Library; in the Borgian Museum at Rome; in the Library of the Institute of Bologna; and in the Bodleian Library of Oxford; together with the Monuments of New Spain, by M. Dupaix; with their respective Scale of Measurement and accompanying Descriptions. The whole illustrated by many valuable inedited Manuscripts by Lord Kingsborough. The Drawings on Stone by A. Aglio. Lon., imp. fol., vols. i.–vii., 1831; vols viii. and ix., 1848. Originally pub. at the rate of £140, unbound; now reduced to £36 4s. or, with the plates coloured, originally pub. at the rate of £210; now reduced to £63; vols. viii. and ix. were pub. at £12 12s. for both. The following note, pub. within the last few weeks, demands the attention of those concerned:

"Dec. 10, [1856.]

"40, Albemarle Street, [London.]

"Vol. ix. of Lord Kingsborough's Mexican Antiquities [contains the Relation of Don Alva Ixtlixochitl; but, in all the copies of the work which have fallen under my notice, I find that the volume closes abruptly, on p. 408, without finishing the Relation, of which an amount equivalent to several pages is wanting. In the language of the printing-office, it would seem that a 'signature' has been lost in making up the volume. The 'end' of each of the preceding volumes is uniformly printed in, and its absence in vol ix. confirms my suspicion of the accidental omission of a 'signature.' There are 308 copies of Ixtlixochitl, from which the publishers could supply the deficiency,—no doubt one wholly unintentional on their part. E. C. S."—From the Lon. Athen., Dec. 13, 1856, 1537.

The initials will be recognised as those of Mr. Squier. Having called the attention of Mr. Prescott, author of the History of the Conquest of Mexico, &c., to the preceding note, he writes us,—

"The Relation of Ixtlixochitl terminates on p 408; but this is followed by another work, on the rites and customs of the Mexicans, making 60 pages. These pages are numbered from 1 to 60, and the signatures are those of vol. ix.; but at the bottom of the last page is printed, End of vol ix., and of the work,—showing that the original design of the publication was not completed.

"Boston March 7, 1857."

An account of this magnificent publication, the first seven vols. of which cost Lord Kingsborough £32,000, (and his life also,) will be found in Rich's Bibl. Amer. Nova, ii. 233–235; Prescott's Hist. of the Conq. of Mexico, 2d ed., Bost., 1855, i. 128–130, see also Index to Mexico, and Index to his Peru, ed. 1855, Prel., ix., vol. i., 1861; Lon. Athenæum; Lon. Gent. Mag., 1831, Pts. 99–102, 308–307; Lon. Month. Rev., Feb., 1831, 253–274; Dr. Maginn's Homeric Ballads; The Genealogy of Glaucus. Two copies were printed on vellum, (the cost of which was estimated at three thousand guineas,) and ten were taken off on large drawing-paper. Nine were presented to crowned heads and public institutions, and the tenth to Mr. C. Rich, the eminent bibliographer, for valuable services rendered in the preparation of the work. We know of several copies of the Antiquities in America,—viz.: one in the Boston Athenæum, presented by the late Francis C. Gray, (see p. 724 of this Dictionary;) one in the library of the New York Historical Society; one in the library of the Rochester University; one in the Astor Library, New York; one in the library of the Worcester Antiquarian Society; and another in the library of Wm. H. Prescott, the historian. The late Mr. Corwin, of New York, also possessed a copy. We have said that this work cost Lord Kingsborough not only a large expenditure of money, but his life also:

"After having expended upwards of thirty thousand pounds upon this work, he got into difficulties with some of the persons with whom he dealt particularly with a celebrated paper-manufacturer. He was arrested in Dublin, and from obstinacy or unwillingness to pay a demand he thought unjust, was thrown into prison. He was there seized with a typhus fever, which ended fatally in a few days. If he had lived, he would, within a year, have become Earl of Kingston and inherited a fortune of forty thousand pounds a year. Had he lived, there is no doubt but that he would have devoted his life and fortune to the development of the ancient history of America, which had become with him a monomania. . . . Lord Kingsborough's penchant for Mexican antiquities was produced by a sight of the original Mexican manuscript described by Purchas, (Pilgrims, vol. iii.,) preserved in the Bodleian Library, where his lordship was a student. From the time he first saw it, he appears to have devoted his mind to it, and to have thought of nothing else."—Rich's Bibl. Amer. Nova, ii. 234–235.

It is asserted, indeed, by his lordship's biographer, in the Gentleman's Magazine, May, 1837, that the imprisonment which resulted in his death was caused by his having become security for the payment of a debt due by his father, the Earl of Kingston; and the same writer assures us that four copies of the Mexican Antiquities were printed on vellum: but we prefer the authority of Mr. Rich, his lordship's coadjutor in the preparation of his great work and the purchaser of the bulk of the invaluable Kingsborough collection of the original materials from which the Antiquities were compiled. Of the two copies on vellum, one was presented by the editor to the Bodleian Library, and the other to the British Museum. This work well deserves the epithets by which Mr. Prescott signifies his admiration of it,—"noble." "colossal," "magnificent." But the historian of Mexico by no means endorses the theory far which the noble commentator so zealously contends:

"The drift of Lord Kingsborough's speculations is to establish the colonization of Mexico by the Israelites. To this the whole battery of his logic and learning is directed. For this hieroglyphics are unriddled, manuscripts compared, monuments delineated."

But, whatever may be thought of his lordship's speculations, we must all agree, with Mr. Prescott,

"that by this munificent undertaking—which no government, probably, would have, and few individuals could have, executed—he has entitled himself to the lasting gratitude of every friend of science."—Conq. of Mexico, i. 120.

"This work, in its magnificence, recalls to mind the patronage of crowned heads and the splendour of the princely patrons of literature."—Lon. Athen.

"A magnificent monument of the picture-writing of the Mexicans is to be found in the splendid folios of the late Lord Kingsborough, who, after spending larger sums of money on a literary work than ever were before expended by any nobleman," &c.—Dr. Maguire: ubi supra.

"Cet ouvrage de la plus grande magnificence."—Brunet: Manuel du Libraire, &c., 1842, ii. 770.

"It forms almost an era in one's life to have had an opportunity of inspecting such a splendid series of volumes as are now placed before us under the title of Antiquities of Mexico. We should have supposed, after we had contemplated the superb materials of which they consist, that they were the results of some state enterprise, undertaken by a spirited and ambitious government, which aimed at exalting the national character and its own by the munificence of its patronage of the fine arts."—Lon. Month. Rev., ubi supra.

The curious reader will find much interesting matter respecting the ancient Mexicans, in the Lettres Américaines of Count Carli, the Recherches Philosophiques sur les Américains of M. de Pauw, &c. Mr. Prescott's great work on The Conquest of Mexico will, of course, be always consulted.

Kingsley, Charles, Junior Rector of Eversley, Hants, and Canon of Middleham, born at Holne Vicarage, Devonshire, June 12, 1819, is the son of the Rev. Charles Kingsley, now (1857) Rector of Chelsea, was educated at Magdalene College, Cambridge, and in 1844 was married to the daughter of Pascoe Grenfell, Esq., who was for a number of years M.P. for Truro and Great Marlow. Mr. Kingsley, the subject of our notice, belongs to what is called the "Broad-Church Party," and is a zealous advocate of the rights of the working-classes. The following list of his publications presents evidence of literary industry of no ordinary character. 1. XXV. Village Serms., Lon., 1844, 12mo; 2d ed., 1852, 12mo; 3d ed., 1854, fp. 8vo. 2. The Saint's Tragedy, a Story of Elizabeth of Hungary; a Drama in Verse, 1848, 12mo; 2d ed., 1851, 18mo. Also reprinted in Nos.

"The Saint's Tragedy, which was Mr. Kingsley's first literary work, contained great poetic promise, both dramatic and lyric. It evinced a subtle knowledge of human emotion, especially of the mental workings and heart-burnings of humanity wrestling with the views inculcated by Catholic ascetics."—Chambers's Journal.

3. Alton Locke; Tailor and Poet; a Novel, 1850, 2 vols. p. 8vo; 4th ed., 1856, 12mo.

"It is the book of an age. That it will exercise a deep and extensive influence on the public mind may be considered as certain. There is something in the author's very errors suggestive of right; and, when he does enunciate truths which other men only hint and whisper, he stamps his idea inefficaciously on the memory and heart of the reader, in thoughts that breathe and words that burn."—Eclectic Rev.

"Real genius, intense power of sympathy, an intimacy with the woes which the book describes, are the evident qualifications of the writer."—Lon. Examiner.

"A book which exhibits in many passages decided marks of genius, but which, as a whole, is so preposterously absurd as rather to excite ridicule than to move sympathy."—Blackwood's Mag., Nov. 1850, vol. lxviii.

"If Mr. Kingsley had really been a tailor, the style and sentiments of Alton Locke would have excited little surprise or even notice: it is the strangeness and incongruity of the exhibition which creates by much the larger share of its attraction.

'The things themselves are neither new nor rare:
We wonder how the mischief they came there.'

It is only as falling from the pulpit and the professional chair that such trash could make any impression.—could excite even curiosity."—Revolutionary Literature: Lon. Quar. Rev., Sept. 1851, lxxxviii. 533.

"Novel-readers will perhaps prefer it to Alton Locke on account of its passionate eloquence and exquisite love-passages. There is undeniable genius in it, and the beauty of certain passages reveals a poet and a thinker"—Lon. Athen.

"It is powerful, earnest, feeling, and eloquent.—the production of a man acquainted with society, who has looked closely upon its various classes and has the power of reading the signs of the times."—Lon. Spectator.

11. Westward Ho! or, The Voyages and Adventures of Sir Amyas Leigh, 3 vols. cr. 8vo; 1st. ed., April, 1855; 2d ed., June, 1855.

"Mr. Kingsley has selected a good subject, and has written a good novel to excellent purpose."—Lon. Times, Aug. 18, 1855.

"His pictures of English society, feeling, and thought in the days of Queen Elizabeth, as given therein, are utterly at variance with historical record and with the voluminous evidence which is afforded by the works of the authors of that period. The whole novel is a huge anachronism; for the characters, except in name, belong to the age of Cromwell, and not to that of Elizabeth."—Blackwood's Mag., June, 1855, vol. lxxvii.

"Its pages sparkle with life: they open up a thousand sources of unanticipated pleasure, and combine amusement with instruction in a very happy and unwonted degree."—Lon. Eclectic Rev.

Glaucus is also highly commended by the Christian Remembrancer, The Guardian, and The Spectator; but Blackwood does not seem to value the work so highly: see that periodical for August, 1855,—Modern Light Literature: Science.

13. Poems, now first collected, 1856, 16mo. This vol. contains The Saint's Tragedy and (see No. 1) Miscellaneous Poems and Ballads. The contents were collected by the author for the publishers, Messrs. Ticknor and Fields, of Boston, Mass., and have not been pub. in this shape in England. See Putnam's Mag., May, 1856, vii. 532.

The following comments upon Mr. Kingsley's poetical characteristics will be read with interest by his many admirers:

"Mr. Kingsley has the self-denial to reject all that is superfluous in thought or word, which is a most rare virtue in a young poet, and without it no one can ever become a writer of national songs. He has acquired the young writer's last-attained grace, simplicity."—Chambers's Journal.

14. Sermons, for the Times, 1856, fp. 8vo; twenty-five in number.

"Perhaps in this book there is a more sustained opposition to the popular religious sentiment of the day than in Mr. Kingsley's former volumes of sermons."—Oxford and Cambridge Mag., Jan. 1856, lxi.

"Whilst furnishing many passages of great power and beauty, it fails egregiously in expounding to the ignorant and irreligious the way of God's mercy."—Edec. Rev.

15. The Heroes; or, Greek Fairy Tales for my Children, 1856, 8vo; 2d ed., 1856, 8vo.

"The Heroes he has chosen are Perseus, the Argonauts, and Theseus: and he tells about them so charmingly that we have read his tales from beginning to end almost as eagerly as they can have been read by the 'Rose, Maurice, and Mary' for whom they were expressly written."—Westminster Rev., April 1856.

Also praised by The Examiner, The Spectator, and The Morning Post.

16. Two Years Ago; a Novel, 1857, 3 vols. p. 8vo.

"Mr. Kingsley has never written any book equal to Alton Locke, and in Two Years Ago we miss almost entirely the characteristic excellencies of the Chartist novel. The narrative is disconnected, irregular, confused: the characters frequently pass, repass, and hold long colloquies, without any evident object; the plot is dim, and there is no definable reason why the story should be called Two Years Ago. . . . We cannot help thinking that Mr. Kingsley might advantageously allow his imagination some rest. He will otherwise run the risk of being counted among writers who, having enjoyed one success, continue to multiply failures, until the fatal obscure the success and both are forgotten."—Lon. Athen., Feb. 14, 1857, 212.

The London Leader also condemns this novel; but, on the other hand, it is warmly commended by the Literary Gazette, Feb. 21, 1857; The Examiner, Feb. 14, 1857; The Spectator, Feb. 14, 1857; The Saturday Review, Feb. 21, 1857; The Overland Mail, Feb. 26, 1857; The Athenæum, Feb. 28, 1857; The Critic, March 2, 1857. We give extracts:

"It is, indeed, impossible not to be interested in a tale earnest and right-minded as this novel. . . . It is full of brave, high wise counsel. It recognises all that is to be honoured and speaks as true men ought to speak of women. The whole book is rich in colour, rich in active life and truth."—Lon. Leader.

"Mr. Kingsley has established himself among the finest prose-writers of his age and country. Two Years Ago is a book full of interesting writing, and thousands of persons will read beginning to end with avidity. We are glad to meet Mr Kingsley once more on contemporary ground."—Lon. Spectator.

"It is really a relief to come upon a work of art like this. No one can read Two Years Ago without feeling his love of virtue strengthened, his contempt for every thing mean and base confirmed, and his resolution braced for active exertion."—Lon. Lit. Gazette.

We have also before us five highly favourable opinions on the part of as many American journals, and the following verdict from a distinguished member of the Court of Literary Jurisprudence:

"Although somewhat disconnected and fitful, it has the power, the freshness, the discrimination, and the humanity, which have so widely endeared this industrious and vivid writer. There are splendid passages, and points of keen interest throughout."—H. T. TUCKERMAN.

We have heard Mr. Washington Irving express a very favourable opinion of Mr. Kingsley's talents as a novel-writer, and observed the pleasure with which he received a copy of Westward Ho!—then (1855) just published.

17. Andromeda and other Poems: announced for 1857.

18. Lectures and Essays: announced for 1857, by Ticknor & Fields, of Boston. This vol. will consist of a reprint of a number of the author's Lectures and Essays. Among Mr. Kingsley's minor contributions to the literature of the day are several pamphlets, occasional sermons, papers in the North British Review, Fraser's Magazine, the 8th ed. of the Encyclopædia Britannica, &c., and a Preface to Susanna Winkworth's trans. of the Life of the Rev. John Tauler, of Strasbourg. Reviews (from which we have been able to quote but very briefly) of Mr. Kingsley's characteristics as a writer will be found in Blackwood's Magazine for June, 1855, and the London Quarterly Review (art. Revolutionary Literature) for September, 1851.

He cultivated many branches of knowledge with remarkable success, and in that department to which he was specially attached few were so deeply versed:

"I doubt," remarked President Woolsey, "if any American scholar has ever surpassed him in Latin style."

Kinney, formerly editor of the Newark Daily Advertiser, has contributed many prose and poetical articles to the Knickerbocker Magazine, Graham's Magazine, the journal conducted by her husband, and other periodicals. In 1855, she gave to the world Felicita, a Metrical Romance. Some of Mrs. Kinney's poetical compositions have been very highly commended; but, on the other hand, Felicita was not a little ridiculed by a critic in Putnam's Magazine. (July, 1855.) In 1850, Mr. and Mrs. Kinney removed to Turin, (the former having received an appointment to the Sardinian Mission,) where they now reside.

Kip, F. M. Memoirs of an Old Disciple and his Descendants, N. York, 1848.

Kip, J. 1. Britannia Illustrata, &c. A fine copy of this splendid work, containing more than 380 views, and bound in 5 vols. imp. fol., (date of 1724,) was advertised by Mr. H. G. Bohn, in his Catalogue for 1841, p. 1533, £33; another in his Catalogue for 1848, p. 131, £31 10s. To these Catalogues, and to Lowndes's Bibl. Man., 1075, we refer the reader for particulars of dates, &c. of this valuable series of plates. Bohn's copies contained complete sets of the famous Views of Audley End, by Henry Winstanley.

Kip, William Ingraham, D.D., b. Oct. 3, 1811, in the city of New York, was educated at Rutgers College, and at Yale College; ordained deacon in the Prot. Epis. Church, 1835; stationed successively at St. Peter's Church, Morristown, New Jersey, at Grace Church, New York, (as assistant minister,) and at St. Peter's Church, Albany; consecrated Missionary Bishop of California in 1853, and since that date has resided at San Francisco. 1. W. Sewell, Fellow of Exeter Coll., Oxf., 2 eds. By this work and his preceding publications, Bishop Kip has gained an extensive reputation in the literary world. He has also contributed many papers to The New York Review, Church Review, Evergreen, American Monthly Magazine, Churchman, &c., and edited in 1850, with Preface and Notes, the Confessions of a Romish Convert. Since the above was written, we notice a new work upon the Roman Catacombs, by the Rev. Spencer Northcote, Lon., 1857, sm. 8vo.

Kipling, Thomas, D.D., d 1822, Dean of Peterborough, pub. The Articles of the Ch. of Eng. proved not to be Calvinistical, 1802, 8vo, and some other works, and edited the Codex Bezæ Cantab., 1793, 2 vols. fol. See Horne's Bibl. Bib.; Orme's Bibl. Bib. Person considered Kipling one of the best Grecians of his day. The work on the Articles was written in answer to Overton's True Churchman Ascertained.

Kippis, Andrew, D.D., 1725–1795, Unitarian divine, minister of a congregation at Boston, Lincolnshire, 1746, of another at Dorking, 1750, and of another at Westminster, 1753, was the editor of The Library, a periodical, and of Doddridge's Lectures, a contributor to the New Annual Register, the Monthly Magazine, the Gentlemen's Magazine, &c., and pub. a number of Serms., the Life of Lardner, of Captain James Cook, &c. He is, however, best known as the editor and co-author of the new ed. of the Biographia Britannica, of which five vols. fol. were pub., 1778–93, ending abruptly with the article "Fastolff." A part of vol. vi.—Featley–Foster—was printed.

"Of this precious portion there are but two known copies in existence."—Dibdin's Lib. Comp., ed. 1825, 499, q. v., et p. 503.

And see Preface to this Dictionary, p. 5. A vol. of Kippis's Serms. on Practical Subjects was pub. in 1797, 8vo.

This last ed. contains an Appendix by Mr. Spence, an account of the origin and history of the work. To the appendix in the Lon. Gent. Mag., Aug. 1850, The Literary Gazette, The Gardener's Chronicle, Blackwood's Mag., i. 589, n., and especially to the Rev. John Freeman's Life of Mr. Kirby, 1852, 8vo, (and the review of the last in the Athenæum, 1852, 841–843,) we refer the reader. In 1829, Mr. Kirby pub. a vol. of Sermons on the Temptation of Christ, 8vo. The original ed. of the Introduction to Entomology—4 vols. 8vo, pub. at £3 18s.—is now (1857) very scarce. The scientific reader should possess this work, and should add to it Yeate's Institutions of Entomology, Curtis's trans. of Fundamenta Entomologiæ, Barbut's Genera Insectorum, and M. de Reaumur's Mémoires pour servir à l'Histoire des Insectes, Paris, 1734, 6 vols. 4to, worth about £1 10s. to £2 in good binding. But for a country parlour-book, the 7th ed. of vols. i. and ii. of Kirby and Spence's Entomology, now to be had for 5s., will answer the purpose. By all means place by its side the Journal of a Naturalist, Mr. J. O. Westwood's entomological works, Sir Wm. Jardine's ed. of White's Natural History and Antiquities of Selborne, and Sir W. Jardine's Naturalist's Library. See JARDINE, Sir Wm., Bart., No. 5.

Kirkbride, Thomas S., M.D., b. 1802, near Morrisville, Bucks county, Pennsylvania, is descended from ancestors who arrived with William Penn, and the family have always adhered to the doctrines taught by the Society of Friends. The subject of this notice graduated in the Medical Department of the University of Pennsylvania in 1832; was Resident Physician to Friends' Asylum for the Insane, Frankford, Pa., 1832; do. to the Penna. Jour. of Insanity; Winslow's (London) Psychological Journal, &c.

We have heard the eminent publicist, Dr. Francis Lieber,—whose opportunities for observation in European countries have been superior to those of most men,—express the highest admiration for Dr. Kirkbride's sagacity in the exercise of the duties of his responsible and difficult office,—that of a medical director of the insane. Indeed, he is more than a director: he is truly a paterfamilias, and, as such, is beloved and revered by the children of his adoption.

Kirkland, Mrs. Caroline M., formerly Miss Stansbury, a native of the city of New York, is the widow of the late William Kirkland, (post,) for some time Professor in Hamilton College. A residence of two or three days at Detroit and its vicinity gave this lady that intimate knowledge of Western manners which, under the name of Mrs. Mary Clavers, she has communicated to a large circle of readers. 1. A New Home; Who'll Follow? by Mrs. Mary Clavers, N. York, 1839, 12mo.

"We recommend the book to all who have an appetite for what is humorous and graphic in the light literature of America."—Lon. Athenæum, 1840 1082.

"A remarkably clever and amusing book written with much point and humour in a most imperfect, the most lively idea of the life of a settler in the backwoods."—Scotsman.

"We do not know whether Clavers is an assumed or a real name, but we are certain that the book which bears it will confer on its author no unenviable reputation. It is a work of striking merit, such as we do not often meet with in these days of repetition and imitation . . . one of the most spirited and useful works which have yet been produced in this country."—*Prof. C. July, 1847, Mrs. Kirkland assumed the editorial duties connected with the Union Magazine, just commenced in New York. In 1849 the proprietorship of this periodical changed hands, and it was henceforth issued in Philadelphia, under the title of Sartain's Magazine, and conducted by Prof. John S. Hart, assisted until 1851 (to the extent of a monthly contribution) by Mrs. Kirkland.

"Of all its brilliant array of contributors," says Mr. Hart, "there was not one whose articles gave such entire and uniform satisfaction as those of Mrs. Kirkland."—Female Prose-Writers of America, q. v.

"Mrs. Kirkland has attained a success which may well serve as a monitor and guide to those who, upon less judicious plans, are labouring to create an American literature."—R. W. Griswold: ubi supra.

"Unquestionably she is one of our best writers,—has a province of her own, and in that province has few equals. Her most noticeable trait is a certain freshness of style, seemingly drawn, as her subjects in general, from the West. In the second place is to be observed a species of wit, approximating humour, and so interspersed with pure fun, that 'wit,' after all, is nothing like a definition of it. . . . Her perceptive faculties enable her to describe with great verisimilitude."—Edgar A. Poe: ubi supra.

Kirwan, Walter Blake, 1754–1805, a native of Galway, Ireland, educated at the College of the English Jesuits at St. Omer: appointed Prof. of Natural and Moral Philosophy at Louvain; embraced the Protestant faith, 1787, and became minister of St. Peter's Church, Dublin, Preb. of Howth, and minister of St. Nicholas-Without, 1788; Dean of Killala, 1800. Serms., with a Sketch of his Life, 1814, 8vo; 1816, 8vo. This vol.—containing thirteen serms.—is now rare. Some copies are on large paper, r. 8vo, pub. at one guinea. Few preachers of any age have enjoyed the popularity of this divine. Such crowds thronged to hear him that it was found necessary to defend the entrance of the church, where he was to preach, with guards and palisadoes. His success was so great in charity-sermons that Mr. Grattan declared, some time before Kirwan's death, that he had collected in this way £60,000.

"Dr Kirwan preferred our country and our religion, and brought to both genius superior to what he found in either. He called forth the latent virtues of the human heart, and taught men to discover in themselves a mine of charity of which the proprietors had been unconscious. He came to interrupt the repose of the pulpit, and shakes one world with the thunder of the other. The preacher's desk becomes the throne of light."—Mr. Grattan's Speech, June 19. 1792.

"The eloquence of the pulpit has never among us been carried to such perfection, nor have we heard of any preacher in Great Britain to be compared with him in this respect."—Rev. G. Austin: Chirosophia.

See a review of Kirwan's Sermons in the London Quar. Rev., xi. 130–138. When published, they greatly disappointed the expectations of Kirwan's admirers.

"Dean Kirwan's sermons are known to have produced the most extraordinary effects in later times. Persons have gone to church without much fear of being induced, as others had been, to give more to the charity for which the Dean was to preach than they could afford; but, after resisting for some time, they have ended by throwing down their watches and rings, and whatever else of value they had about them."—Lord Brougham: *Contrib. to Edin. "It is not too much to say that the Cyclopædia surpasses every Biblical dictionary which has preceded it; and that I never saw any thing to be desired in such a work which can throw light on the criticism, interpretation, history, geography, and physical science of the Bible It is beautifully printed and is illustrated with fourteen engravings of maps and views, and no more than five hundred well executed woodcuts of subjects of natural history elucidate the Holy Scriptures —Horne's Introduction to the Critical Study of the Holy Scriptures 9th edit vol v p 937

"We regard it as a most important and practically useful contribution to the cause of sound Biblical learning and have no doubt that it will soon take the place in the estimation of scholars, of every compilation of the kind The endowment of so many scholars in the production of a single work each one presenting in a brief compass, the results of a lifetime of research, in precisely the matters where he is most at home could not fail of enriching it with an amount of learning and scholarship to which of course the work of no single mind, however great could pretend"—Biblical Repository

"This work is at once learned convenient and interesting,—especially rich in embellishments It is however the work of many hands, in Great Britain and some even in Germany, and of these some are very loose in their opinions The work is therefore, to be used with great discrimination"—Norton's Biblical Antiq., Phila., 441.

In the Weekly Volume, 1843–45, 126 vols. 18mo edited by Knight. Enlarged, The Old Printer, and the Modern Press, 1854, p. 8vo; 1861, p. 8vo. 11. Volume of Varieties, 1844, 18mo. In the Weekly Volume. This series, 126 vols., is included in Knight's Shilling Volumes, 1844–49, 186 vols. 18mo.

"I have never ceased to consider myself responsible for the general character of the work, although my editorial labours had terminated when about two-thirds of the series were completed) . . . I may confidently state that, in this extensive series, no single work, and no portion of a work, can be found that may not safely be put into the hands of the young and the uninformed with the security that it will neither mislead nor corrupt."—Charles Knight.

Knight, Joseph. Agricultural treatises, 1809, '10.

Knight, Richard Payne, M.P., 1750–1824, noted for his knowledge of Greek literature, was the author of a number of works, among which are the following: 1. An Account of the Remains of the Worship of Priapus, Lon., 1786, 4to. This work—severely censured in the Pursuits of Literature—has been sold for £20.

"One of the most unbecoming and indecent treatises which ever disgraced the pen of a man who would be considered as a scholar and a philosopher."—Pursuits of Lit., 18th ed., 1812, 4to, 115, n.

2. Analytical Essay on the Greek Alphabet, 1791, 4to. Reviewed by Porson in the Lon. Month. Rev. for 1794. See Porson's Tracts, p. 198; Museum Criticum, vol. i. p. 490; Pursuits of Lit., 18th ed., 1812, 4to, 170. 3. The Landscape; a Didactic Poem, 1794, 4to. 4. Review of do., &c., 1795, 8vo. 5. The Progress of Civil Society; a Didactic Poem, 1796, 4to. Parodied in the Anti-Jacobin, probably by Canning. 6. Analytical Inquiry into the Principles of Taste, 1805, 8vo.

"Such stores of reading and reflection have indeed rarely been brought to bear on the subject of criticism; but their effect is sometimes obscured, and sometimes weakened, by want of compression and arrangement. . . . Mr. Knight's style wants, in our judgment, purity, terseness, and elegance. The periods are long and straggling; and the colon perpetually usurps the place of a perfect stop. No one, we are convinced, could read aloud in such a style so as to be intelligible, much less so as to give pleasure."—Edin. Rev., vii. 306, 326.

"I certainly do not assent to the unqualified commendations bestowed on Payne Knight. He is a powerful and coarse rebel, who makes some formidable attacks on the laws and government of philosophical criticism; but he will not, I think, subvert them, nor has he a mind to establish others in their stead. He mistakes the sense in which the word 'terror' is employed by Mr. Burke."—Sir James Mackintosh: Life, vol. ii.

"The style of Mr Knight is more lively, various, and discursive than Mr Alison's, but not so systematic or conclusive. It is the cleverer book of the two, but not the most philosophical discussion of the subject."—Lord Jeffrey: Contrib. to Edin. Rev., Lon., 1853, 12.

"There, too, is Alison's delightful book on Taste, in which the Doctrine of Association is stated with the precision of the Philosopher and illustrated with the prodigality of the Poet. Compare with it Payne Knight's Analytical Enquiry, and, from feasting on the juicy heart of an orange, you are starving on its shrivelled skin."—Prof. Wilson's Essays, vol. iv. 102, Edin. and Lon., 1856.

7. Monody on the Death of the Rt. Hon. C. J. Fox, 1806, 8vo. 8. Dilettanti Specimens of Ancient Sculpture; with Descriptions by R. P. Knight. 200 copies issued at £17 17s. A second vol. was pub. in 1835. 9. Inquiry into the Symbolical Language of Ancient Art and Mythology, 1818, 8vo. Privately printed. New ed. by H. H. Barker, 8vo. 10. An ed. of the Iliad and Odyssey; with a Prolegomena, 1820. The Prolegomena were pub. separately, Leipsic, 1816, 8vo. 11. Alfred; a Romance in Rhyme, 1823, 8vo.

Mr. Knight bequeathed his collection of ancient bronzes, Greek coins, &c., valued at £50,000, to the British Museum. His catalogue of his coins (Nummi Veteres, &c.) was pub. by the trustees in 1830, 4to. He was a contributor to the Edinburgh Review, The Classical Journal, and The Archæologia.

"Despite these two octavo volumes of their dense Richmonds, and such is the leathery, or plodding humidity of their style, (although the subject might have elicited energy from a moderately-instructed pen,) that you can hardly buckle yourself to the perusal of half a dozen pages."—Retrospective Rev., Camp.

Trans. of Bodin's Six Bookes of a Commonwealthe, 1606, fol. 3. General Historie of the Turks, &c., 1603, '10, '31, fol.; 5th ed., with a Continuation by Thomas Nabbes, 1638, fol.; again, with a Continuation by Sir Paul Ryeaut, 1679, fol. Best ed., with a Continuation by Sir Paul Ryeaut and Roger Manley, 1687-1700, 3 vols. fol.

"But none of our writers can, in my opinion, justly contest the superiority of Knolles, who, in his History of the Turks, has displayed all the excellencies that narration can admit. His style, though somewhat obscured by time and sometimes vitiated by false wit, is pure, nervous, elevated, and clear. . . . Nothing could have sunk this author in obscurity but the remoteness and barbarity of the people whose story he relates"—Dr. Johnson: Rambler, No. 122.

"A style and power of narration which Johnson has not too highly extolled. His descriptions are vivid and animated,—circumstantial, but not to feebleness; his characters are drawn with a strong pencil"—Hallam's Lit. Hist. of Europe, 4th ed., 1854, iii. 148.

"Let me strongly recommend Ryeaut's improved edition of Knolles's History of the Turks. . . . What fierce-looking fellows do the PORTRAITS make the originals to have been!"—Dibdin's Lib. Comp.

"Look in old Knolles before you go, and read the siege of Malta: it will make you feel that you are going to visit sacred ground. I can hardly think of that glorious defence without tears."—R. Southey to S. T. Coleridge, March 12, 1804: Southey's Life and Corresp.

4. The Lives and Conquests of the Ottoman Kings and Emperors, to 1610. Continued to, and printed in, 1621. 5. A Brief Discourse of the Greatness of the Turkish Empire. Knowles, George Parker, Genealogist and Heraldic artist, b. at Morton, county of Surrey, England, 1797, is the author of several privately-printed genealogical works. Two of his latest publications of this kind are—1. A Genealogical and Heraldic Account of the Coulthards of Coulthart and Collyn, Chiefs of the Name, from their First Settlement in Scotland in the Reign of Comarus to the Year of our Lord 1854, &c., Lon., 1855, r. 8vo, pp. 23. 2. A Genealogical Account of the Rosses of Dalton, in the County of Dumfries, from their First Settlement in Scotland, &c in the Twelfth Century to the Year of our Lord 1854, 1855, r. 8vo, pp. 8. The sole representative (1857) of the very ancient Scottish family of Coulthart of Coulthart and Collyn is John Ross Coulthart, b. 1807, a banker at Ashton-under-Lyne, of which place he was mayor in 1855. He is the author of a valuable vol. of Decimal Interest-Tables, Lon., 1838, 8vo, (see p. 435 of this Dictionary, and the London Times for Feb. 21, 1845,) and a Report on the Sanitary Condition of Ashton-under-Lyne, 1844. This Report was commended in the House of Lords by the Marquis of Normandy, July 26, 1844, and in the House of Commons by the Earl of Carlisle, (then Lord Morpeth,) March 30, 1847. See Hansard's Parliamentary Debates. Richard Coulthart, of Coulthart and Largmore, d. 1717, author of The Economy of Agriculture, 1688, was the great-great-grandfather of the preceding.

Knowles, Herbert, 1798-1817, a youth of remarkable poetical abilities, first introduced himself to Robert Southey by a poem which the laureate declared to be "brimful of power and of promise." At this time the author, an orphan in destitute circumstances, was being educated at Richmond School, Yorkshire, for a sizarship at St. John's College; but this prospect was clouded by the inability of his friend to continue payment of the necessary expenses. In this strait Southey came to the rescue without any solicitation save from his kind heart, and contributed and raised from others the necessary funds; but in vain, for in two months from this time Knowles was cut off, at the early age of nineteen. For further particulars, see Southey's Life and Correspondence, and an article by Southey on the Cemeteries and Catecombs of Paris, in the London Quarterly Review, xxi. 397-398. The periodical just named quotes the impressive lines by which Knowles is best known.—viz.: Lines written in the Churchyard of Richmond, Yorkshire. This beautiful poem is often quoted as The Three Tabernacles.

"The reader will remember that they are the verses of a schoolboy who had not long been taken from one of the lowest stations in life, and he will then judge what might have been expected from one who was capable of writing with such strength and originality upon the tritest of all subjects."—Robert Southey, ubi supra.

Southey says nothing of his own kind agency in gladdening the last earthly hours of this unfortunate son of song: but let the remembrance of such noble acts never perish from the earth!

Knowles, J. C. Twelve Serms., 1786, 8vo.

Knowles, James, a schoolmaster of high reputation, cousin-german of Richard Brinsley Sheridan, and father of James Sheridan Knowles, the dramatist. 1. New Expositor, Lon., 12mo. 2. Improved ed. of Walker's Pronouncing Dictionary. New ed., 1845, 8vo; again, 1850, 8vo, £1 4s. Contains upwards of 55,000 more words than are given in any former ed. of Walker. Mr. Knowles laboured at it for more than thirty years.

Knowles, James Davis, 1798–1838, a native of Providence, Rhode Island, pastor of the Second Baptist Church, Boston, 1825–1832; Prof. of Pastoral Duties and Sacred Rhetoric in the Baptist Theological Institution at Newton, Massachusetts, 1832–1838. 1. Memoir of Mrs. Ann H. Judson: see JUDSON, MRS. ANNA HASSELTINE. 2. Memoir of Roger Williams, Bost., 1834, 12mo.

Knowles, James Sheridan, a son of James Knowles, (ante,) was born at Cork, Ireland, about 1784, made his appearance early in life as an actor and dramatic author; subsequently taught grammar and elocution at Belfast; travelled over Great Britain as a dramatic lecturer; and has been for a number of years past a Baptist preacher. Such is a brief summary of his biography, which will be found detailed at greater length in the Men of the Time, Lon., 1856. The following is a list of his dramatic productions: 1. The Chevalier de Grillon; an Opera. 2. The Spanish Story. 3. Heraldo. 4. Leo; or, the Gipsey. None of these have been preserved. It was somewhere about this time that Knowles pub. a small vol. of (5) poetical Fugitive Pieces, which was followed by his play of (6) Brian Boroihme, brought out at the Belfast Theatre. We continue the enumeration of his dramatic works: 7. Caius Gracchus; Belfast Theatre, 1815. 8. Virginius; Covent Garden, 1820. 9. William Tell. Drury Lane, 1825. 10. The Beggar's Daughter of Bethnal Green, 1828. 11. Alfred the Great; Drury Lane, 1831. 12. The Hunchback; Covent Garden, 1832. 13. The Wife, a Tale of Mantua; Covent Garden, 1833. 14. The Daughter; Drury Lane, 1836. 15. The Love-Chase. Haymarket, 1837. 16. Woman's Wit. Covent Garden, 1838. 17. The Maid of Marienborpt; Haymarket, 1838. 18. Love; Covent Garden, 1839. 19. John of Procida; Covent Garden, 1840. 20. Old Maids; Covent Garden, 1841. 21. The Rose of Aragon; Haymarket, 1842. 22. The Secretary; Haymarket, 1843. A collective ed. of his Dramatic Works (many of which had been previously pub. separately) was given to the world, in 3 vols. p. 8vo, in 1845, and in 1856 a revised ed. was pub. in 2 vols. cr. 8vo. Mr. Knowles is also the author of (23) Fortescue, a Novel, 3 vols. p. 8vo, 1847; 1849. 24. George Lovell; a Novel, 3 vols. p. 8vo, 1847; 1849. 25. The Rock of Rome; or, the Arch-Heresy, p. 8vo, 1849, 1851. 26. The Idol Demolished by its own Priest, 12mo, 1851, 1852. Mr. Knowles has also contributed many articles to annuals and other periodicals. Since 1849 he has been in receipt of a pension of £200 from Government. In addition to the authority cited above, see Hazlitt's Spirit of the Age; James Montgomery's Lects. on General Lit., Poetry, &c.; Sir Archibald Alison's Essays, Edin. and Lon., 1850, iii. 112, 116; Blackwood's Mag., vii. 307, xxvii. 694, xxxvi. 132, xxxix. 267, xlv. 173, Lon Month. Rev., xciii. 53, cxxviii. 61, cxxx 176; Fraser's Mag., xiii. 451, xiv. 272, with portrait; N. Amer Rev., xl. 141, (by Park Benjamin.)

Sir Archibald Alison blames Mr. Knowles, in company with modern English dramatists generally, for utter disregard of the unities, and the consequent difficulty of an easy comprehension of plots which are embarrassed by a complicated story and lengthened succession of events.

"We have seen many a barrister," remarks the critic, "famed for cross-examination on the north circuit, unable to comprehend, till the piece was half over, the drift of Sheridan Knowles's dramas."—The Romantic Drama: Blackwood's Mag., 1840, and in Essays, iii. 112.

But Mr. Hazlitt—Knowles's "mental father," as the latter styles his friend of many years—does not seem to have considered the dramatist's transgressions in this respect as at all unpardonable:

"Ignorant alike of rules, regardless of models, he follows the steps of truth and simplicity, and strength, proportion, and delicacy are the infallible results. By thinking of nothing but his subject, he rivets the attention of the audience to it. All his dialogue tends to action, all his situations form classic groups. There is no doubt that Virginius is the best acting-tragedy that has been produced on the modern stage."—Spirit of the Age

"The poetry of his dialogue is the poetry of passion: it is kindled up in him by the collision of events, and seems less proper to the man than to the scene: his language is to the purpose; it is not highly ornamented. His dramas are full of impressive groupings, dramatic incidents, the bustle of business, the activity of life: his sentiments subject, scene, and language to the purpose and aim of his play. In this he differs from many writers, and differs for the better. His strength lies in home-bred affections: his Virginius, his Beggar's Daughter, and his Wife of Mantua, all bear evidence of this, and contain scenes of perfect truth and reality, such as no modern dramatist surpasses. He touches the heart and is safe."—ALLAN CUNNINGHAM: Biog. and Crit. Hist. of the Lit. of the last Fifty Years, 1833.

Certainly Mr. Knowles was considered by a late eminent critic to have given ample evidence of his ability to instruct others in the "Rewlis and Cautoles" (to borrow a phrase from King James) of the dramatic art:

"SHEPHERD. 'Heard ye ever of Knowles's Lectures on Dramatic Poetry?'

"NORTH. 'I have. They are admirable, full of matter, elegantly written, and eloquently delivered. Knowles is a delightful fellow and a man of true genius.'"—Noctes Ambros., April, 1830.

Mr. Knowles, as we have already intimated, has been now for some years lecturing upon more important themes than those which formerly elicited his eloquence, and we imagine that he has never regretted his change of profession.

Knox, John, 1505–1572, the famous Scotch Reformer, was a native of Gifford, a village in East Lothian, or of Haddington, the principal town of the county. He was educated at the University of St. Andrew's; ordained a priest before the year 1530; became suspicious of the soundness of the Roman Catholic doctrines about 1535; declared himself a Protestant in 1542; became preacher at St. Andrew's, 1547; carried prisoner to France by a French fleet in the same year; regained his liberty and repaired to England, 1549; officiated as preacher at Berwick, and subsequently at Newcastle; Chaplain to Edward VI., 1552; fled to Geneva on the accession of Queen Mary, 1554; returned to Scotland and renewed his zealous pulpit-ministrations, 1555; accepted the post of preacher to the English congregation at Geneva, 1556; returned home and settled permanently in Scotland in 1559, and from this time laboured assiduously for the promotion of the principles of the Reformation. He was twice married, and had children by both his wives. It was whilst at Geneva, in 1558, that he pub. one of the best-known of his productions,—The First Blast of the Trumpet against the Monstrous Regiment of Women, 16mo,—already noticed by us in our Life of Bishop Aylmer, p. 84 of this Dictionary. The most important of Knox's works—which consist principally of controversial tracts, devotional treatises, and liturgical manuals—is his Historie of the Reformation of Religioun within the Realme of Scotland; in V. Books: with his Life, by David Buchanan, Edin., 1584, 8vo; 1st ed. It will be noticed that this work was pub. after the author's death, who did not finish it. An Account of Buchanan's Interpolations and Omissions will be found in the Appendix No. VI. to Bishop Nicolson's Scot. Hist. Lib., ed. 1776, 109. The 4th, and, until recently, the best, ed. of Knox's History (with several other Pieces, and Life, by Mat. Crawfurd) was pub. in 1732, fol. This was edited by Ruddiman. Another ed., edited by McGavin, was given to the world in 1831, 8vo; 1841, 8vo. But a more correct ed. than any preceding one has been lately put forth—vol. i., 1846, 8vo; vol. ii., 1848, 8vo—by Mr. David Laing. These two vols. were followed by two others—vol. iii., 1854, 8vo; vol. iv., 1855, 8vo—by the same editor, containing other works of the Scotch Reformer. In 1840, 8m. 8vo, the Rev. John Cumming edited The Liturgy of the Church of Scotland; or, John Knox's Book of Common Order. See also Confession of Faith, edited by J. Watson, and Writings of John Knox, in British Reformers, vol. v. We have not lingered long on the life of John Knox; but those who shall be induced, by our recommendation, to refer to the graphic portraiture sketched by the master-hand of Dr. McCrie, will not be disposed to censure us for sending them so soon to his instructive pages. This work—which contains a large amount of biographical and literary matter illustrative of Scotland in the sixteenth century—was first pub. in 1812, 8vo, and has been several times reprinted, edited by Mr. Sinee and also by Mr. Andrew Crichton. Crichton's last ed. bears date 1854 fp. 8vo. But a new ed.—being a portion of a new and uniform issue, in 4 vols. 8vo, of Dr. McCrie's Works, edited by his son, of both his names—was put forth by Blackwood & Sons, of Edinburgh and London, in 1856, 2 Pts., 1 vol. 8vo. Previous to this last impression there had been six eds., (each one being an improvement on its predecessor,) besides several unauthorized issues of the first ed., which was enlarged to nearly double its size in subsequent eds.

"A work which has afforded us more amusement and more instruction than any thing we have ever read upon the subject, and which, independent of its theological merits, we do not hesitate to pronounce by far the best piece of history which has appeared since the commencement of our critical career."—Lord Jeffrey: Edin. Rev., xx. 1–29.

"Hume certainly intended to make the Reformers of Scotland odious and ridiculous. He had great powers of exciting sentiments of this kind on whatever occasion he pleased, and he has certainly succeeded in the instance before us. It is quite necessary, therefore, that a very valuable book lately published by Dr. McCrie should be read. His Life of Knox will correct our present notions in many important points."—Prof. Smyth's Lects on Mod. Hist., Lect. X.

"Dr. McCrie is really a great biographer, such as it has not been the lot of Knox's equals, or even his superiors, always to attain; for, however ably the characters of Luther and Calvin have been treated in the general histories of their times, where has either of them found a biographer like the present?"—Lon. Quar. Rev., ix. 418–433.

Having thus referred the reader to the representatives of the various shades of opinion in matters of Church and State, we may safely leave to him the formation of a proper estimate of the character of this remarkable man. As regards his indomitable energy, fervent zeal, and unconquerable courage, there can be no room for debate. The Regent of Scotland well knew the truth of that which he affirmed when he uttered over the Reformer's new-made grave those memorable words,—more quoted than any epicede since the days of Cicero,—"There lies he who never feared the face of man!"

Knox, William, 1789–1825, a native of Roxburgh, Scotland, is perhaps better known through the medium of Sir Walter Scott's Diary than by his own poetical productions, a collection of which was pub. in 1818 under the title of The Lonely Hearth, and other Poems, 12mo. He also gave to the world Marionne, or The Widower's Daughter, a Christmas Tale: A Visit to Dublin, 1824; Songs of Israel, 1824; The Harp of Zion, 1825; and many contributions, prose and poetical, to the Literary Gazette and other periodicals. A new ed. of The Lonely Hearth and other Poems was pub. in 1847, fp 8vo. Sir Walter Scott, Professor Wilson, and Southey, thought highly of Knox's poetical abilities. See Chambers and Thomson's Biog. Dict. of Eminent Scotsmen, 1855, v. 365–367; Lockhart's Life of Scott.

"His talent there showed itself in a fine strain of pensive poetry, called, I think, The Lonely Hearth, far superior to that of Michael Bruce, whose consumption, by-the-way, has been the life of his verses."—Sir Walter Scott: Diary, Dec. 8, 1825; ubi supra.

Koecker, Leonard, 1785–1858, a native of Bremen, Hanover, the son of a Lutheran minister, emigrated to America in 1813, and practised dentistry in that country until 1822, when he removed to London and continued his business until within a short time of his decease.

"The observations of Dr. Rush concerning the multitude of diseases which proceed from decayed teeth have been fully confirmed of late by Dr. Koecker, (a German dentist, probably without an equal in the world as a dentist.) . . . While in America, he was at the head of his profession there, which is no light praise; for in America the diseases of the teeth are more frequent, more wasting, and better understood, than they are anywhere else on earth. Dr. K. cures many diseases that have always been regarded as incurable, even to the time of our celebrated Mr. Fox, who looks upon the denudations of the gums and alveolar processes in that light . . . Dr. K.'s treatment of denuded nerves, and plugging, or stopping are peculiar to himself, and altogether unrivalled. He has written ably upon these very subjects."—American Writers, No. V., Blackwood's Mag., xvii 201, Feb 1825.

Dr Leonard Koecker, now practising dentistry in Philadelphia, is a son of the subject of our notice.

Kollock, Henry, D.D., 1778–1819, a native of New Providence, N. Jersey, graduated at Princeton College, 1794; was ordained a minister of the Presbyterian Church, 1800, appointed Prof of Theology at Princeton College, 1803; accepted the charge of a congregation at Savannah, Georgia, 1806. A collection of his serms. was pub at Savannah in 1822 in 4 vols 8vo. These are now very rare, and we recently (1857) saw the first three vols. advertised in a London bookseller's catalogue at £2 2s. Dr. Kollock was a disciple of the French school of sacred oratory, and drew large and admiring audiences.

"One of the most ornate yet vehement orators whom our country has produced."—Dr. James W. Alexander's Life of Dr. Archibald Alexander, N. York, 1854, 370.

"There is, perhaps, no part of the Christian world with which the English public are so little acquainted as Brazil, both as to the history and its present state. . . . The general spirit of the book, indeed, is excellent.—the manner more resembling the good, old, plain, straightforward style of our best travellers than the modern fashion of the periods, and the matter for the most part equally curious and engaging, presenting a faithful picture of a very interesting stage in the progress of society."—Robert Southey: Lon. Quar. Rev., xvi. 344–387.

Laing, John. Voyage to Spitzbergen, 1815, '18, '20, 8vo.

Laing, Malcolm, M.P., 1762–1818, a native of Orkney, a member of the bar, has already been noticed by us as editor of the last vol. of Henry's Hist. of Great Britain, 1788. He also edited the Life of James VI., pub. in 1804, and gave to the world two important works of his own. 1. Hist. of Scotland from the Accession of James VI. to the Reign of Q. Anne, 1800, 2 vols. 8vo; 1804, 4 vols. 8vo; 1819, 4 vols. 8vo. This may be considered a continuation of Dr. Robertson's History. In his Prelim. Dissert. on the participation of Mary Queen of Scots in the Murder of Darnley, (first prefixed to the ed. of 1804,) Mr Laing exhibits a laboured argument in proof of the guilt of Queen Mary.

"His merit as a critical inquirer into history, an enlightened collector of materials, and a sagacious judge of evidence, has never been surpassed. If any man believes the innocence of Queen Mary, after an impartial and dispassionate perusal of Mr Laing's examination of her case, the state of such a man's mind would be a subject worthy of much consideration by a philosophical observer of human nature. In spite of his ardent love of liberty, no man has yet presumed to charge him with the slightest sacrifice of his historical integrity to his zeal. That he never perfectly attained the art of full, clear, and easy narrative was owing to the peculiar style of those writers who were popular in his youth, and may be mentioned as a remarkable instance of the disproportion of particular talents to general vigour of mind."—SIR JAMES MACKINTOSH: Edin. Rev., xliv. 2.

"I have just finished a careful perusal of your Dissertation on Mary, and I think myself bound to profess my shame for having ever doubted the atrocious guilt of that princess. Hume and Robertson are intolerably mild. The original documents themselves cannot be read without conviction. Whoever doubts the genuineness of the long letter from Throgmorton, or of Haubert's confession, must either be incorrigibly prejudiced, or altogether unacquainted with the examination of evidence. If she were tried before customary to the examination direct a jury to find her guilty."—SIR JAMES MACKINTOSH. Letter to Laing, 20th July, 1805. In Mackintosh's Life.

"The ardour of Mr. Laing in the cause of liberty is not disgraced by democratic coarseness or theoretic refinement. His enquiry into the controverted question of Mary's participation in the death of Darnley is minute without tediousness and acute without sophistry."—DR. PARR.

"A work which will be found often contributing to explain and illustrate the reign of Charles the First, but absolutely necessary in considering the reign of Charles the Second."—Prof. Smyth's Lects. on Mod. Hist., Lect. XIX., q.v.

"It is a work particularly rich in illustrative notes."—Dilkin's Lib. Comp.

Charles James Fox, a warm friend of Laing, considered this history a work of great value. It has been regretted that so able a historian should not have given more of the results of his investigations to the world.

"Laing was most acute and ingenious."—Sir James Mackintosh.

"Whether I consider his sagacity in explaining causes, his clearness in relating facts, his vigour in portraying characters, or his ingenuity in unfolding and enforcing principles, I shall ever find reason to lament that the continuation of Hume's History was not undertaken by a writer so eminently qualified as Laing was for a work so arduous and so important."—Dr. Parr.

2. The Poems of Ossian; containing the Poetical Works of James Macpherson, in prose and verse, with Notes and Illustrations, 1805, 2 vols. 8vo. The object of the notes and illustrations is to prove the dishonesty of Macpherson, whom the critic handles without gloves:

"Had Macpherson forged a fifty-pound note and got the cash from Laing, he could not have been treated more unworthily: he is looked upon as a highland Catheran, who has made a descent on the Lowlands and marched away with much 'bestial'"—Allan Cunningham: Biog. and Crit. Hist. of the Lit. of the Last Fifty Years.

See Macpherson, James, M.P.

Laing's work elicited answers from Mr. McDonald and the Rev. Mr Graham. See Blackw. Mag., xlvi. 701; Chambers and Thomson's Dict. of Eminent Scotsmen, 1855, iii. 345-349; Lord Cockburn's Memorials of his Own Time, 1856.

The tone of the author is admirable, on account of its manliness, independence, and fearless expression; and there is not a passage in the book that does not supply food for thought and strong suggestive points."—*Lon. Lamb, Lady Caroline, 1785-1828, the daughter of the Earl of Besborough, and wife of the Hon. William Lamb, (now Lord Melbourne,) gained some reputation by three novels and her knowledge of languages. 1. Glenarvon, 1816, 3 vols. 12mo. Glenarvon is supposed to represent Lord Byron. 2. Graham Hamilton, 2 vols. p. 8vo. 3. Ada Reis, 1823, 3 vols. 12mo. Lady Caroline also composed many poems. A biographical notice of her ladyship and a notice of her works will be found in The Annual Biography and Obituary for 1829.

Lamb, Charles, Feb. 16, 1775-Dec. 27, 1834, a native of London, was the son of John Lamb, clerk, servant, &c. to Mr. Salt, a bencher of the Inner Temple. After an early education at the school of Christ's Hospital, and a brief engagement in the South Sea House under his brother John, Charles was so fortunate as to obtain a permanent situation in the accountant's office of the East India Company, which he held from April, 1792, until March, 1825,—retiring on a pension of £450 per annum. A domestic tragedy which occurred in his twenty-second year is connected at once with the most mournful and most pleasing recollections which cluster around the name of the author of Elia. Mary Lamb (Bridget Elia) in a fit of insanity, in the month of September, 1796, suddenly deprived her mother of life: she was proved to be in an unsound state of mind, and by a righteous verdict confided to her brother (by ten years her junior) for safe keeping. How faithfully the tender brother fulfilled this duty,—how anxiously he watched over his patient,—his by the double right of nature and legal obligation,—is familiar to those who knew the least of his history. He now abandoned all hopes of union with one to whom he was deeply attached, and nerved himself to the discharge of his fraternal and filial duties: "I am wedded, Coleridge," he writes to his most dearly loved friend, "to the fortunes of my sister and my poor old father." The father died shortly after his wife had been summoned in so awful and sudden a manner to her account. Mary Lamb enjoyed her brother's affectionate guardianship until his eyes were closed in death, and survived him thirteen years, dying May 20, 1847. To great amiability of disposition she added considerable literary taste, and composed, in conjunction with her brother Charles, four juvenile works,—viz.: 1. Mrs. Leicester's School; or, the History of several Young Ladies, related by themselves, 1808, 12mo. 2. Tales from the Plays of Shakspeare, 1807, 2 vols. 12mo; 10th and last ed., 1855, 12mo. Mr. Charles Knight, in his ed. (1844, 2 vols. 18mo) of this popular work, has added to each Tale a few Scenes from Shakspeare.

"One of the most useful and agreeable companions to the understanding of Shakspeare which have ever been produced. The youthful reader who is about to taste the charms of our great bard is strongly recommended to prepare himself by first reading these elegant tales, which in a short compass, and adopting as much as possible the language of the great original, give each plot and story in a most impressive manner. Even those who are familiar with every line of the original will be delighted with the pleasing and compendious way in which the story of each play is here presented to them."—Lon. Quarterly Review.

3. The Adventures of Ulysses: intended as a Companion to the Adventures of Telemachus, 1808, 12mo; last ed., 1845, med. 8vo. This work is also ascribed exclusively to the pen of Charles Lamb. 4. Poetry for Children, entirely original, 1809, 2 vols. 12mo. For further information respecting Lamb's sister we must refer the reader to Talfourd's Final Memorials of her brother. Charles Lamb's first appearance before the world as an acknowledged author was in 1797, when there appeared in a small 12mo vol. a number of poems by Coleridge, Charles Lloyd, and our author. Lamb's share in this literary copartnership occupies twenty-eight pages, "within which space," says his biographer, "was comprised all that Lamb at this time had written which he deemed worth preserving." In the next year the blank verse of Lloyd and Lamb, which had been contained in the vol just named, was pub in a thin 12mo, under the title of Blank Verse, by Charles Lloyd and Charles Lamb. The vol. met with but little favour from the Monthly Reviewers:

"After a contemptuous notice of The Mourning Muse of Lloyd, Lamb receives his quietus in a line:—'Mr. Lamb, the joint author of this little volume, seems to be very properly associated with his plaintive companion.'"

To this vol. succeeded—1. Rosamund Gray and Old Blind Margaret, 1798, 12mo. Very favourably reviewed in the Lon. Monthly Review for August, 1800.

"For mere pathos, however, all that Lamb has ever done falls far short of his beautiful tale Rosamund Gray. I remember when I first read it, many years ago, I had been very ill and disquieted, and, after resorting to book after book in vain for amusement, I took up the little story. Its simplicity attracted me at once; it opened upon my then fevered imagination with all the freshness of a vernal landscape, and its deep and unpretending pathos won my heart."—Recollections of Lamb.

2 John Woodvil, a Tragedy, with Fragments of Burton, &c., 1802, 8vo. John Woodvil—an imitation of the style of the English dramatists of the age of Elizabeth—was offered to Kemble for the stage, and rejected.

"Godwin's catastrophe had probably rendered him [Kemble] less solicitous to encounter a similar peril,—which the fondest admirers of John Woodvil will not regret that it escaped. While the occasional roughness of its verse would have been felt as strange to ears as yet unused to the old dramatists whom Lamb's Specimens had not then made familiar to the town, the delicate beauties enshrined within it could scarcely have been perceived in the glare of the theatre."—Sir T. N. Talfourd: Sketch of Lamb's Life.

"Mr. Lamb's John Woodvil may be considered as a dramatic fragment, intended for the closet rather than the stage. It would sound oddly in the lobbies of either theatre, amidst the noise and glare and bustle of resort; but there where we have treasured up our hearts' in silence and in solitude it may claim and find a place itself. . . . The defective or objectionable parts of this professedly are imitations of the defects of the old writers: its beauties are his own, though in their manner."—Hazlitt's Lects. on the Dramat. Lit. of the Age of Elizabeth, Lect. VIII. q. v.

Mr. Hazlitt remarks, on another occasion,

"There is much that is exquisite, both in sentiment and expression, in Lamb's play; and the following description of the sports of the forest has a truly antique air, like a passage in Heywood or Shirley:

'To see the sun to bed, and to arise.'

"So far as I was left at leisure, by a more potent order of poetry, to think of the John Woodvil at all, I had felt and acknowledged a delicacy and tenderness in the situations as well as the sentiments, but disfigured, as I thought, by quaint, grotesque, and semantic phraseology."—De Quincey's Recollections of Charles Lamb.

"The passages which we have already quoted are, we trust, sufficient to justify our opinion of the age of the present drama. We might have selected many other passages of equal antiquity. The whole is indeed almost uniformly venerable, and will be justly appreciated by all who are desirous of possessing a complete specimen of the drama in its state of pristine rudeness."—Mr. Brown: Monthly Rev., ii. 90–96.

This contemptuous notice, from which we have extracted the above half-dozen lines, elicits the censure of Sergeant Talfourd in his Sketch of Lamb's Life.

3. Mr. H——; a Farce, 1806; not printed at the time. This piece was unsuccessful at Drury Lane Theatre, although Elliston played the principal character; but it had a great run at the Philadelphia theatre, with Mr. Wood as the hero. 4. Specimens of English Dramatic Poets who lived about the time of Shakspeare, with Notes, 1808, cr. 8vo; often reprinted; last ed., 1854, p. 8vo. A second series of Specimens was pub. by Lamb in Hone's Every-Day Book, under the title of the Garrick Papers.

"He carries us on through whole scenes by a true, unerring motion. His was a poetical mind labouring in poetry."—Dyce's Memoirs of Literature: The Predecessors and Contemporaries of Shakspeare.

"A selection in which are displayed the utmost judgment and taste. The critical notices are extremely valuable, and above any praise of mine."—Southey, on his ed. of Chapman.

"It was only by slow and imperceptible degrees that they won their way to the apprehensions of the most influential minds, and wrought out the genial purpose of the editor in renewing a taste for the great contemporaries of Shakspeare."—Sir T. N. Talfourd: Sketch of the Life of Lamb.

It is much to be regretted that a collection disfigured by so many indecencies ever won its way into public favour; and no man confers a benefit upon society by "renewing a taste for the great contemporaries of Shakspeare" so long as he renews at the same time a taste for their abominable obscenities. But we have already said enough upon this fruitful theme in our lives of Beaumont, Francis; Collier, Jeremy; Congreve, William; Ford, John.

Mr. Macaulay (see his Essays, Lon., 1851, iii. 8–12, and Edin. Rev., Jan. 1841) properly, but too tenderly, rebukes Lamb's sophistical apology for the shocking literary immoralities of the early English dramatists. But no one since the days of doughty old Jeremy Collier has better handled the subject than Christopher North, in his Hour's Talk about Poetry. We give a brief extract:

"It is satisfactory to know that the good sense and good feeling and good taste of the people of England will not submit to be belaboured by editors and critics into unqualified admiration of such enormities. The Old English Drama lies buried in the dust with all its tragedies. Never more will they move across the stage. . . . But the monstrosities we have mentioned are not the worst to be found in the Old English Drama. Others there are that, till civilized Christendom falls back into barbarous heathendom, must forever be unendurable to human ears, whether long or short,—we mean the obscenities. That sin is banished forever from our literature. The poet who might dare to commit it would be immediately hooted out of society and sent to roost in barns among the owls. But the Old English Drama is stuffed with ineffable pollutions. . . . and we cannot, for our part, imagine a Family Old English Dramatist."

"Neither Holland House nor the Edinburgh Review can make men permanently overlook the glaring defects of the Old English Drama apart from Shakspeare. Its extravagance, its conceits, its indecency, its constant delineation of profligate characters, have blinded men, and veiled them justly to its vigour, its variety, its exquisite occasional beauty. Real excellence needs no bolstering. Holland House is not required to keep Milton or Pope afloat; the fame of Homer is greater than it was a thousand years ago; every successive generation is charmed by the delicacy of Virgil's taste and fascinated by the vigour of Dante's conceptions."—Sir Archibald Alison: Essays, Polit., Hist. and Morell., Edin. and Lon., 1850, ii. 116; The Romantic Drama, originally pub. in Blackw. Mag., Aug. 1846.

5. Works in Verse and Prose, 1818, 2 vols. 18mo. This collection includes nearly all that Lamb had then written. 6. The Essays of Elia, 1823. 7. The Last Essays of Elia, 1833. Often reprinted; best ed., (separately pub.,) 1853, 12mo. The Essays were originally pub. as fugitive pieces in the London Magazine, &c.

"They are carefully elaborated; yet never were works written in a higher defiance to the conventional pomp of style. A sly hit, a happy pun, a humorous combination, lets the light into the intricacies of the subject and supplies the place of ponderous sentences. Sacking his materials for the most part in the common paths of life,—often in the humblest,—he gives an imperishable to every thing, and sheds a grace over all."—Sir T. N. Talfourd: Sketch of the Life of Lamb.

"The prose essays under the signature of Elia form the most delightful section amongst Lamb's works. They traverse a peculiar field of observation, sequestered from general interest; and they are composed in a spirit too delicate and unobtrusive to catch the ear of the noisy crowd clamouring for strong sensations. . . . They resemble Addison's papers also in the diction, which is natural and idiomatic even to carelessness. They are equally faithful to the truth of nature."—De Quincey's Biographical Essays: Charles Lamb.

"As a dramatic writer Lamb was sadly deficient in plot and constructiveness. But as a critic his merits were of a higher order; and he is entitled to stand nearly in the first rank. His reputation will, however, ultimately rest on the Essays of Elia, than which our literature rejoices in few things finer."—D. M. Moir's Poet. Lit. of the Past Half-Century.

"Shakspeare himself might have read them and Hamlet have acted them; for truly was our excellent friend of the genuine line of Yorick."—Leigh Hunt: London Journal.

"His prose essays and sketches of men and manners are in a bolder and happier spirit [than his verses]: there is a quaint vigour of language, a fanciful acuteness of observation, and such true humanities and noble sensibilities sparkling everywhere, as rank him among the most original critics of the age."—Allan Cunningham: Biog. and Crit. Hist. of the Lit. of the Last Fifty Years.

"Elia in his happiest moods delights me: he is a fine soul; but when he is dull his dullness sets human stupidity at defiance. He 's like a well-bred, ill-trained pointer. He has a fine nose, but he won't or can't range. He keeps always close to your foot, and then he points balks and trimmer. You see him snuffing and smoking and brandishing his tail with the most impassioned enthusiasm, and then, drawn round into a semicircle, he stands beautifully dead set. You expect a burst of partridges or a towering cock-pheasant, when, lo and behold! away flits a lark, or you discover a mouse's nest, or there is absolutely nothing at all. Perhaps a shrew has been there the day before. Yet, if Elia were mine, I would not part with him for all his faults."—Tickler: Noctes Ambrosianæ, April, 1822.

Having considered Lamb as an essayist and as a dramatist, we must not conclude without a brief notice of his characteristics as a poet and as a conversationist.

Charles Lamb as a Poet.

"Charles Lamb was a true poet, but not a great one. His genius was peculiar and wayward, and his mind seemed so impregnated with the dramatists preceding or cotemporary with Shakspeare,—Marlowe, Webster, Ford, Shirley, Marston, Massinger, and their compeers—that he could not help imitating their trains of thought. Yet he struck out a few exquisite things,—sparks from true genius which can never be extinguished: as The Old Familiar Faces; To Hester; The Virgin of the Rocks; and the descriptive forest-scene in John Woodvil, which it is said Godwin, having found somewhere extracted, was so enchanted with, that he hunted—of course vainly—through almost all the earlier poets in search of it:

'To see the sun to bed, and to arise,' &c."

—Moir's Poet. Lit. of the Past Half-Century.

"There is much quaint feeling in his verses: he has used the style of the good old days of Elizabeth in giving form and utterance to his own emotions; and, though often unelevated and prosaic, every line is informed with thought or with some vagrant impulse of fancy. . . . He gives portraits of men whose manners have undergone a cityexchange; records sentiments which are the true offspring of the mart and the custom-house, and attunes his measure to the harmony of other matter than musical breezes and melodious brooks."—Allan Cunningham: Biog. and Crit. Hist. of the Lit. of the Last Fifty Years.

"All the great poets of the day have shown strong dramatic power in their narrative or heroic poems. We see no reason why Mr. Lamb should not be classed along with these writers. He is probably better acquainted and more deeply imbued with the spirit of the tragic genius of England than any of them."—Blackwood's Mag.

"His poetical productions are very limited, but they are sufficient, both in quality and quantity, to secure for him a prominent station among the poets of Great Britain."—Mrs. S. C. Hall.

"Those, therefore, err, in my opinion, who present Lamb to our notice amongst the poets. Very pretty, very elegant, very tender, very beautiful verses he has written; nay, twice he has written verses of extraordinary force,—almost demoniac fierce,—viz.: The Three Graves and The Gipsy's Malison. But, speaking generally, he writes verses as one to whom that function was a secondary and occasional function; not his original and natural vocation,—not an ἔργον, but a παρέργον."—De Quincey's Recollections of Charles Lamb.

Charles Lamb as a Conversationist.

"Many of Lamb's witty and curious sayings have been repeated since his death, which are worthy to be held in undying remembrance; but they give no idea of the general tenour of his conversation, which was far more singular and delightful in the traits which could never be recalled than in the epigrammatic turns which it is possible to quote. It was fretted into perpetual eddies of verbal felicity and happy thought, with little tranquil intervals reflecting images of exceeding elegance and grace. He sometimes poured out puns in startling succession, sometimes curiously contrived a train of sentences to introduce the catastrophe of a pun, which in that case was often startling from its own demerit."—Sir T. N. Talfourd: Sketch of the Life of Lamb.

"It is forever to be regretted that so many of Lamb's jests, repartees, and pointed sayings should have perished irrecoverably; and from their fugitive brilliancy (which, as Serjeant Talfourd remarks, often dazzle too much to allow of the memory coolly retracing them some hours afterwards) it is also to be regretted that many have been improperly reported."—De Quincey's Recollections of Charles Lamb.

"Nor is he otherwise in company than he is on paper: his wit is unwearied, and his gentleness of heart ever uppermost, save when he chooses to be sarcastic; and then, he soothes whomever he offends, by some happy and unlooked-for compliment."—Allan Cunningham: Biog. and Crit. Hist. of the Lit. of the Last Fifty Years.

"This was the case formerly at L——'s, where we used to have many lively skirmishes at their Thursday evening parties. I doubt whether the Small-coal man's musical parties could exceed them. Oh for the pen of John Buncle to consecrate a petit souvenir to their memory! There was L. himself, the most delightful, the most provoking, the most witty and sensible, of men. He always made the best pun and the best remark in the course of the evening. His serious conversation, like his serious writing, is his best. No one ever stammered out such fine, piquant, deep, eloquent things in half a dozen sentences as he does. His jests scald like tears; and he probes a question with a play upon words. What a keen, laughing, hair-brained vein of home-felt truth! What choice venom! How often did we cut into the haunch of letters while we discussed the haunch of mutton on the table! How we skimmed the cream of criticism! How we got into the heart of controversy! How we picked out the marrow of authors!"—Table-Talk: On the Conversation of Authors

It would be hardly an accurate use of language to assert that Lamb is or ever was a "popular writer." In the words of the author's friend of many years,—the English Opium-Eater,—he

"ranks amongst writers whose works are destined to be forever unpopular and yet forever interesting,—interesting moreover by means of those very qualities which guarantee their own popularity. The same qualities which will be found forbidding to the worldly and the thoughtless, which will be found insipid to many even amongst robust and powerful minds, are exactly those which will continue to command a select audience in every generation."—Biographical Essays: Charles Lamb

"His works—I again utter my conviction—will be received as amongst the most elaborately finished gems of literature; as cabinet-specimens which express the utmost delicacy, purity, and tenderness of the national intellect, together with the rarest felicity of finish and expression, although it may be the province of other modes of literature to exhibit the highest models in the grander and more impassioned forms of intellectual power. Such is my own intimate conviction."—Ibid.: Recollections of Charles Lamb.

"The glimpses and flashes which Charles Lamb flings over a subject show us more of its bearings than a hundred farthing candles ostentatiously held up by the hands of formal and pragmatical literati. Every thing that rises up before his mind is set before us in vivid beauty. The style of his prose is exceedingly beautiful, in imitation of those rich elder writers of ours, but always easy, simple, graceful, and concise."—Blackw. Mag.

To quote the language of one of the most accomplished critics of the age, on either side of the water,

"Were it only for the peculiar species of fame which Lamb's contributions to the light literature of his country have obtained him,—were it only for the valuable lesson involved in this tributary heritage,—in the method by which it was won, in the example with which it is associated,—there would remain ample cause for congratulation among the real friends of human improvement; there would be sufficient reason to remember, gratefully and long, the gifted and amiable essayist. Instead of the feverish passion for reputation which renders the existence of the majority of professed littérateurs of the present day a wearing and anxious trial, better becoming the dust and heat of the arena than the peaceful shades of the academy, a calm and self-reposing spirit pervades and characterizes the writings of Lamb. They are obviously the offspring of thoughtful leisure; they are redolent of the otium; and in this consists their peculiar charm. We are disposed to value this characteristic highly at a time which abounds, as does our age, with a profusion of forced and elaborate writings."—Henry T. Tuckerman: The Humorist,—Charles Lamb: Characteristics of Literature, First Series, N. York, 1849, 120-170.

There are also notices of Lamb and his writings, by John Forster, in the New Monthly Magazine; by Mr. Patmore, in the Court Magazine; by Mr. Proctor, in the Athenæum; by Mr. Moxon, in Leigh Hunt's London Journal; also an article in Tait's Edinburgh Magazine.

Whatever points of difference may exist between these many critics respecting the character and literary merits of (for he has forbidden us to call them Works) of Charles Lamb, there is probably no one who would not cheerfully endorse the sentiment well expressed by an eminent critic whom we have had occasion to quote on a preceding page of this article:

"We admire his genius; we love the kind nature which appears in all his writings, and we cherish his memory as much as if we had known him personally."—T. B. Macaulay. Critical and Miscellaneous Essays of the Restoration: Works, Lon., 1860, iii. 8; and in Edin. Rev., Jan. 1841.

"Lamb's writings will go down to the latest posterity by the side of Addison, Steele, Johnson, or still greater names, and we at length count more heads and hearts influenced than many works at first more widely popular."—Lon. Quar. Rev.

With his brother, John Lander, (1806-1834,) 1830-31. On the 18th of November, 1830, they were rewarded for their toils and perils by reaching the Atlantic Ocean through the river Nun, (First Brass River,) one of the chief branches of the Niger. On their return home, June, 1831, Mr. Murray gave the brothers one thousand guineas for their journals, which were prepared for publication by Lieut. Beecher, R.N., and issued under the title of Journal of an Expedition to Explore the Course and Termination of the Niger; with a Narrative of a Voyage down that River to its Termination, by Richard Lander and John Lander, 1832, 3 vols. p. 8vo; new ed., 1845, 2 vols. 18mo. 3. With Macgregor Laird and Dr. R. A. K. Oldfield, 1832-34. During a conflict with the savages Lander was wounded by a musket-ball, and died at Fernando Po, Feb. 7, 1834. His brother John sank under the unwholesome effects of the climate, and, with many others connected with this unfortunate expedition, found a grave in a land of strangers. Laird and Oldfield lived to publish an account of the Expedition, (1837, 2 vols. 8vo,) which we have already noticed on a preceding page. See Laird, Macbrair, and Oldfield, Dr. R. A. K. Landon, Letitia Elizabeth. (Mrs. Maclean,) 1802–1838, generally known by her initials,—L. E. L.,—was a native of Brompton, London, the daughter of an army-agent, the niece of Dr. Landon, Dean of Exeter, and the sister of the Rev. Whittington Henry Landon. She commenced writing at an early age, and, some of her poetry meeting with the approval of Mr. Jerdan, editor of the London Literary Gazette, Miss Landon soon became an important contributor to its columns, and indeed, coeditor of the paper. On the 7th of June, 1838, her literary engagements were closed by her marriage to Mr. George Maclean, Governor of Cape Coast Castle, and she shortly afterwards sailed for her new home. She survived her arrival but a few months, her life being suddenly terminated, October 15, 1838, by an accidental over dose of prussic acid, which she was in the habit of taking for hysteric affections and spasms with which she had been for some time afflicted. This appears to be the true version of the story, and there seems to be no necessity, as we certainly have no space, for the discussion of any other theory. For further information respecting this popular author, and critical notices of her writings, the reader is referred to the authorities subjoined. Miss Landon's publications were as follows: 1. The Isle of Adelaide, a Swiss Romantic Tale; and other Poems, 1821, 12mo. 2. The Improvisatrice, and other Poems, 1824, 12mo. 3. The Troubadour, Catalogue of Pictures and Historic Sketches, 1825, 12mo. 4. The Golden Violet, and other Poems, 1826, 12mo. 5. The Venetian Bracelet, The Lost Pleiad, A History of the Lyre, and other Poems, 1829, 12mo. 6. Ethel Churchill, or The Two Brides; a Novel, 1837, 3 vols. p. 8vo; 1834, 3 vols. p. 8vo. 7. Francesca Carrara, a Novel, 1834, 3 vols. p. 8vo. 8. The Vow of the Peacock, and other Poems, 1835, 12mo. 9. Romance and Reality; a Novel, 3 vols. p. 8vo; also in 12mo. 10. Traits and Trials of Early Life, 1846; new ed., 1844, fp. 8vo. This partakes of the character of an autobiography of the author. 11. Duty and Imagination; a Novel, 1838, 3 vols. p. 8vo. 12. Flowers of Loveliness, with Poetical Illustrations, 1838, 4to. After Mrs. Maclean's decease there were pub. (13) The Zenana, and minor Poems, with a Memoir, (by Emma Roberts,) 1829, fp. 8vo. 14. The Life and Literary Remains of L. E. L., (by Laman Blanchard,) 1841, 2 vols. p. 8vo; 1855, 2 vols. cr. 8vo. These vols. contain a Tragedy, and upwards of one hundred pieces in verse and prose, all before unpublished. 15. Characteristics of the Genius and Writings of L. E. L., 1841, p. 8vo. 16. Lady Anne Grasard; a Novel, 1842, 3 vols. p. 8vo. A new collective ed. of her Poetical Works was pub. in 1839, 4 vols. fp. 8vo; again, 1844, 4 vols. 12mo; 1849, 2 vols. 12mo; 1850, 2 vols. 16mo; 1850, 12mo. In addition to the works already enumerated, Miss Landon wrote many fugitive pieces for annuals and periodicals, edited Fisher's Drawing-Room Scrap-Book from 1841 until the year of her marriage, and also edited the Easter Gift and a number of other illustrated works. "Letitia Elizabeth Landon is, next to Sister Joanna, the most successful poetess of our day. She is the L. E. L. of many a pretty poem: nor has she sung only a tender ditty or two and then shut her lips to listen to the applause they brought; she has written much,—sometimes fitfully, sometimes touchingly, and always fluently and gracefully. She excels in short and neat things; yet she has poured out her fancy and her feelings through the medium of a continuous narrative and intricate story. The flow of her language is remarkable: her fancy is ever ready, and never extravagant."—ALLAN CUNNINGHAM: Biog and Crit. Hist. of the Lit. of the Last Fifty Years, 1833.

"Her deficiency alike in judgment and taste made her wayward and capricious, and her efforts seemed frequently impulsive. Hence she gave to the public a great deal too much,—a large part of her writings being destitute of that elaboration, care, and finish essentially necessary in the fine arts, even when in combination with the highest genius, to secure permanent success; for the finest poetry is that which is suggestive. The result as much of what has been studiously withheld as of what has been elaborately given. It is quite apparent, however, that L. E. L. had opened her eyes to these defects, and was rapidly overcoming them; for her very last things—those published in her Remains by Laman Blanchard—are incomparably her best, whether we regard vigorous conception, concentration of ideas or judicious selection of subject. Her faults originated in an enthusiastic temperament and an effervescent fancy and showed themselves, as might have been expected, in an unbridled prodigality of glittering imagery,—her mind, untamed and untutored, ever darting in dalliance from one object to another, like the talismanic bird in the Arabian story."—Mrs's Poet. Sketches of the Fir t Half Century, 1851.

"I should say that it is the young and ardent who most always be the warmest admirers of the larger poems of L. E. L. They are filled with the faith and the fancies of the young. The very scenery and ornaments are of that rich and showy kind which belongs to the youthful taste,—the white rose, the jasmine, the summer gazebo of deep grass and glades of greenest foliage, festal gardens with lamp and flowers, gay cavaliers and jewelled dames, and all that glitters in young eyes and love-haunted fancies. But, among these, numbers of her smaller poems from the first dealt with subjects and sympathies of a more general kind, and gave glimpses of a nobility of sentiment, and a bold expression of her feeling of the unequal lot of humanity, of a far higher character . . . Her prose stories have all the leading characteristics of her poetry. Their theme is love, and their demonstration that all love is fraught with destruction and desolation. But there are other qualities manifested in the tales. The prose page was for her a wider tablet, on which she could, with more freedom and ampler display, record her views of society."—Howitt's Homes and Haunts of the Most Eminent British Poets, vol. ii.

"The indescribable as well as the familiar poetry of the present day sparkles with fanciful yet true descriptions, of which the subjects are, in general, among the most obvious and yet the least noticed, circumstances, recurring every day and every where. The brilliant pictures of Miss Landon's enclosure on the south of Parnassus, where odour, like humming birds are seen flying about in tropical sun-beam, or fluttering over blossoms of all hues and climes, and the home meadows of John Clare, the Northampton shire peasant, whose thoughts like bees, are ever on the wing in search of hues from 'the meanest flower that blows,' are equally productive of those impressions of literature."—James Montgomery's Lect. on General L. t., Pol. &c., Lect. V.

"Not many years before, the death of Elliot Warburton, [a female authoress, whose lyre, as melancholy and not less melodious than that of Sappho, had so deeply moved the British heart—breathed her last upon the sunny shores of Cape Coast Castle. But the poems of L. E. L., of surpassing sweetness and pathos, rivalling those of Mrs. Norton, he well in heart rending sentiment, will long survive their unhappy author, and speak to the heart of generations to which her premature fate will be a lasting subject of commiseration."—SIR ARCHIBALD ALISON: Hist of Europe 1815–1852, chap. [illegible].

"Nonsense, sir! (and being old gentlemen, we may plainly make the paltry rest confidents). There is a passionate purity in all her feelings that endears to me both her heroine and herself character. She is a true enthusiast. Her affections overflow in imagery her fancy lavishes on all the subjects of her song, and colours it with a rich and tender light which makes even confusion beautiful, gives a wrong charm even to indistinct conception, and when the thoughts themselves are full formed and substantial, which they often are, brings them prominently out upon the eye of the soul in flashes that startle us into sudden admiration. The originality of her views, methinks, is conspicuous in the choice of its subjects: they are unhackneyed, and in her least successful poems—as with these—there is no dearth of poetry. Her execution has not the consummate elegance and grace of Felicia Hemans; but she is very young, and becoming every year she lives, more mistress of her art,—and has chiefly to learn now how to use her treasures, which, profuse as she has been are in abundant store. And, in good truth, the fair and happy is one has a fertile imagination: the soil of her mind, if allowed to lie fallow for one sunny summer, would, I predict, yield a still richer and more glorious harvest. I love Miss Landon; for in her genius does the work of duty the union of the two is "beautiful exceedingly,"—and virtue is its own reward, far beyond the highest meed of praise ever bestowed by critic, though round her fair forehead is already wreathed the immortal laurel."—Noctes Ambros., Feb. 1832.

Landor, Walter Savage, poet, soldier, philosopher, essayist, and critic, is a son of Walter Landor, Esq., and his second wife, Elizabeth Savage, and opened his eyes, amidst opulence and refinement, at Ipsley Court, Warwickshire, on the 30th of January, 1775. More than fourscore years, "rich with the spoils of time," have since elapsed, but the boy-author of the last century still "lives a prosperous gentleman," and even to the present day often charms his sympathizing readers with the same verbal eloquence and mental ardour which compelled the reluctant admiration of their more conservative grandsires. The youthful warrior who, in 1808, bred with the love of liberty, still as "the old man eloquent" pours forth a burning torrent of indignant denunciation at the tyrant who has placed his foot upon the neck of an outraged and unresisting nation. There are many, however, who share this generous hatred of oppression, who would be altogether unwilling to justify the extreme measures for its extirpation which Mr. Landor does not hesitate warmly to recommend. The subject of our notice was educated at Rugby School, and at Trinity College, Oxford, was intended for the law, but preferred the cultivation of letters; on the death of his father he resided for some time on the family estates,—which the ingratitude of some of his tenants induced him to sell in 1806; two years later he joined the Spanish patriots under Blake, fought against the ambitious Corsican, and received a colonel's commission in acknowledgment of his services; in 1815 he removed to Italy, where he resided (with the exception of occasional visits to England) for more than thirty years; is now, (1857,) and has been for some years past, living at the town of Bath in England. In 1811 Mr. Landor was married to Julia, daughter of M. J. Huillier de Malperte, Baron de Nieuwevillo. He has three children, and between them he has (Lear-like, but not, we imagine, with Lear's ill success) shared the principal part of his once-ample possessions.

> "Wrapp'd his colours round his breast
> On the blood-red field of Spain,"

Mr. Landor commenced authorship at an early age, and, as we have already intimated, has not, even at the ripe age of eighty-two, entirely renounced the use of the gray-goose quill. Twenty years ago, indeed, he declared that he would "publish nothing more for the remainder of his life," (Letter to Countess of Blessington, 1838, &c.;) but the public generally forget such promises, and in some cases are glad to see that the promiser is equally oblivious. His publications have been as follows: 1. A Collection of Poems, Lon., 1795, 8vo. 2. Gebirus; a Poem, 1802, 12mo. This is the author's trans. into Latin from his English original. Lord Jeffrey declares that the poem is equally unintelligible in both languages. See Edin. Rev., xl. 91-92. Gebir certainly did not meet with an enthusiastic welcome from the public:

"I had the sublime distinction for some time of having enjoyed only two readers, which two were Southey and myself. . . . Not knowing Southey at that time, I vainly conceited myself to be the one sole purchaser and reader of this poem. I even fancied myself to have been pointed out in the streets of Oxford—where the Landors had been well known in times preceding my own—as the one inexplicable man authentically known to possess Gebir, or even (it might be whispered mysteriously) to have read Gebir. It was not clear but this reputation might stand in lieu of any independent fame, and might raise me to literary distinction."—De Quincey's Notes on Landor: Essays on the Poets, &c., Bost., 1853, 247.

Let us hear Southey on the same theme:

"At Bristol I met with the man of all others whom I was most desirous of meeting,—the only man living of whose praise I was ambitious or whose censure would have humbled me. You will be anxious to know who this could be. Savage Landor, the author of Gebir,—a poem which, unless you have heard me speak of it, you have probably never heard of at all."—Letter to G. C. Bedford, Keswick, April 20, 1808: Southey's Life and Corresp.

In a letter to Landor himself, dated April 23, 1809, Southey gives an amusing account of his laudatory review of Gebir in the Critical Review. See Southey's Life and Corresp. See our extract from Southey's Letter to Landor, July 15, 1814, post.

"Walter Savage Landor, the deep-mouthed Dorian of the entire of Byron, is known to the lovers of song by his Gebir Count Julian, —a work less read than it deserves; for it contains passages of peculiar force and no ordinary beauty."—ALLAN CUNNINGHAM: Biog. and Crit. Hist. of the Lit. of the Last Fifty Years, 1838.

Cunningham has not got the title exactly as it should be: he evidently refers to the republication of 1831: see No. 3. The inducement for Byron to satirise Landor will be found in Lady Blessington's Conversations with the noble poet. His lordship makes a very lame excuse for his onslaught, and admits that

"he really is a man whose brilliant talents and profound erudition I cannot help admiring as much as I respect his character,—various proofs of the generosity, manliness, and independence of which have reached me: so you see I can render justice (en petit comité) even to a man who says he could not read my works."

The mortal offence is contained in the last line.

3. Count Julian: a Tragedy, 1812

"I am not disappointed in Count Julian: it is too Greek for representation in these times; but it is altogether worthy of you. The thought and feeling which you have frequently condensed in a single line is unlike any thing in modern composition. The conclusion, too, is Greek. . . . Never was a character more finely conceived than Julian. The image of his seizing the horses is in the very first rank of sublimity: it is the grandest image of power that ever past produced."—Southey to Landor, Keswick, Feb. 12, 1811.

"I look upon Gebir as I do upon Dante's long poem in the Italian,—not as a good poem, but as containing the finest poetry in the language. so it is with Count Julian, and so, no doubt, it was with the play which you have so provokingly destroyed."—Southey to Landor, London, July 15, 1811: ubi supra.

Southey does not mince matters; but that he was quite sincere appears from a letter a few weeks later to Sir Walter Scott:

"I have a tragedy of Landor's in my desk, of which Count Julian is the hero: it contains some of the finest touches both of passion and poetry that I have ever seen."—Keswick, Sept. 8, 1811: ubi supra.

A short review of Julian, by the same ardent admirer, will be found in the London Quarterly Review, viii. 86–92. In 1831, 8vo, appeared a new ed. of Gebir and Count Julian, with other Poems, printed for the benefit of Grace Darling. See Lon. Quar. Rev., lvii. 108; Lon. Monthly Review, cxxv. 217. 4. Idyllica Heroica, Pisa, 1820, 4to. See Lon. Quar. Rev., lvii. 108; Lon. Monthly Rev., xcv. 461. 5. Latin Poems, Lon., 24mo. See Fraser's Mag., xxxvii. 519. 6. Imaginary Conversations of Literary Men and Statesmen, 1824, 2 vols. 8vo; 2d ed., 1826, 3 vols. 8vo. Second Series, 1829, 2 vols. 8vo. Repub. with addits. in the collective eds. of his works, 1846, 2 vols. med. 8vo; 1854, r. 8vo. 7. Imaginary Conversations of Greeks and Romans; new ed., 1853, 8vo. The author was not the coldest admirer of his own performances:

"My four vols.," he remarks, "contain more than seventy dialogues: let the sturdiest of the connexion (some of the critics) take the ten worst, and if he equals them in ten years I will give him a hot wheaten roll and a pint of brown stout for breakfast."

The dialogues, as they appear in the collective eds. of the author's works in 1846 and '54, amount to one hundred and twenty-five, and many of those formerly printed have been modified and enlarged. The Imaginary Conversations have received a large share both of praise and censure, and are thought to display great inequality. The London Quarterly Reviewer, referring to Mr. Landor's challenge, seems to think that it would be hopeless for almost any writer to attempt to rival the best, but continues:

"To attempt a rivalry with the ten worst would require an impudence of another description,—a brazen front, the exaggeration of caricature, and wit bordering on buffoonery."—Lon. Quar. Rev., lviii. 108.

Lord Jeffrey's notice of the first vol. does not commence in the most complimentary manner possible:

"This work is as remarkable an instance as we have lately met with of the strength and weakness of the human intellect. It displays considerable originality, learning, acuteness, terseness of style, and force of invective; but it is spoiled and rendered abortive throughout by an utter want of temper, of self-knowledge and decorum."—Edin. Rev., xl. 67, 92. q. v.

The best description that we have seen of the Imaginary Conversations occurs in the periodical from which we have just quoted, in a review of the collective eds. of Landor's Works, 1846, 2 vols. med. 8vo. After specifying certain faults with which the critic thinks them justly chargeable, he proceeds:

"But, these drawbacks stated, how little in reality do they affect the great bulk of these Conversations! What a weighty book they make! How rich in scholarship! how correct, concise, and pure in style! how full of imagination, wit, and humour! how well informed, how bold in speculation, how various in interest, how universal in sympathy! In these hundred and twenty-five dialogues—making allowance for every shortcoming or excess—the most familiar and the most august shapes of the past are reanimated with vigour, grace, and beauty. Its long-dead embers, kindle suddenly their wonted fires, and again shoot up into warmth and brightness. 'Large utterances,' musical and varied voices, 'thoughts that breathe' for the world's advancement, 'words that burn' against the world's oppression, sound on throughout these lofty and earnest pages. We are in the high and goodly company of wits and men of letters; of churchmen, lawyers and statesmen; of party-men, soldiers, and kings; of the most tender, delicate, and noble women; and of figures that seem this instant to have left for us the Agora or the schools of Athens, the Forum or the Senate of Rome. At one moment we have politicians discussing the deepest questions of state; at another, philosophers still more largely philosophizing,—poets talking of poetry, men of the world of worldly matters, Italians and French of their respective Literatures and Manners."—lxxxiii. 489.

"His Imaginary Conversations is the work on which his fame—a worthy and well-earned fame—will rest. From his great experiences of men of various nations, and his familiar acquaintance with both ancient and modern literature, he has been enabled to introduce the greatest variety of characters and topics, and to make the dialogues a perfect treasury of the broadest and most elevated axioms of practical wisdom."—Howitt's Homes and Haunts of the Most Eminent British Poets.

"A work generally and justly admired for the originality of thought, the depth of reflection, and the free and fearless spirit of inquiry which it exhibits, and for the style—always animated and ever powerful—in which it is written."—Dr. Parr: Field's Life, ii. 140.

"The bookseller sent me the first volume of your unpublished series. Some things in it I wished away, with very many more, you know truly, I must be delighted. Lucullus and Cæsar especially pleased me, as one of the most delightful of these conversations throughout."—*Southey to Landor, April 14, 1823. "It is much superior in execution to the well known Dialogues of the Dead by Lyttelton."—Gentlemen's E. C. Lib. Mem., 100.

"In our own time, Walter Savage Landor has adopted and improved upon the model of Lyttelton and when his heroes talk they are certain to say something new."—Lawrence's Lives of the British Historians: Life of Lord Lyttelton.

"Mr. Landor has shown by this work that he possesses much intellectual acuteness, great clearness and vigour of understanding, and a considerable ... ments of the human heart. We conceive this work to include a greater proportion of profound and original thinking, of moral and political wisdom, of elegant scholarship of acute criticism and of eloquent, poetical, and just expositions and enforcements of all these, than will be found in the same number of consecutive pages in any other work of the day."—*Lon. 8. Pericles and Aspasia. 1836. 2 vols 12mo.

"There is another characteristic of Landor's writings, which I mention the more distinctly from the fact that it seems not to have much attracted the admiration even of his admirers—and that is the depth, and tenderness of feeling which they breathe. Pericles and Aspasia, especially is full of the sweetest and truest expressions of sensibility, and scarce many of the dialogues. We are frequently forced to drop the book and retire into ourselves to the visions and memories, soft or sad which his words awaken and cause to pass before the mind."—GRISWOLD STILLMAN BELLOWS: Preface to his Selections from the Writings of Walter Savage Landor. Bost., 1850, 18mo.

"The author, by a strange principle of calculation, seems to reckon upon its very poverty of merit as a passport at least to its circulation. The greater part of readers care for little else than to be pleased with what they read: but if the ... others of an opposite temper, it cannot be denied that Mr Landor has here written with sufficient mediocrity to secure their attention."—*Lon Quar. Miss Mitford perhaps asserts more than we should find it convenient to prove, when, in her chapter on "Poetry that Poets Love," she declares,

"To no one can the words that I have placed at the head of this paper apply more properly than to Mr. Landor. No poetry was ever deeper to poets than his. Nearly fifty years ago we find Southey writing of and to the author of Gebir with a respectful admiration such as few young man for another; and from that hour to the present, all whom he would himself most wish to please have showered upon him praises that cannot die."—Recollections of a Literary Life.

A very acute critic remarks that,

"With many high excellences Landor's poetry must ever remain a sealed book to the multitude; for whoever prefers to the obviously sublime, beautiful, and true, the grotesque, the visionary, and the involved, must be admired by the capricious select who can alone relish such elements in composition. . . . The style, tone, idiom and manner of Landor are all quite un-English. He never acquired the Saxon gemality of his mother tongue, and his Gebir, Count Julian and many of his other poems read exactly like translations closely rendered."—Man's Sketches of the Poet. Lit. of the Past Half Century.

Southey, however, declares that

"Landor always paints with the finest touch of truth, whether he is describing external or internal nature."—Life and Corresp.

"The poetry of Savage Landor has not been so much read as his prose. His Imaginary Conversations have eclipsed his verse. Yet there is great vigour, much satire, and much tender feeling in his poems, which should render them acceptable to all lovers of manly feeling."—Howitt's Homes &c. of the Poets.

That Landor is not a popular author, either in poetry or prose, it requires no argument to demonstrate; that he will always maintain a high rank as an English classic we can entertain no doubt.

"Landor," says an American traveller, "is strangely undervalued in England, meanly ignored, and sometimes savagely attacked in the Reviews. The criticism may be right or wrong, and is quickly forgotten, but year after year the scholar must go back to Landor for a multitude of elegant sentences, for wisdom, wit, and indignation that are unforgettable."—Emerson's English Traits.

"Had Mr Landor therefore been read in any extent answering to his merits he must have become for the English public, an object of no slight personal interest. We should have had morals upon him; compacts upon him; life is upon him; he would have been shown as dramatically upon the stage he would, according to the old joke have been 'traduced' in French, and also 'Covent' in Dutch. We assume, he has not been read. It would be an affectation to think it."—De Quincey's Notes on Landor, Bost., 1853, 24.

The personal manners of Mr. Landor have been more than once described: Mr. Emerson, in the work from which we have just quoted, dwells on them at some length; and the portrait which the Countess of Blessington has given us presents an agreeable picture of the Reformer in his "hours of ease." Of him, as of his Scotch predecessor in reformation—though in a different field—it may be truly said "he never feared the face of man;" and it would appear from his gallant bearing at the evening conversazione, after a day of literary toil in the library, that the face of woman (especially such as that of our fair informant) possesses as few terrors.

"I had learned from his works," remarks her ladyship, after meeting Landor at Florence in May, 1828, "to form a high opinion of the man as well as the author. But I was not prepared to find in him the courtly polished gentleman of high breeding, of manners, deportment, and demeanour that we might expect to meet with in one who had passed the greater part of his life in courts. There is no affectation of politeness, no finikin affability in his naturally manly, but blended complimentary hyperbolical strain of eulogy in the ingredients of his conversation with women and the pleasing things he says to those whom he cares to please."

It will doubtless surprise many worthy conservatives, who consider Landor the implacable enemy of all that they hold most dear in lofty and fondly cherished theories, to see their foe thus strangely translated from the department

Lord Nugent to that of Mary Russell Mitford, or to the ship's surgeon in this zoological heresy there can be no question, for her biographer tells us:

"Of all the literary men with whom Lady Blessington came in contact—and they certainly were not few or undistinguished—at home and abroad, the person whom she looked on with most respect, honour and affectionate regard was Walter Savage Landor."—Madden's Literary Life and Corresp. of the Countess of Blessington.

Lanfranc, 1005?–1089, a native of Pavia, Italy, studied rhetoric and civil law at Bologna, opened a school at Avranches, in France, and subsequently at the Abbey of Bec, of which he had become a monk in 1041, and prior in 1044; abbot of the new monastery of St. Stephen, at Caen, 1062; Archbishop of Canterbury, 1070. His schools were crowded with illustrious scholars, and the fame of his genius and erudition was sounded throughout Europe. His works—which consist of commentaries on St. Paul's Epistles and on the Psalms, sermons, letters, a treatise on confession, and a celebrated treatise on the Eucharist, against Bérenger—were pub. collectively by Lucas D'Achery, Paris, 1648, fol.; at Venet., 1745, fol.; and recently by J. A. Giles, LL.D., Oxon., 1844, 2 vols. fol. For eds. of some of his treatises and a more particular account of his life, see Wright's Biog. Brit. Lit. Langbaine, Gerard, D.D., 1608–1657, Fellow of Queen's Coll., Oxf., pub. an ed. of Longinus, Oxf., 1636; 38. 8vo; Trpj. ad Rh., 1694; some works upon the Liturgy, the Univ. of Oxford, &c., and left some valuable MSS. which have been used by succeeding writers. See Athen. Oxon.; Gent. Dict.; Lloyd's Memoirs; Usher's Life and Letters.

Langbaine, Gerard, 1656-1692, son of the preceding, is well known as the author of a work entitled (in its complete shape) An Account of the English Dramatic Poets, &c., Oxf., 1691, 8vo. An abstract, with a continuation, was pub. by Gildon in 1699, 8vo, and in 1719 by Miles Jacob. Langbaine first called his book Momus Triumphans, 1688, 4to; then A New Catalogue of English Plays, 1688, 4to. The copy of his work, with Oldys's MS. notes, now in the British Museum, is sometimes referred to by writers. See Athen. Oxon.; Biog. Dramat.; Warton's Hist. of Eng. Poet.; Brydges's Phillips's Theat. Poet. Anglic., lxxiv., lxxvi.; Lon. Gent. Mag., lxxvi. 37. Langbaine's Account bears a high character for accuracy, but his criticisms have been ridiculed. He tells us that he had in his library above 980 English plays and masques, besides several drolls and interludes.

"She was undoubtedly an amiable and excellent woman."—Edin Rev., April, 1856.

Mr. Langdale disproves the reflections cast upon Mrs. Fitzherbert's character by Lord Holland in his Memoirs. The state of the case respecting Mrs. Fitzherbert and the Prince of Wales was briefly this: in the sight of God and by the judgment of the Church of Rome (as declared by the Pope) they were man and wife; in the sight of the laws of England the marriage was a nullity. Of the unimpeachable, immaculate, and truly exemplary character of "Mrs. Fitzherbert's husband" (as Caroline of Brunswick styled The First Gentleman of England) we shall not permit ourselves to speak. Nor does it become the character of our book: the Prince of Wales has no claims as an author,—excepting, indeed, the authorship of profligacy, misery, and vice to the unhappy beings who fell within the circle of his deleterious influence.

Langeland, Langland, or Longland, Robert, one of the first disciples of Wicklif, and a secular priest, was a Yorkish of Oriel Coll., Oxf. He is the reputed author of a satire upon Church and Abbey, (supposed to have been completed about 1369,) entitled the Vision and the Creed of Piers Ploughman. Of this alliterative poem, the three first eds. were printed in 1550, and a number since; the last one—pub. 1842, 2 vols. 12mo, 500 copies printed—was edited by the learned antiquary Thomas Wright. Dr. L. has been a contributor to the Penny Cyclopædia, The English Cyclopædia, &c.

Lanman, Charles, b. 1819, at Monroe, Michigan, after a mercantile education in New York from 1835 to '46, determined in the latter year to cultivate literature as a profession, and has given evidence to his many readers that he has not mistaken his calling. He has been connected editorially with the Monroe Gazette, the Cincinnati Chronicle, the New York Express, and—from 1847 to the present date, 1857—with the National Intelligencer, and has contributed also to the columns of the Southern Literary Messenger, Bentley's Magazine, and The New York Observer. Many of his fugitive letters, originally pub. in periodicals, Mr. Lanman has since collected into volumes, thus preserving in a permanent shape for the instruction and entertainment of his readers the results of his extensive and intelligent observations. We annex a list of his publications, with a few brief extracts from the numerous commendations which they have elicited from public and private sources. 1. Essays for Summer Hours, Bost., 1842, 12mo; 3d ed., 1853, 16mo. 2. Letters from a Landscape-Painter, Bost., 1845, 12mo. A portion of this work was reprinted in No. 6. 3. A Summer in the Wilderness, N. York, 1847, 12mo. Noticed in the N. Amer. Rev., lxix. 422, (by Prof. Francis Bowen,) and in the American Review, (by G. H. Colton.) 4. A Tour to the River Saguenay, Phila., 1848, 12mo.

"These Letters have many graphic touches which show the artist-eye of their ingenious author. They contain lively sketches of natural scenery and amusing narratives of travelling-incidents. At times a striking poetical expression flashes upon us, illuminating the page like a gleam of light. The Letters are very readable and pleasant."—J. G. PALFREY, N. Amer. Rev.

5. Letters from the Alleghany Mountains, N. York, 1849, 12mo.

"As descriptive of the scenery of Georgia, Tennessee, and North Carolina,—a district strangely neglected by travellers,—this volume has original merits. It paints the wilderness in vivid colours,—but renders, at the same time, express homage to civilization."—Lon. Athenæum, 1849, 1128-1129.

"Some of the scenes depicted in this volume are of startling interest, and every passage bears unmistakable evidence of the man of genius."—GEORGE D. PRENTICE: Louisville Journal

This is a 2d ed. of No. 6. 9. Private Life of Daniel Webster, 1852, 12mo; Lon., 1853, p. 8vo. Mr Lanman was private secretary to Daniel Webster, and relinquished his post as Librarian of the War Department, at Mr. Webster's request, to accept of the secretaryship.

10. Adventures in the Wilds of the United States and British Provinces, with an Appendix on Moose Hunting, by Lieut. Campbell Hardy, (see HARDY, LIEUT.,) Phila., 1856, 2 vols. 8vo. This is a republication of Nos. 3, 4, 5, and 6, with the addition of three tours not before pub. in book form,—viz.: I. The Sources of the Potomac, 1851, II. A Tour to the River Restigouche, 1853; III. A Winter in the South, 1854. The author was encouraged in the design of this collective edit. by the following letter from Washington Irving:

"I am glad to learn that you intend to publish your narrative and descriptive writings in a collective form. They carry us into the fastnesses of our mountains, the depths of our forests, the watery wilderness of our lakes and rivers, giving us pictures of savage life and savage tribes, Indians' legends, fishing and hunting anecdotes, the adventures of trappers and backwoodsmen,—our whole aboriginal, in short, of indigenous poetry and romance. To use a favourite phrase of the old discoverers, they lay open the secrets of the country to us. I cannot but believe your work will be well received, and meet with the wide circulation which it assuredly merits."

Mr. Edward Everett also warmly advocated the enterprise.

We quote a few lines from another letter of Mr. Irving's, written, it will be seen, after the book of Adventures was launched upon the world:

"I hope the success of your work has been equal to its merits. To me your Adventures in the Wilds of America are a continual refreshment of spirits. I take a volume of your work to bed with me after tugging with my pen, and then ramble with you among the mountains and by the streams in the boundless interior of our fresh unblackeyed country, and regret that I can do so only in idea, and that I am not young enough to be your companion in reality. . . . You are in fact the Picturesque Explorer of our country."—Sunnyside, March 2, 1857.

No. 4 was pub. in London by Bentley, 1847, p. 8vo, under the title of Adventures of an Angler in Canada; and Longman pub. in 1854, p. 8vo, under the title of Adventures in the Wilds of America, a compilation (made by Charles Richard Weld, Esq.) from No. 10. These vols. were well received by the English public.

"The author is largely and justly popular in America, as one of the most pleasant sketchers who have followed in the footsteps of The Sketch-Book. Nor is he unknown or unappreciated in this country, in which it has been our very agreeable task to pay tribute to his merits. The periodical press of America has come to be vide of such contributors as Mr. Lanman."—WILLIAM JERDAN, in the Lon. Lit. Gazette.

"Mr. Lanman writes like a man who observes acutely and describes with spirit and intelligence, rather than one profound as a naturalist, a geographer, or a politician. The charm of the work is its realness, if there be such a word; or, if there be not, then its reality. The reader feels that he is accompanying a clever and truthful guide."—CHARLES DICKENS, in the Lon. News.

Mr. Lanman is yet a young man, and has certainly received encouragement to induce him occasionally to resume the authorial pen whenever he finds time to tell a story and—happier than the philosophic knife-grinder of Canning—finds that he has a story to tell. Since the above was sent to the press, we notice the following in a paper of the day. (August, 1857.)

"Mr. Charles Lanman, the author, and formerly private secretary to Mr. Webster, has been appointed to a similar position by Mr. Thompson in the Interior Department. The last public position held by Mr. Lanman was that of Examiner of Depositaries, under President Pierce."

We should not omit to state that the subject of our notice is a grandson of the late Judge James Lanman, of Norwich, who was a graduate of Yale College, Connecticut, of the class of 1788, a member of the Senate of the United States from 1819 to '21, a holder of many other offices of honour and responsibility, and a "man had in reputation among all the people" for public spirit, private virtues, commanding influence, and extensive usefulness. May the memory of such be ever fresh in the hearts of the people! Judge Lanman's second wife was the mother of Mr. Parke Benjamin, a well known son of song, already justly censured in this volume as a talent-burier,—as one who, possessing ample ability to write well, can hardly be persuaded to write at all. We must confess, however, that such frugal poets give far less trouble to Dictionary makers, like ourselves, than their more fertile brethren of the lyre who err in the opposite extreme.

Lardner, Rev. Dionysius, LL.D., one of the most distinguished natural philosophers and mathematicians of modern times, was born April 3, 1793, in the city of Dublin, educated at Trinity College, in his native place; accepted the professorship of Natural Philosophy and Astronomy in the London University (now University College) in 1828; resided in the United States from 1840 to '45, and since the latter year has been settled in Paris. Whilst in America Dr. Lardner delivered Popular Lectures on Science and Art in all the principal cities of the Union, which have been pub. in 2 vols. 8vo, and reached the 15th ed. in 1855. Dr. Lardner is the author of many valuable works on different branches of mathematics, natural philosophy, &c., which have conferred an extensive reputation upon their learned author. Dr. Lardner has also contributed articles on Algebra, Trigonometry, Natural Philosophy, &c. to the Edinburgh Encyc., the Encyc. Metropol., the Library of Useful Knowledge, the Edin. Rev., London Times, Trans. Royal Astron. Soc., &c. He was, as noticed above, a contributor, (see Nos. 9-14,) the projector, and for some time the editor, of the Cabinet Cyclopedia which bears his name. This invaluable series—commenced in 1829 and completed in 1844—as comprised in 133 vols. 12mo., published at 6*d.* per vol., —each vol. sold separately,—or £79 18s. (now—1857—reckoned to about £17) for the whole. Divisions: History, 37 vols.; Biography, 31 vols.; Natural Philosophy, 14 vols.; Natural History, 15 vols., Useful Arts, 7 vols. Among the authors of these vols. are Sir Walter Scott, Sir James Mackintosh, Sir John Herschel, Sir N. Harris Nicolas, Sir David Brewster, Robert Southey, Thomas Moore, Bishop Thirlwall, W. Swainson, G. P. R. James, Jas. Montgomery, Prof. Powell, Prof. Haslow, Rev. G. R. Gleig, and De Sismondi.

A biographical account of Dr. Lardner will be found in Men of the Time, Lon., 1856; and see also Dublin Univ. Mag., xxxv. 663; Fraser's Mag., ii. 58, v. 696, with portrait of Dr. Lardner.

Lardner, Nathaniel, D.D., 1684–1768, a Dissenter, of Arian sentiments, a native of Hawkhurst, Kent, was educated at London, Utrecht, and Leyden; in 1713 was appointed tutor in the family of Lady Treby, in 1723, lecturer at the Old Jewry, and in 1729, assistant minister at Crutched Friars. He was a man of great learning, and, not being an agreeable preacher, employed nearly the whole of his time in those erudite investigations which will preserve his name to the latest posterity. For a detailed account of these labours, the reader is referred to the Life of Dr. Lardner, by Dr. Kippis, in the collective eds. of the works of the former, first collected, Lon., 1788, 11 vols. r. 8vo; again, 1815, 5 vols. 4to, £10 10s.; 1827, 10 vols. 8vo, £5 5s.; 1838, 10 vols. 8vo, £5 5s. Contents: Vols. I.–VIII. The Credibility of the Gospel History, IX. Sermons; X. Tracts, Dissertations upon the two new Epistles ascribed to Clement of Rome; Remarks upon Dr. Ward's Dissertations; Indexes. The ed. of 1788 is now very scarce, and copies were sold about thirty years since for 12 to 14 guineas. We quote some opinions upon his principal works. 1. The Credibility of the Gospel History; with a Supplement. Originally pub. in 17 vols. 8vo, 1727–57. For this great work the author received only £150.

"On this occasion it is proper to mention Dr. Lardner's excellent work of the Credibility of the Gospel History, in the second part of which—consisting of several volumes—he hath made a full and accurate collection of the passages which are to be found in the writers of the first ages of the Christian Church relating to the four Gospels and other sacred books of the New Testament. Thus he hath executed with so much fidelity and diligence, and with such exactness of judgment, that the English reader who hath not opportunity to consult the original will be able to judge for himself upon considering the passages of the original authors, which are very faithfully translated. This attended to so clear and continued a proof of them having been generally received in the earliest ages of the Christian Church, that one would hope it should put an end to this part of the controversy."—Leland's Deistical Writers, ed 1837, 39.

"The services which Dr. Lardner rendered to the cause of Christianity are well known and very considerable. His extensive and accurate investigations into the credibility of the gospel history have left scarcely any thing more to be done or desired. Subsequent writers on the evidences of Christianity have generally availed themselves of Lardner's collection of testimony, deeming it useless to verify his quotations or add to their number. His sentiments on the doctrinal part of Christianity do not appear his reasoning as an historian, but they probably influenced his selection of quotations from the early Christian writers. The History of the Writers of the New Testament Bishop Watson republished in the second volume of his Tracts. The first part of the Credibility was translated into Latin by the celebrated Wolfius. It was also translated into Dutch and German. Which eulogizes it as magna opus. The last volume of his collected works contains his Tracts; the vindication of three of the miracles of Christ; on the Logos; the two Epistles ascribed to Clement; on the Mosaic account of the Fall; on Dr Ward's Dissertations; on Macknight's Harmony, and some minor pieces. They discover his usual research and accuracy, and show how far he departed from the orthodox belief."—Orme's Bibl. Bib.

"The publication of Dr. Lardner's Credibility was received with every mark of respect and gratitude both by members of the Church of England and Dissenters and its reputation gradually extended into foreign countries. His Credibility and his collection of Jewish Testimonies may be said to have given the desired controversy a new turn, and to have driven the assailants of the gospel from the field of Christian antiquity, in which they esteemed the modes securely entrenched, into the by-paths of sarcasm and irony. . . . The Abbé Labouderie, in his historical notice of Father Colonia, justly pronounces the Credibility to be a magnificent apology for Christianity, and a chef-d'œuvre of learning and criticism. . . . the whole of which Abbé Labouderie has announced his intention of translating into French."—Horne's Bibl. Bib., 1823, 152–153.

"It is indeed an invaluable performance, and has rendered the most essential service to the cause of Christianity. Whoever peruses this work will find it replete with admirable instruction, sound learning, and candid criticism."—Dr. Kippis: Life of Lardner.

"This elaborate work is truly valuable. It contains the most copious materials for judging of the authenticity and credibility of the canonical scriptures of the New Testament."—Dr. Wm. Hales.

"A very candid and learned but Arian writer. He impartially goes through the principal Fathers, showing their testimonies to the Scriptures."—Beckersteth's C. S.

"Nec a loco hoc plane alienum esse, existimo, insigne opus Nathan. Lardneri, sermone anglicano compositum atque inscriptum: The Credibility of the Gospel History, quum id ad auctoritatem fidemque scriptorum Novi Testamenti divinorum confirmandam spectet. Magno enim studio Lardnerus testimonia auctorum profanorum de christianorum rebus recensuit atque illustravit, quæ probant, vera esse gesta, in libris novi foederis narrata."—Walchii Biblioth. Theolog. Selecta, Jenæ, 1762, tom. tert. p. 472, q. v.

The History of the Apostles and Evangelists, Writers of the New Testament, was pub. as a Supp. to the 2d Part of The Credibility, 1750–57, 3 vols.; again, 1760, 3 vols. 8vo. These 3 vols. form a portion of the 17 noticed above. The 3 vols. will be found in vol. ii. of Bp. Watson's Collection of Tracts.

"This book of Dr. Lardner is so full and judicious on the subject of the canon of the New Testament, that it may of itself be sufficient to give the reader very satisfactory information on that point."—Bishop Watson.

"An admirable Introduction to the New Testament. It is a storehouse of literary information, collected with equal industry and fidelity."—Bishop Marsh: Divinity Lects., Cambridge, 1810, Lect. III., p. 48.

"In his history of the heretics he has shown the same extent of reading, the same unwearied industry in collecting his scattered materials, which characterizes his other writings."—Dr. Burton.

No clergyman or candidate for the ministry can afford to be without Dr. Lardner's Works, and no intelligent layman should be without them. If any man—not idiotic, nor destitute of ordinary good sense—can read Lardner's Credibility and still disbelieve the Gospel, it is absurd for him to pretend to believe the most common facts of history, or, indeed, the existence of any thing beyond the cognizance of his five senses. Where is the unbeliever who can pretend to have bestowed one tenth of the time, learning, and toil sedulously devoted by Lardner to the question of the authenticity of the Gospel History? It has been well said that "The Credibility and the collateral writings of Lardner unite to a very considerable extent the objects of a Bibliotheca Patristica and an Ecclesiastical History. On them the author was laboriously employed for no fewer than forty-three years."

"Lardner's Works not only contain an Alphabetical Catalogue of Authors, Sects, and Writings, whose history is written, and from which extracts are made by him, but also form a sort of Bibliotheca full of curious and useful information on the subject of ancient writers and their works."—Dr E. Williams's C. P.

Nor need the general reader be deterred from the perusal of Lardner by the fear of a dry and repulsive style.—

"The manner of this writer gives no pleasure: he has been called the 'laborious Lardner,' and laborious he must have been; but he never seems to me to labour. He is always easy and unembarrassed."—Hey's Lectures.

"In the applause of Dr Lardner all parties of Christians are united, regarding him as the champion of their common and holy faith. Archbishop Secker, Bishops Porteus, Watson, and Tomline, and Doctors Jortin, Hey, and Paley, of the Anglican church, Doctors Doddridge, Kippis, and Priestley, amongst the Dissenters, and all foreign Protestant Biblical critics, have rendered public homage to his learning, his fairness, and his great merits as a Christian apologist. The candid of the literati of the Romish communion have extolled his labours; and even Morgan and Gibbon, professed unbelievers, have awarded to him the meed of faithfulness and impartiality. With his name is associated the praise of deep erudition, accurate research, sound and impartial judgment, and unblemished candour. The publication of his works constituted a new era in the annals of Christianity; for, by collecting a mass of scattered evidences in favour of the authenticity of the evangelical history, he established a bulwark on the side of truth which infidelity has never presumed to attack."—*Horne's Bibl. "He will find here an historical and analytical view, comprising the general ethnographical relations of the English language, and that, too, in a much more readable form than he may imagine. He must be prepared however, to meet with principles rather than rules. At all events it will set him thinking, and, in whatever book or corner of the kingdom or of the world his lot may be cast, observing too, for the very dialect of the provincials will acquire a new interest, and indeed help him in his studies."—English Journal of Education

"It is, in truth, a most learned and laborious inquiry into some of the more abstruse points in general grammar, and in that of the English language in particular, connecting with its historical descent and connexions, and including the causes of many of its peculiarities of structure and condition. To the worst Grammar, it exhibits patience to understand a number of rules; whereas the work before us, so far as it has attracted to the character of a well-ordered design, is a repository of the rules on which are all the bottom of the rules."—*Lon. To those who are disposed to follow still further the paths of investigation into which Dr. Latham's Treatise will introduce them, we recommend the following works. 1. Grimm, Deutsche Grammatik, Theil I., (all published,) 2d ed., 1840, 8vo.

"The Deutsche Grammatik of Grimm is the work not of an age nor of a country, but like the great History of the Athenian, a κτῆμα ἐς ἀεί. It is the magazine from whence all draw their facts and illustrations; it is a monument of learning industry, comprehensiveness and strong mind."—Latham

"In the meantime, such a whole family of languages has for the first time found an expositor, and what were a historic grammar, placed on the account of the comparative linguistic analysis of our age. Grimm's first volume to contain comprehends the Scandinavian as well as the German languages in all their modifications, reduces each of them to its most ancient forms, and follows it down from that point through the whole course of its development. This colossal work forms an epoch in the history of ethnological philology."—The Cyclopædia Brevior.

II. Schilteri Thesaurus Antiquitatum Teutonicarum: Ecclesiasticarum, Civilium, Literarium, Monumenta Franca, Alemannica, Saxonica, Bibliam, Ecclesiasticam, et Civilem; cum Glossario Teutonico, non Linguæ solum Inservitura, sed et Antiquitatibus abundanti, Ulm, 1728, 3 vols fol. This invaluable collection of the earliest monuments of the Northern languages in Europe contains the works of Otfrid, Notker, and Willeram, an Anglo Saxon [illegible] of the Gospels for Sundays and Festivals, Francic laws, Rhythmus Antiquus de Carlo Magno, &c. The Glossary occupies the whole of vol iii.

"The Thesaurus of Schilter is a real mine of French literature. The text is founded on a careful collation of all the MSS. to which he could obtain access, and these, with one exception perhaps—the Life of Saint Ane, are highly valuable for their antiquity and correctness."—Wright's English Poetry in Prose, i 7.

I. Wachter Glossarium G[illegible]ntinens, Originet Vocum inter totius Ling[illegible] Lapa., 1737, 2 vols fol.

"Wachter's labors peculiarly successful in discovering remote affinities, also used to the changes. We can observe, in general, that this illustrious enquirer has, by the force of good feeling, and by the abundance of well arranged materials, exceeded all his fellow labourers, ancient critics, and etymologists, in the same point."—Wright's Etymologie

And see Hickes, George, D.D., Nos 3 and 4. But we must return from this digression to the enumeration of Dr. Latham's publi[illegible] 4. Elementary English Grammar for the Use of Schools, 1842, 12mo; 4th ed., 1849, 12mo.

"A work in which grammar no longer an assemblage of conventional rules of speech becomes a philosophical analysis of our language and to [illegible]mentary intellectual exercise, adapted to the highest purposes of instruction."—Minutes of Council of Education, Her Majesty's College, vol i 1845

"His comparison of the old Saxon forms with the modern English, his classification of verbs under the heads of weak and strong forms, and his remarks on the derivation and construction of English words, afford evidence of laborious investigation and research, and are a valuable contribution towards reducing our language within its proper limits."—Edinburgh Museum.

Latimer, Hugh, 1472?–1555, a native of Leicestershire, educated at Cambridge; Rector of West Kingston, Wiltshire, 1529; Bishop of Worcester, 1535. He preached the doctrines of the Reformation with such ability and ardour that his enemies feared to allow him the brief remnant of a life already prolonged to the age of eighty-three, and made a bonfire of him and his friend Ridley at Oxford, Oct. 16, 1555. "Be of good comfort, Master Ridley, and play the man!" exclaimed the brave old martyr to his fellow-sufferer, as the lighted fagot was laid at the latter's feet; "we shall this day light such a candle, by God's grace, in England, as I trust shall never be put out."

A new ed. of Latimer's Serms., with Notes, and a Memoir, by John Watkins, LL.D., was pub. in 1824, 2 vols. 8vo; and a complete ed. of his Works (the only complete one) was edited for the Parker Society by the Rev. George Elwes Corrie, Camb., 1844–45, 2 vols. 8vo. The early eds. of Latimer's Serms., pub. separately and collectively, (1st ed., 1548,) are very rare, and bring high prices. See Fox's Martyrs; Rev. William Gilpin's Life of Latimer, 1755, 8vo; Wordsworth's Eccles. Biog.; Lowndes's Bibl. Man.; Brit. Reformers, vol. ii.; Tracts of Angl. Fathers, iv. 41; Blackw. Mag., lxix. 131; Lon. Retrosp. Rev., 1823, vi. 272.

"Latimer, more than any other man, promoted the Reformation by his preaching. The straightforward honesty of his remarks, the liveliness of his illustrations, his homely wit, his racy manner, his manly freedom, the playfulness of his temper, the simplicity of his heart, the sincerity of his understanding, gave life and vigour to his sermons when they were delivered, and render them now the most amusing productions of that age, and to us, perhaps, the most valuable."—Gilpin's Lives of the Reformers.

"Latimer, by his naïveté and simplicity, his wit, honesty, and piety, has, more than the other Reformers, retained his popularity. He will furnish many hints for useful addresses to the people. . . . His sermons are fine specimens of godly intrepidity, simplicity, and piety."—Bickersteth's C. S.

"These sermons abound with the boldest strokes of wit and satire, clothed in language the most plain and familiar. The keenest reproofs are conveyed by stories, comparisons, and a great variety of ways, evincing the intrepidity of righteousness in a very uncommon degree."—Williams's C. P.

"It is, however, impossible not to feel and to acknowledge in the sermons of Latimer a familiarity and yet force of style, upon which Swift, if not Sterne, in after-days, but with occasionally greater coarseness of expression, might have formed their own. There is throughout Latimer a purity, ease, and perfection of English idiom—to say nothing of the curious personal and historical anecdotes with which they are mixed up—which render his discourses invaluable to the lexicographer and philologist."—Dibdin's Lit. Comp., ed 1825, 78, see also 72, 73, 88.

"There are few books which throw so much light upon the manners and morals of their age and the whole state of society in those times as Latimer's Sermons; they may be ranked among the most curious and amusing specimens of our early literature."—Southey.

"Latimer,—brave, sincere, honest, inflexible,—exercising his power over men's minds by a fervid eloquence flowing from the deep conviction which animated his plain, pithy, and free-spoken sermons."—Sir James Mackintosh. History of England.

"I never read any sermons so much like Whitefield's manner of preaching as Latimer's. You see a simple mind uttering all its feelings, and putting forth every thing as it comes, without reference to books or men, with a naïveté seldom equalled."—Richard Cecil. Remains.

"No English treatise on a theological subject, published before the end of 1550 seems to deserve notice in the general literature of Europe, though some may be reckoned interesting in the history of our Reformation. The Sermons of Latimer, however, published in 1548, are read for their honest zeal and lively delineation of manners. They are probably the best specimens of a style then prevalent in the pulpit, and which is still not lost in Italy nor among some of our own sectaries,—a style that comes at once home to the vulgar, animated and effective, picturesque and intelligible, but too unsparing both of ludicrous associations and commonplace invective."—*Hallam's Lit. I. 1847; ii. 1850; iii. 1853; iv. 1854; v. Pts. 1 and 2, 1853. The following advertisement has recently been pub. in the London papers:

"The editor of Archbishop Laud's Works in the Anglo-Catholic Library has collected materials for an additional volume, which will contain one hundred and twenty Letters hitherto unpublished, addressed by the archbishop to King Charles, the Queen of Bohemia, the prince her son, Sir Thomas Rowe, Lord Dorchester, the two Lords Conway, (the Secretary of State and his son,) Sir John Lambe, and other correspondents.

"He would be glad to receive information of any of the archbishop's letters or papers which may be preserved in any public or private collections, and of which he has not already obtained copies. Communications to be addressed to Messrs. Parker, Oxford."—Mag., 1857.

Of detached pieces there have been lately reprinted—in addition to the Sermons, Autobiography, and Conferences with Fisher, noticed above—Private Devotions, edited by Faber, 1838, 18mo; again, 1855, 12mo; Liturgy, Episcopacy, and Church Ritual, 1840; again, 1847. His Great Peril of Popery, especially in the matter of the Blessed Eucharist, will be found in Tracts Angl. Fathers, i. 195. Charles I., in his parting interview with his daughter, the Princess Elizabeth, recommended to her perusal Laud's Relation of his Conference with Fisher the Jesuit, as one of the best safeguards against Popery. As regards the character of Laud, the reader has had indicated to him ample materials for an examination, and he must form his own conclusions. We will not, however, pass on to the next article without a few quotations from several eminent authorities:

"He was a man of great parts and very exemplary virtues, allayed and discredited by some unpopular natural infirmities,—the greatest of which was (besides a hasty, sharp way of expressing himself) that he believed sincerity of heart and integrity of manners was a guard strong enough to secure any man in his voyage through this world to what company soever he travelled and through what ways soever he was to pass and sure never any man was better supplied with that provision. . . . No man had ever a heart more entire to the king the church, or his country."—Clarendon's Hist. of the Rebellion

"A man vigilant enough and active or rather of a restless mind in new ambitions to undertake than polite to carry on, of a disposition rather fierce and cruel for his end, which notwithstanding he was so far from concealing, in a subtle way that he increased the envy of it by modesty. He had few vulgar and private vices, as being neither taxed of covetousness, nor intemperate nor licentiousness, and, in a word a man not altogether wicked in his personal character as unfit for the state of England."—May's Hist. of Parliament

"If was learned, if polemical knowledge could entitle him to that praise. He was domineering, but with unceasing industry he studied to exalt the priestly and prelatical character, which was his own. He was in this respect happy that all his enemies were also antagonized by him the declared enemies to loyalty and true piety and that every exercise of his anger by that means became, in the eyes of many, a virtue. Thus was the man who acquired so great an ascendant over Charles and who led him by the facile left of his temper into a conduct which proved so fatal to himself and to his kingdom."—Hume's Hist. of England

On this point Mr. Gilpin happily contrasts Cranmer and Laud:

"It is probable that if Henry had chosen such an instrument as Laud he would have miscarried in his point; while Charles with such a primate as Cranmer, would either have been successful in his schemes or at least have avoided the fatal consequences that ensued."

Mr. Southey hardly concurs with this opinion:

"We are not the apologists of Laud in some things he was erroneous, in some imprudent in others culpable. Evil which upon the great scale is ever made conducive to good, produces evil to those by whom it comes. The bloody sentences of the Star Chamber brought down upon him a more tragic catastrophe than he attempted to exact by them; a milder primate could not have saved the Church from her enemies, but he would not have perished by their hands. And, in return, it must be doubted that, when the clergy regained their ascendency, the severity with which they treated the Dissenters was in no slight degree exasperated by the remembrance of his execution." Lon. Quart. Rev., x. 101, 102.

"The person on whom public hatred chiefly fell and who proved in no common degree than any other individual the evil [illegible] upon sovereign was Laud. His talents, though [illegible] quite a large portion of theological learning, [illegible] by no means considerable. There cannot be a [illegible] of the work than the Diary, and his letters to Strafford display some manliness, but no great capacity. He managed, indeed, his own defence, when impeached with some ability, but on such occasions ordinary men are apt to put forth a remarkable readiness and [illegible]. And being subject, as his friends call it, to some infirmities of temper,—that is, choleric, vindictive, harsh, and overbearing to a great degree, he not only took a prominent share in the severities of the Star Chamber, but, as his correspondence shows, perpetually lamented that he was restrained from going further [illegible]. Laud had amply merited punishment for his unwarranted abuse of power, but his execution at the age of seventy, without the slightest pretence of political necessity, was a far more unjustifiable instance of it than any that was alleged against him."—Hallam's Const. Hist. of England, 7th ed., Lon., 1854, ii. 58, 167

"The Parliament was certainly far from faultless. We fully agree with Mr Hallam in reprobating their treatment of Laud. For the individual, indeed, we entertain a far more unmitigated contempt than for any other character in our history. The fondness with which a portion of the church regards his memory can be compared only to that perversity of affection which sometimes leads a mother to select the monster or the idiot of the family as the object of her especial favour. Never were there more strikingly characteristic of the individuals to whom they belonged than those of Laud and Strafford, and they still remain portrayed by the most skilful hands of that age. The mean forehead, the puckered features, the peering eyes of the prelate suit admirably with his disposition. They mark him out as a lower kind of St. Dominic, differing from the fierce and gloomy enthusiast who founded the Inquisition as we might imagine the familiar imp of a spiteful witch to differ from an archangel of darkness. When we read his grace's judgments, when we read the report which he drew up, setting forth that he had sent some separatists to prison and imploring the royal aid against others, we feel a movement of indignation. We turn to his Diary, and we are at once as cool as contempt can make us. . . Here was a man to have the superintendence of the opinions of a great nation!"—T. B. MACAULAY: Essays, 1854, i. 159–160, 424–425.

Mr. Macaulay has, within the last few weeks, reiterated his contempt for the prelate's intellectual powers: in his Life of Johnson, written for the 8th edition of the Encyclopædia Britannica, he cites a striking instance of the extent to which the lexicographer's Jacobitical prejudices had blunted his critical acumen:

"Laud—a poor creature who never did, said, or wrote any thing indicating more than the ordinary capacity of an old woman—was a prodigy of parts and learning, over whose tomb Art and Genius still continued to weep."

But, however little the archbishop may himself have contributed to the Republic of Letters, it is not to be forgotten that he did much to furnish others for greater usefulness in this cause than he was able to exert personally: he made valuable donations of books and MSS. to the Bodleian Library, founded a professorship of Arabic in the University of Oxford, and bestowed eccle-iastical preferment on the ever memorable John Hales, who had advanced views of church government directly contrary to his own favourite theories.

Lauder, William. Office and Devotion of Kyngis, &c., 1556. Sold at Sotheby's, 1827, £2 10*s*. This poem is reprinted in The Crypt. See Edin. Rev., Nos. 94 and 95.

Lauder, William, d. at Barbadoes in 1771, a native of Scotland, made himself infamous by a base attempt to prove Milton a plagiarist. This piece of rascality, and its exposure, have already come under our notice: see DOUGLAS, JOHN, KIRKPATRICK, J., M.D.; and the authorities referred to below. The publications which conferred such unenviable notoriety upon Lauder were—1. Essay on Milton's Use and Imitation of the Moderns in his Paradise Lost, Lon., 1751, 8vo. 2. Letter to the Rev. Mr. Douglas; occasioned by his Vindication of Milton, 1751, 4to. 3. The Grand Impostor Detected; or, Milton Convicted of Forgery against Charles I., 1754, 8vo. The last piece was composed after Lauder's written confession (dictated by Dr. Johnson) of his imposture. He pub. some other matters. See Nichols's Lit. Anec.; Chalmers's Life of Ruddiman; Hawkins's Life of Johnson; Boswell's Life of Johnson; Disraeli's Quarrels of Authors; Chambers and Thomson's Biog. Lauderdale, Hon. James Maitland, eighth Earl of, 1759–1839, was best known as the author of An Enquiry into the Nature and Origin of Public Wealth, &c., Edin., 1804, &c.; 2d ed., 1819, 8vo; in French, Paris, 1808, 8vo. This was reviewed by Lord Brougham in Edin. Rev., iv. 343. The review elicited Observations on the Review by his Lordship, 1804, 8vo, and the Observations provoked a sharp rejoinder by the reviewer, entitled Thoughts suggested by Lord Lauderdale's Observations upon the Edinburgh Review, Lon., 1805, 8vo. His Lordship also pub. tracts on the Currency, the Sinking-Fund, Corn Laws, &c. See Lon. Gent. Mag., 1839, Pt. 2, 538; McCulloch's Lit. of Polit. Econ., 1845, 15; Blackw. Laurence, French, LL.D., M.P., d. 1809, best known as the friend of Edmund Burke, pub. Critical Remarks on Detached Passages of the New Testament, particularly the Revelation of St. John, Oxford, 1810, 8vo, wrote some of the Probationary Odes in conjunction with Mr. Richardson, and contributed to the Annual Register. He was in 1797 appointed Regius Professor of Civil Law in the University of Oxford. A vol. of Laurence's Correspondence with Burke was pub. in 1827, 8vo, and "the most interesting portion" of these letters was republ. in the collection of Burke's Works issued by F. & J. Rivington, London, 1826, 8 vols. 8vo.

Burke, with his usual modesty, rated his friend's intellectual abilities far beyond his own:

"But all this I must leave to your judgment, which with less parliamentary experience, has infinitely more natural power, than mine ever had, when it was at the best . . . My dear friend, you will have the goodness to excuse the interposition of an exhausted and sickly judgment like mine, at its best infirm, with a mind like yours the most robust that ever was made."—Burke to Laurence, Feb. 10, 1797; Burke's Works, ed. 1852, ii. 309, 310.

"He [Laurence] was indeed, one of the most singularly endowed men, in some respects, that ever appeared in public life. He united in himself the indefatigable labour of a Dutch commentator with the alternate playfulness and sharpness of a Parisian wit."—Lord Brougham's Statesmen of the Time of George III., ed. 1856, ii. 74–79, q. v.

Bishop Law was a man of learning; but an eminent modern authority, ruling from the prelate's Notes to King's Essay on the Origin of Evil, and his own Inquiry into the Ideas of Space, Time, &c., remarks:

"In his own original speculations he is weak, paradoxical, and oracular; affecting on all occasions the most profound veneration for the opinions of Locke but much more apt to attach himself to errors and oversights of that great man than to enter into the general spirit of his metaphysical philosophy."—DUGALD STEWART: Prel. Dissert. to Encyc. Brit., 7th ed., 170, and n

Bishop Law was the father of Lord Ellenborough, of the Bishop of Elphin, and of the Bishop of Bath and Wells.

Law, George Henry, D.D., 1761–1845, second son of the preceding, became Bishop of Chester, 1812, and of Bath and Wells, 1824. He pub a number of Serms., Charges, &c., for a list of which, and a biographical notice of the author, see Lon. Gent Mag., 1845, Pt. 2, 529.

Mr. Wood's Memoirs of Law will be found full of interest:

"It is worth the while of those multitudes of all classes who are engaging as eagerly and often as heedlessly, in joint-stock and funding speculations to read the story of the most stupendous scheme of the kind ever conceived, a scheme which stranded the resources of a powerful kingdom, infected a nation with temporary madness, confounded all conditions, raising beggars to boundless wealth and casting down princes to penury."

Law, William, 1686–1761, an eminent Non-juring divine, a native of King's Cliffe, Northamptonshire, entered of Emanuel Coll., Camb., 1705; Fellow, 1711; officiated for some time as a curate in London; vacated his Fellowship in 1716, and subsequently took up his residence at Putney, as tutor to Edward Gibbon, father of the historian; about 1740 became chaplain and almoner to Mrs. Hester Gibbon (sister to his late pupil) and Mrs. Elizabeth Hutcheson, at King's Cliffe, and remained with these ladies (the three living in a house owned by Wm. Law) for the rest of his life. A collective ed. of his works—principally consisting of controversial tracts (against Hoadly, Mandeville, Trapp, and Warburton) and theological treatises—was pub. in 1762, 9 vols. 8vo. To these vols. must be added Serm., Tit. iii. 1, 1713, 8vo; Serm., 1 Cor. xii. 3, 1718, 8vo; and Letters to a Lady inclined to Enter the Church of Rome, 12mo. In his controversy with Bishop Hoadly, which has already been referred to, (see p. 852,) Law is thought to have acquitted himself with great credit:

"I am surprised that Johnson should have pronounced William Law no reasoner. Law did indeed fall into great errors; but they were errors against which logic affords no security. In mere dialectical skill he had very few superiors. That he was more than once victorious over Hoadly no candid Whig will deny."—T. B. Macaulay: Hist. of England, vol. iv. chap. xvi., 1850.

Jones of Nayland commends Law's Three Letters to Bishop Hoadly as specimens of accurate argumentation. But Johnson did full justice to the work by which Law is best known to the present generation:

"'When at Oxford, I took up Law's Serious Call to a Holy Life, expecting to find it a dull book (as such books generally are) and perhaps laugh at it. But I found Law quite an overmatch for me, and this was the first occasion of my thinking in earnest of religion after I became capable of rational inquiry.' . . . He [Johnson] much commended Law's Serious Call, which, he said, was the finest piece of hortatory theology in any language."—Boswell's Life of Johnson.

The extravagance of this praise makes it ridiculous. Did Dr. Johnson understand all the languages of the world, and had he read all the hortatory theology written in those languages? We quote some more opinions upon the Serious Call:

"Mr. Law's master-piece—the Serious Call—is still read as a popular and powerful book of devotion. His precepts are rigid, but they are founded on the gospel, his satire is sharp, but it is drawn from the knowledge of human life, and many of his portraits are not unworthy of the pen of La Bruyere. If he finds a spark of piety in his reader's mind he will soon kindle it to a flame; and a philosopher must allow that he exposes with equal severity and truth the strange contradiction between the faith and practice of the Christian world."—Edward Search, the historian: Miscell. Works, where read his eulogy of the excellent Law.

"Next to the perspicuity of its style—if not, indeed, still more than by this—the power of this volume to interest the reader, as well as to fortify its own statements, is mightily increased by the sketches of living character with which it is interspersed."—Rev. David Young, of Perth.

"This excellent treatise is written in a strong and nervous style, and abounds with many new and sublime thoughts: in a word, one may say of this book, as Sir Richard Steele did of a discourse of Dr. South's, that it has in it whatever wit and wisdom can put together."—Clergymen's Letter: Gent. Mag., Nov. 1780.

"Eminently useful to thoughtless and worldly minds, but greatly wanting in the exhibitions of evangelical motives. At the end of a valuable abridgment published at York, these motives are suggested.' - Beckersteth's C. S.

"Law's treatise of Christian Perfection is very famous; his Serious Call much better."—Dr. Doddridge

Of the Treatise on Christian Perfection it has been remarked:

"Herein is seen what Mr. Law would have had Methodism to be,—the perfection of spiritual religion, according to the elemental principles of the Established Church of England,—the full development of experimental Christianity."

"There are some female characters sketched with exquisite delicacy and deep knowledge of nature, in a book where one would not expect to find them,—in Law's Christian Perfection."—Dr. Warton.

Law's Humble, Earnest, and Affectionate Address to the Clergy, (1762, 8vo; new ed., 1843, 8vo;) recommended to candidates for holy orders by Bishop Burgess. See Short Account of the Life and Writings of Mr. Law, by Richard Tighe, 1813, 8vo; Jones's Life of Bishop Horne; Life of Law prefixed to Mary Ann Kelty's Spiritual Fragments selected from his Works, 1838, 8vo; Dr. David Young's Essay prefixed to the Serious Call, Lon., 1838, 12mo; Nichols's Lit. Anec.; Lon. Gent. Mag., vol. lxx. There have been several vols. of Selections from Law's writings, and many of his treatises have been repub. within the last few years. We should not omit to add that Law is often inaccurately stated to be the editor of the English ed. of the works of Jacob Behmen, which bears his name on its title-page, though undoubtedly some of Law's writings display evidence of the influence of the mysticism which distinguishes the reveries of the Teutonic philosopher.

"Law fell latterly into the reveries of Jacob Behmen, whom Law alleged to have been somewhat in the same state with St. Paul, and to have seen unutterable things. Were it even so, Jacob would have resembled St. Paul still more by not attempting to utter them."—Dr. Johnson.

"Law was a powerful writer; . . . but, with his views of the reasonableness and necessity of a holy life, and his want of perception of those all-refreshing and comforting views of the gospel which distinguish the apostolic writings and the writings of the Reformers, or, at least, keeping them, as he did, in the background, it is not surprising that he fell into the reveries of Behmen and ended in mysticism."—Rev. E. Bickersteth.

"Law's speculations were of the boldest character, and founded upon principles no less visionary than extravagant."—Lon. Quar. Rev.

"His works are very unequal,—some of them bearing a strong tincture of mysticism, while others are of an excellent practical tendency."—Dr E. Williams.

"He was a moral philosopher as well as a theologian, and the man who would combat his statements or escape from his practical conclusions has more to do than shut his eyes to the evidence of revelation."—Dr. David Young.

"The writings of the Rev. William Law will remain an everlasting testimony of the strength and purity of the English language."—John Wesley.

"His writings have a severity seldom to be found; his language is generally just and beautiful and very nervous: but he is too ready to affect points of wit and strokes of satire, in which he does not equal South. Many of his characters are excellently drawn, in which he comes nearer the Jesuits than any writer in English."—Dr Doddridge

"His works possess a very high rank in English literature: . . . great ease, purity, copiousness, and correctness place them among the purest and most classical models of English composition; and in poignancy of wit, poignancy of irony, dexterity of argument, and justness of conclusion, they are nearly unrivalled."—British Critic

Lawrence, Andrew, a celebrated painter, an Englishman, but long a resident of Paris, flourished about 1750. H. G. Bohn advertises in his catalogue for 1848, vol. i. p. 268, 78 of this artist's plates, Paris and London, 1741–56, bound in 1 vol. atlas fol., for £12 12s. Prefixed is a MS. Life of Lawrence and a list of plates, by Thos. Major, 1785.

"In the taste, judgment, and pleasing variety of his work, Lawrence never had an equal, and perhaps never may hereafter, as it seems to be the ne plus ultra of that art, for in it all the requisites are united."—T. Major.

The series extends from Gildas to Charles James Fox, and Mr. Lawrence proposes, "should the work be favourably received, to continue the series down to the death of Arnold." (Preface, N. York, 1855.) The condition being met, the author is called upon to fulfil his implied promise.

"His style is pure, chaste, flexible, transparent, and unostentatious. He evidently has studied his subjects thoroughly and by the best lights at his command."—North American Review, April 1856, lxxxii. 574.

"He has produced a work in all essentials impartial, judicious, luminous, elegant, interesting, and valuable. We attach each of these epithets to it advisedly, and we can assure our readers that they will not find any of them unobserved or exaggerated. Mr. Lawrence writes like a scholar and a gentleman with genuine spirit, and taste. He has chosen a good subject and treated it thoroughly well."—London Critic, April 1, 1856.

"Want of minute accuracy and precision of information, although fatal to any enlarged usefulness from his work, do not hinder it from being light and agreeable reading. . . . He promises a continuation. Before he ventures upon it, we should advise him to enlarge the range of his reading upon our literary history. He has a style and pictorial power which might be useful if exercised about subjects which had been carefully studied."—Lon. Athen., May 10, 1856, 595.

See Hawkins's and Boswell's Lives of Johnson; Omniana Literaria, Lon. Gent. Mag., vol. lvii.

Lawrence, Sir Thomas, 1769–1830, an eminent painter, succeeded Benjamin West as President of the Royal Academy in 1820. The following collections of plates, from the works of this celebrated artist, are well worth the attention of the amateur. 1. Sir Thomas Lawrence's Choicest Works: fifty plates, engraved by Cousins, Ward, &c., fol., £12 12s.; proofs, £18 18s., large paper, r. fol., proofs, £31 10s. Biographical and critical notices are attached to each plate. These plates should accompany the folio ed. of Lodge's Portraits. 2. Cabinet Gallery of portraits of children, women, &c., 13 plates, 4to. 11 by S. engraved by Lewis, £1 1s.

"Spirit, brilliancy, precision of drawing, and character, . . . His excellences are allied to the Flemish School, reminding one, from the precision and power of his drawing, of Van Dyck and Lely,—graceful, spiritual, high-bred elegance, predominance of intellect."—Lon. Times.

"His best pieces, when put beside the master-pieces of Vandyke or Titian appear so tolerable that no Englishman turns aside with a little . . . His fame was great, the prices received for his pictures, during his life, but both have sensibly declined, and his portraits have come to stand on their own merits, free of the prestige of the name he bore."—Sir Archibald Alison, Hist. of Europe, 1815–1852, chap. .

"Sir Thomas Lawrence was perhaps hindered from rising to the highest rank as a colourist by his early and first practice of making portraits in coloured chalk only. His wish to please the sitter made him excel more than he English predecessors had done to the bookish desire of most people to be painted with a smile,—though he was far from extending this indulgence to that extreme of a Hamilton. . . . He found the French painters of the age preceding him had not denied to portrait Art any fatiguable industry, Lawrence's habit of undertaking too many pictures at the same time was drawback, in many cases, to their excellence. He left the portraits of children which he did not finish till they were grown up and of gentlemen and ladies while their hair was still dark, but which remained incomplete in his rooms till the original were grey."—Charles R. Leslie's Hand-Book for Young Painters, 1855.

"The letters of the late President are delightful. They exhibit all that warmth of feeling and all that originality which are the never-failing characteristics of a first-rate mind. The publication is unestimable."—Lon. Literary Gazette.

"The work is unestimable, as a record of one who has immortalized by the magic of his pencil the beauties, the statesmen, and the learned of the commencement of the nineteenth century."—Lon. Sun.

of Man, 1814, 8vo. It is stated that this ed. was recalled by the author. It contained some very crude and absurd speculations, which have been retracted or modified in subsequent eds. For these the author was properly rebuked by Abernethy and others: see Cursory Observations upon the Lectures, &c., 1819; Blackw. Mag., xii. 97, 98; N. Amer. Rev., xvii. 13, (by T. Bradford;) Amer. Quar. Rev., iii. 321. The 3d ed. of the above Lectures, including the Comparative Anatomy, (No. 3,) was pub. in 1828, 8vo, and the 7th ed. in 1848, 12mo. 5. Lects. on Surgery, 2 vols. 8vo. 6. Treat. on Venereal Diseases of the Eye, 1830, 8vo. 7. Anatomico-Chirurgical Descriptions and Views of the Nose, Mouth, Larynx, and Fauces, 1839, fol. 8. "The peculiar advantage of the treatment of Mr. Lawrence is, that he explains his views on the anatomy of hernia and the different varieties of the disease in a manner which renders his book peculiarly useful to the student. It must be superfluous to express our opinion of its value to the surgical practitioner. As a treatise on hernia, presenting a complete view of the literature of the subject, it stands in the first rank."—Edinburgh Medical and Surgical Journal.

11. Treat. on Diseases of the Eye, Lon., 1841, 8vo; 3d ed., 1844, 8vo: Amer. ed., by Isaac Hays, M.D., Phila., 1847, 8vo; new Amer. ed., by Isaac Hays, M.D., 1853, 8vo.

Lawrence's work is recognised as the standard authority in diseases of the eye. The author has judiciously availed himself of the cases and opinions pub. by Mackenzie, Middlethore, Guthrie, Travers, Saunders, and the modern German and French practitioners. The American editor, Dr. Hays, has also incorporated into his edition the results of his long and extensive practice, and introduced many valuable illustrations from Jacob, Dalrymple, Walton, Wilde, Cooper, and other writers in this department. See Hays, Isaac, M.D. Dr. Lawrence has been a large contributor to the Medico-Chir. Trans., The Lancet, and other medical journals.

"These works [Nos. 1, 2, 3, and 5] of the late worthy professor were chiefly intended for the instruction of Christians in the ordinary walks of life. They are pious and sensible, full of sound doctrine and salutary admonition and instruction. There is not any thing of a critical nature to be found in them which indeed was not the writer's object; but they everywhere discover a minute acquaintance with the Bible and the human heart, and a deep concern to profit the reader. The style is plain, and the illustrations generally very brief."—Orme's Bibl. Brit.

Lawson, William John. Hist. of Banking in Great Britain, Lon., 1852, 8vo.

"Mr. Lawson has given us a very interesting volume as his contribution to the History of Banking. He has taken great pains to make his work accurate, and, as it is the result of many years' labor and research, it possesses a higher value than could be claimed for a mere ephemeral production. He presents us with a good general view of the state of banking, and individually of commerce also, from the earliest periods to the present time, and he has interwoven his facts so pleasantly with anecdotical narrative that the work will be found interesting to all classes of readers."—*Lon. Lay, Benjamin, d. 1760, aged seventy-nine, a philanthropist, a member of the Society of Friends, was a native of England, settled in Barbadoes about 1710, and subsequently removed to Abington, Pennsylvania, (ten miles north of Philadelphia,) where he remained until his death. He was, both in the West Indies and in Pennsylvania, a warm opponent of slavery, and in 1737 pub. a treatise entitled All Slave Keepers that keep the innocent in Bondage, Apostates. One of the most prominent of his successors in this field was Anthony Benezet, already noticed in this Dictionary. Layard, Austen Henry, D.C.L., M.P., the celebrated traveller, is a descendant of an ancient and noble family, the eldest son of H. P. J. Layard, Esq., of the Civil Service in Ceylon, the grandson of the Rev. Dr. Layard, Dean of Bristol, and was b. in Paris, March 5, 1817. He has held several responsible appointments under Government, and declined other posts which have been offered to his acceptance. Biographical notices of Dr. Layard will be found in the Lon. Encyclopædia, 1850, and in Men of the Time, 1856. 1. Nineveh and its Remains: Researches and Discoveries in Ancient Assyria: with the Narrative of a Residence in that country, and excursions to the Valleys of the Nestorian Christians, &c., Lon., 1848, 2 vols. 8vo; 6th ed., 1850, 2 vols. 8vo, £1 16s. In this work we have an account of Layard's discoveries in 1845–46.

"We cannot close without once more congratulating Mr. Layard on his success as a writer as well as a discoverer: we repeat, that, taking this only as a book of travels, we have read none for a long time more entertaining and instructive. In his dissertations he is full and copious without being tedious; his style is plain, vigorous, and particularly unaffected, it is the natural language of a strong mind fully master of its subject, and warmed and enlivened, without being inflated or kindled into rhapsody, by the enthusiasm without which he would never have conceived or achieved his wonderful task."—Lon. Quar. Rev., lxxxiv. 106–155, q. v.

"It is very rarely—once or twice, it may be, in a century—that a work of this high character is brought before us: if we except Sir Gardner Wilkinson's Ancient Egyptians, nothing comparable to it has been seen within our time."—Bentley's Miscellany.

"This is we think, the most extraordinary work of the present age, whether with reference to the wonderful discoveries it describes, its remarkable verification of our early biblical history, or of the talent, courage, and perseverance of its author. We have had our Bruces and Mungo Parks, as well as our Parrys Franklins, Backs, and Rosses: but we question whether a more enlightened or a more enterprising traveller than Mr. Layard is to be met with in the annals of our modern English history."—Lon. Times.

"Je dois m'abstenir de toute discussion sur la détermination précise du nom que portaient dans l'antiquité les divers lieux que M. Layard a explorés et les Rois d'Assyrie qui avaient érigé les superbes monuments dont il a relevé les plans et les dessins. A lui seul appartient cette tâche, car lui seul possède les matériaux qui serviront de base à cette importante discussion; et tous les archéologues, tous les géographes, unissent en ce moment leurs vœux aux miens pour que la publication des observations et des portefeuilles de M. Layard ne se fasse pas attendre long-temps."—Extract from a Report read before the Académie des Inscriptions et Belles-Lettres.

"It has been truly said that the narrative is like a romance. In its incidents and descriptions it does indeed remind one continually of an Arabian tale of wonders and genii."—Dr. Robinson: Introduc. note to Amer. ed.

This long list of reviews in American periodicals of Dr. Layard's work is the best proof of the interest felt in the United States in the wonderful discoveries which have immortalized the author's name. The visitor to the library of Williams College, Massachusetts, will find a gratifying evidence of the generosity of Dr. Layard in the two colossal bas reliefs from Nineveh presented to that institution by the discoverer.

2. The Monuments of Nineveh; illustrated from numerous drawings made on the spot, 1849, imp. fol., 10 Pts., 100 plates, £10 10*s.*

"In this magnificent collection of outline engravings of the most interesting discovery of modern times, we have the means of forming something like an estimate of the full amount of the debt due to the enterprise and genius of Mr Layard. Figures of Assyrian monarchs and rulers, pictures of their usages and customs, of their buildings, arms, and arts, representations of their audiences, sieges, battles, and lion-hunts, shapes of their deities and idols, colossal, monstrous, incongruous, yet not without sublimity and grandeur, are here presented to us fresh from the chisel and the pencil of Assyrian Titans and Angelos, after having lain buried under mountains of earth and rubbish for at least twenty-five centuries. We have had no discovery in art that presents so many interesting features of observation and inquiry."—Lon. Examiner.

3. A Popular Account of Layard's Expedition to Nineveh; abridged by the author, 1851, cr. 8vo, 5*s.* The principal feature of this abridgment is the introduction of the most important Biblical and historical illustrations (forming a separate section of the original work) into the narrative. The author also gives us the results of his researches to the latest date prior to publication.

4. Fresh Discoveries at Nineveh, and Researches at Babylon; being the results of the second expedition to Assyria, [1849–51.] Also, a Journey to the Khabour, The Desert, Lake Van, Ancient Armenia, Kurdistan, and the Borders of the Euphrates, 1853, £1 1*s.*; or fine ed., 2 vols. 8vo, £1 10*s.*

"We cannot take leave of Mr. Layard without congratulating him on the superiority of this, his last production, over his Nineveh and its Remains."—Lon. Athen.

"Mr. Layard has by no means exhausted the interest of his subject. He has opened now a far wider field: his discoveries are presented more intelligibly, and something like completeness of view is offered to us. The incidents of travel are more full and lively in their detail than were those in the former work of the author. His work is a most valuable contribution."—Christian Examiner.

5. Illustrations of the Sculptures, Vases, and Bronzes recently discovered at Nineveh; principally Bas-reliefs of the Wars and Exploits of Sennacherib, from his Palace at Kouyunjik; from drawings made on the spot, 1853, fol., 71 plates, £10 10*s.* Uniform with No. 2. It has been ascertained, from inscriptions lately deciphered, that the palace of Kouyunjik, excavated by Dr. Layard, was built by Sennacherib, King of Assyria, and that its sculptures represent events recorded in sacred history. As respects the confirmation so abundantly offered by Dr. Layard's discoveries of the truth of some of the most striking portions of the Holy Scriptures, how nobly do his volumes compare with the imbecile attempts of some foolish skeptics of our own day to cast contempt upon the sacred volume! In the language of an eminent authority,

"In these days, when the fulfilment of prophecy is engaging so much attention, we cannot but consider that the work of Mr. Layard [Nineveh and its Remains] will be found to afford many extraordinary proofs of the truth of biblical history, and of the extreme accuracy of the denunciations of the prophets Isaiah and Ezekiel against the Kings of Assyria, and of the destruction of Nineveh in particular."—London Times.

And what impression has been produced upon the mind of the learned and sagacious discoverer himself by the results of his researches?

"Doubtless, if I had undertaken these excavations with no other end than that of gratifying an idle curiosity or an ordinary spirit of enterprise, I should be utterly unworthy of the honour you have shown me. I trust they were embarked in from a higher motive. Archæology, it pursued in a liberal spirit, becomes of the utmost importance, as illustrating the history of mankind. [Great applause.] I confess that, sanguine as I was as to the results of my researches amongst the ruins on the Tigris and Euphrates, I could not, nor, indeed, probably could any human being, have anticipated the results which they produced. I do not say this in self-praise. I consider myself but an humble agent, whose good fortune it has been to labour successfully in bringing about those results. I could not doubt that every spadeful of earth which was removed from those vast remains would tend to confirm the truth of prophecy and to illustrate the meaning of Scripture. But who could have believed that records themselves should have been found which, as to the minuteness of their details and the wonderful accuracy of their statements, should confirm almost word for word the very text of Scripture? And remember that these were no fabrications of a later date in monuments centuries after the deeds which they professed to relate had taken place, but records engraved by those who had actually taken part in them."—Speech on occasion of the presentation to Dr. Layard of the Freedom of the City of London, Feb 9 1854.

Had Layard met with any thing in the course of his investigations which appeared, however remotely, to impeach the truth of the Bible, we should never have heard the last of it from some of the wiseacres who afflict both sides of the Atlantic with their crude speculations and childish fancies. We are pleased to understand that Dr. Layard has at present (1857) another volume on Assyrian antiquities in course of preparation. The reader must not fail to add to the works of this intelligent, instructive, and entertaining traveller, the following books. I. Monument de Ninive, découvert et décrit par M. Botta, mesuré et dessiné par Flandin; with 371 plates of Architecture, Sculpture, and Inscriptions, Paris, 1849–50, 5 vols. atlas fol. Usually sold at 80 guineas. Contents: vols. i., ii., Architecture and Sculpture, 168 plates; iii., iv., Inscriptions, 263 plates; v., Text.

"To Botta is due the merit of having found the first Assyrian Monument."—Layard.

"The cuneiform system of letters was a species of picture-writing, invented, not by the Semitic inhabitants of Babylon, but by those who preceded them. This writing was, however, reduced by the Semitic race to letters and adapted to the articulation of their language. Their mode of writing consisted of several elements. There was the ideographic, or picture-writing, and the phonetic, which was equivalent to the alphabet of their language. The cuneiform inscriptions were divided into three branches,—Persian, Scythic, and Assyrian."

This splendid work was pub. by order of the French Government, and under the direction of a committee of the Institute. If too expensive for the purse of the amateur, (and $500 is rather a large sum for one work,) he can procure for 10*s.* 6*d.* C. Tobin's trans. of Botta's Letters on the Discoveries at Nineveh, with 50 folding plates, consisting of Plan, Plates of Sculpture, and Inscriptions. Lon., 1850, 8vo.

II. Nineveh and its Palaces: the Discoveries of Botta and Layard applied to the elucidation of Holy Writ; upwards of 200 engravings, 8vo. Bonomi resided many years in the vicinity of the Assyrian discoveries, and acquired considerable knowledge of the languages and customs of the East. III. Ledyard, John, 1751-1788, celebrated as the companion of Captain Cook (the narrative of whose last voyage he published, Hartford, 1783, 8vo) and for his own explorations, was a native of Groton, Connecticut. His eventful life (the details of which do not come within the plan of our Dictionary) had been recorded by one of the most distinguished of American historians: Memoirs of the Life and Travels of Josh Ledyard, the American Traveller; comprising Selections from his Journals and Correspondence, by Jared Sparks, Camb., Mass., 1828, 8vo. Printed in London in 1828, 8vo, and in 1834, 8vo. See titles in Rich's Bibl. Amer. Nova, ii. 207–208. See also ibid., i. 311. Sparks's Life of Ledyard was republ. in the author's valuable Library of American Biography, New Series, 1847, vol. xiv. A review of these Memoirs, by Robert Southey, appeared in the London Quarterly Review, xxxviii. 85–113.

"Ledyard never desponded: no sooner was one of his castles demolished than he set about building another."—SOUTHEY: ubi supra, p. 92.

"In 1786, while at Paris, I became acquainted with John Ledyard, of Connecticut,—a man of genius, of some science, and of fearless courage and enterprise. . . . I suggested to him the enterprise of exploring the western part of our continent, by passing through St. Petersburg to Kamtschatka, and procuring a passage thence in some of the Russian vessels to Nootka Sound, whence he might make his way across the continent to the United States and I undertook to have the permission of the Empress of Russia solicited."—THOMAS JEFFERSON: Randolph's Life of Jefferson, 2d ed., 1830, i. 55.

"A gentleman from this city, now in Europe, lately paid a visit to Thomas Carlyle. He found him living at Chelsea, on the Thames, in the simplest manner, in a small house in quite a retired situation. He talks much of American affairs, still holding to his old opinion that Franklin is our greatest man. He said he had some years ago read a book which gave a much better account of the higher sort of character in New England than any thing he had seen since Franklin's writings. That book, he said, gave him an insight into the real, inner life of the highest natures, and was a most valuable work. It was the Memoir of the Buckminsters, by Mrs. Lee."—Boston Transcript, Aug. 1857.

Lee, Francis, M.D., 1660–1719, Fellow of St. John's College, Oxford, wrote many works, almost all of which were pub. anonymously or in the names of others. A collection of some of his Dissertations, Theological, Mathematical, and Physical, was pub., Lon., 1702, 2 vols. 8vo. Among his important works were A History of Montanism, &c., 1709, 8vo, and An Epistolary Discourse concerning the Books of Ezra, 1722, 8vo. His mystic poems are thought to possess great merit.

Lee, Mrs. Hannah F., (the wife of Mr. George G. Lee,) a native of Newburyport, Mass., but for many years a resident of Boston, Mass., we believe commenced authorship by contributing the Notices in continuation, by a Friend, which comprise the latter half of Hannah Adams's Autobiography, pub. by Dr. Joseph Tuckerman in 1832; since then she has pub. anonymously a number of works, of which the following are all that we can identify: 1. Grace Seymour; a Novel, 1835. 2. Three Experiments of Living, 1838. Of this work about thirty eds. have been pub. in America and several in England. 3. Elinor Fulton: a Sequel to Three Experiments of Living. 4. Familiar Sketches of the Old Painters, 1838, 16mo.

Mrs. Lee's writings have exerted a most beneficial effect upon the tone of American society.

Lee, Harriet, 1756–1851, the daughter of an actor, was for many years engaged, in conjunction with her sister Sophia, in the management of the Belvidere House, —an academy at Bath. 1. The Errors of Innocence; a Novel, 1786, 5 vols. 12mo. 2. The New Peerage, or Our Eyes may Deceive Us; a Comedy, 1787, 8vo. 3. With Sophia Lee, The Canterbury Tales, 1797–1805, 5 vols. 8vo. These were all Harriet's excepting two,—viz.: The Young Lady's Tale, and The Clergyman's Tale, which occupy a vol. and a half. Sophia also wrote the Introduction to the whole series. The Canterbury Tales (12 in all) were very popular, and 2d eds. of the first two vols. were pub. in 1799. There have been recent eds. of the whole,—viz.: in 1833, (Bentley's Standard Library, vols. xii. and xiii.,) and in 1839. Mason Brothers, of New York, are now (1857) issuing those of Harriet in 2 vols. 12mo, and Sophia's in 1 vol. 12mo. The Canterbury Tales fell into the hands of Byron when he was fourteen years of age: he remarks,

"There are fine things in The Canterbury Tales. Nothing of Scott's is finer than The German Tale: I admired it when a boy, and have continued to like what I did then. This, I remember, particularly affected me."

He also said of The Norman Tale:

"It made a deep impression on me, and may be said to contain the germ of much that I have since written."

Referring to this, Chambers's Cyclopedia of English Literature says,

"The public were unanimous in considering Harriet Lee as more interesting, passionate, and even more poetical than her sister."

The republication in England of The Canterbury Tales (in Bentley's Standard Library) was hailed with great delight:

"To read The Canterbury Tales of Miss Lee once more is a [illegible] of ups [illegible] The [illegible]ely [illegible]ucated person of the [illegible]entury who has not, at some time or other, drawn a sincere p[illegible] pages. The different tales have been to many like turning do[illegible] a leaf in life. . . . The Officer's Tale perhaps was read on some sunny bank in a pleasant land,—a stolen pleasure. On The German's Tale perhaps two hearts beat in unison, trembled in harmony, and, when sharing a mutual agitation,—two heads bent over the mystic page,—they turned round to see each other's fright reflected in well-known and well-loved features. Even now we feel a shiver running over the frame as we call to mind the fearful whisper of the name of Kruitzner amidst the silent throng of a kneeling congregation in the cathedral . . . We may be pardoned for approaching this number of The Standard Novels with feelings of far more interest than we take up any new novel of the day."—Lon. Spectator

"Few readers of entertaining literature can be ignorant of these popular productions, and we are therefore spared the necessity of saying how much we have been excited by a perusal of Montford, how deeply entertained by the narrative of Arundel, how truly affected by the stories of Constance and Lothaire. The pure morality which reigns through these tales—which we can scarcely dare to call fictions—will render them the most eligible reading for young persons. They ought to be in every family library."—Edinburgh Post.

In 1821, whilst living at Pisa, Byron dramatized Kruitzner, and pub. his version under the title of Werner; or, The Inheritance. See Blackwood's Mag., xii. 712, xv. 196. Harriet Lee also wrote a play, chiefly founded on Kruitzner, entitled The Three Strangers. It was played in 1835, but was unsuccessful.

Lee, Mary Elizabeth, 1813-1849, a native of Charleston, S.C., a daughter of William Lee, and a niece of Judge Thomas Lee, contributed many prose and poetical articles to The Southern Rose, Graham's Magazine, Godey's Lady's Book, New Orleans Miscellany, Philadelphia Courier, Token, Gem, Gift, Whitaker's Journal, Southern Literary Messenger, and Orion Magazine. A vol. of her poems was pub. in 1851, Charleston, 8vo, pp. 224, with a memoir by the Rev. Samuel Gilman, D.D. Her prose writings have not been collected, but the vol. pub. in the Massachusetts' School Library, entitled Social Evenings, or Historical Tales for Youth, is from her pen. Of her poetical pieces, perhaps the best-known is The Blind Negro Communicant. Miss Lee was a zealous scholar, and possessed a remarkable talent for the acquisition of languages. See Southern Quar. Lee, Nathaniel, 1657?-1691 or 1692, the son of Dr Richard Lee, rector of Hatfield, Hertfordshire, after leaving Trinity College, Cambridge, made an unsuccessful attempt as an actor, and finally settled down as a dramatic author. Habits of dissipation resulted in insanity, which led to his confinement for four years in Bedlam, from which he was discharged in 1689, little to his benefit,—as about three years later he was killed in a street brawl during a drunken frolic. Lee was the author of ten tragedies and one (The Princess of Cleve) tragi-comedy, viz.: 1. Nero. 2. Sophonisba. 3. Gloriana. 4. The Rival Queens; or, The Death of Alexander the Great. 5 Mithridates. 6. Theodosius; or, The Force of Love. 7. Cæsar Borgia. 8. Lucius Junius Brutus. 9. Constantine the Great. 10. The Princess of Cleve. 11. The Massacre of Paris. He was also joint author, with Dryden, of Œdipus, and The Duke of Guise, tragedies. Lee's pieces were all pub. separately (save Sophonisba and Gloriana, which appeared in one vol., 1676, 4to) between 1675 and '90. Collective eds. of his Dramatic Works were pub. in 1692, 2 vols. 4to; 1713, 2 vols. 8vo; 1722, 3 vols. 12mo; 1733, 3 vols. 12mo; 1734, 3 vols. 8vo. His best pieces are The Rival Queens; The Death of Alexander the Great; Theodosius, or the Force of Love; Mithridates; and Lucius Junius Brutus. It has long been the fashion to laugh at Nat. Lee as a Bedlamite, (metaphorically as well as literally,) and certainly many of his rhapsodies are crazy enough: but there is also much true poetry in some of his declamations. He was by no means unconscious of the criticisms which were freely levelled at him, even in his lifetime, as his dedication of Theodosius to the Duchess of Richmond amply proves:

"It has often been observed against me," he says, "that I abound in ungoverned fancy, but I hope the world will pardon the sallies of youth. Age, despondence, and dullness come too fast of themselves. I discommend no man for keeping the beaten road; but I am sure the noble hunters that follow the game must leap hedges and ditches sometimes, and run at all, or never come into the full of the quarry. My comfort is, I cannot be so ridiculous a creature to any man as I am to myself: for who should know the house so well as the good man at home?—who, when his neighbours come to see him, still sets the best rooms to view; and, if he be not a wilful ass, keeps rubbish and lumber in some dark hole, where nobody comes but himself, to mortify at melancholy hours."

Certainly his friend Dryden was greatly to blame for his injudicious (if indeed sincere) encouragement of Lee's Bombastes vein. The extravagance of the tragedy of Alexander has been not a little ridiculed: but what does Dryden say of it to the author?

"Such praise is yours—while you the passions move,
That 'tis no longer legend'd for a real love.
Where Nature triumphs over wretched art:
We only warm the heart, but you the heart
Always you warm: and if the rising year,
As in hot regions, bring the sun too near,
'Tis but to make your fragrant spices blow,
Which in our colder climates will not grow.
Despite those drones who prey on wits while they accuse
The too much vigour of your youthful muse:
That untold side which by their virtue jostle
Is but to say you need but sleep and take."

It may be well enough to quote a passage from Alexander which has elicited rather opposite opinions from two famous critics:

Lee introduces Alexander the Great, saying,

"When on my Lesbey in the Ionic flood,
When fortune swell my standard trembling bore,
And the pale Fates stood frighted on the shore,
When the Immortals on the billows rode,
And I myself appeared the leading God."

Bishop Warburton declares that this passage contains "not only the most sublime, but the most judicious, imagery that poetry could conceive or paint."

Joseph Warton, on the other hand, asserts that "we have not in our language a more striking example of turgid expression and gigantic fustian and bombast."

These erudite critics are about equally wrong. Few admirers of the Bombastes school would venture to endorse Warburton's eulogy, and that Warton greatly erred in as regards to the passage just quoted pre-eminence in extravagance can be easily demonstrated by any one who chooses to cite scores of passages from Nat. Lee himself. For instance, take this

"I find her on the floor,
In a dead storm of grief set in cold night.
Join'd with tears of such a lavish rate,
That were the world on fire, they might have drown'd
The wrath of Heaven, and quench'd the mighty ruin."

Or this

"Blast, swarthy Acheron, hold a hollow cloud,
And with low thunder fright the drum afraid."

Or this

"Were I but near him, and saw him scorch'd in flames,
I would not give my indignation down,
Lest I should lose his tongue."

But, as we have already stated, Lee undoubtedly possessed great genius.

"He is, in spite of his preverbial extravagance, a man of poetical mind and some originality, shall"—Hallam's Lit. Hist. of Europe, 4th ed., 1854, iv. 53.

"The extravagance of Lee was not the sheer extravagance of the common herd of heroic-day manufacturers. Though it be madness yet there's method in it. His frenzy is the frenzy of a poet. The hyperbole of others, even of Dryden himself, were forced, cold and far-fetched. They cut paper rapiers, because they judged it per se per profitable so to do: Lee only indulged his natural exuberance. . . . There is a sort of genuine passion in his extravagance, and it has besides a picturesque beauty, which is rarely to be met with in heroic ravings. His conceptions are not abortive, though they may be grotesque. His forms are strange enough, but they are well defined, and thrown out in bold relief. His visions flit rather before us."—Lon. Retrospective Review, 1821, iii. 244-265.

This admirable review must be read by the student.

"Nathaniel Lee's dramas are full of faults,—faults of the least venial nature, but they are evidently the productions of a man of genius, and do not betray a single indication of imbecility or dulness. Their characteristics are summed up in a saying of his own. When the unfortunate author was confined in a straight-waistcoat in Bedlam, a scribbler who went to visit him had the cruelty to jeer at his dreadful malady, by observing that it was an easy thing to write like a madman. 'No,' said Lee, 'it is not an easy thing to write like a madman, but it is very easy to write like a fool.'—Henry Neele's Lects. on English Poetry, Lect. IV. p. 144.

Alas that poor Neele should himself have (so shortly after writing the above) become a victim to the same dreadful malady and fallen by his own hand! For further information respecting Lee, see Cibber's Lives; Biog. Dramat.; Censura Literaria; Spence's Anecdotes; Blackw. Mag., ix. 280.

Lee, Samuel, D.D., 1783–1852, a native of Longnor, Shropshire, worked as a carpenter until he was twenty-five years of age, but employed his leisure time in the acquisition of the Latin, Greek, Hebrew, Chaldaic and Syriac languages, to which he subsequently added a knowledge of the Arabic, Persian, French, German, and Italian tongues; entered Queen's Coll., Camb., 1813, ordained, 1817; elected Arabic Professor of the Univ. of Camb., 1819, and Regius Professor of Hebrew, 1831. Among the more important of his learned works (in addition to his eds. of the Arabic, Persian, and Malay Scriptures, and labours on the Syriac Old and New Testaments, 1816–23) were: 1. A Hebrew Grammar, 1830; 6th ed., 1844, 8vo. 2. Six Serms. on the Study of the Holy Scriptures, 1830, 8vo. 3. Travels of John Batuta, trans. from the Arabic, 1833. 4. "In a medical point of view, Sir George Lefevre's Apology exhibits the practical physician whom long experience has rendered more doubtful of the power of active practice than the tyro. In a literary sense his book is of a very popular character. The style is clear, vigorous, and animated, with something of the easy gleesomeness which characterizes the man of the world. This renders the work very readable."—Lon Spectator.

Legaré, Hugh Swinton, 1797-1843, an eminent American scholar, a native of Charleston, S. Carolina, graduated with the highest honours at the college at Columbia, and subsequently continued his studies at Paris and Edinburgh. In 1820, and again in 1824, he was elected a member of the State Legislature; made Attorney-general of South Carolina in 1830; Chargé d'Affaires at the Court of Brussels, 1833; sent to the National Congress in 1836, and in 1841 was appointed, by President Tyler, Attorney General of the United States. He died at Boston, at the residence of his friend, George Ticknor, June 20, 1843, whilst participating, as one of the Cabinet, in the ceremonies connected with the completion of the Bunker Hill Monument. A collection of the writings of Mr. Legaré, edited by his [illegible] pub. in 1846, in two large 8vo vols. Here will be found a Diary kept at Brussels, a Journal on the Rhine, Extracts from his Private and Diplomatic Correspondence, Orations and Speeches, and Contributions to the New York and Southern Quarterly Reviews, and a Memoir of the life of the author. His principal contributions to the Southern Quarterly Review are those on Classical Learning, Roman Literature, Cicero de Republica, the Public Economy of Athens, the Life and Works of D'Aguesseau, Jeremy Bentham and the Utilitarians, Codification, Kent's Commentaries, Early Spanish Ballads, the Miscellaneous Writings of Sir Philip Sidney, Lord Byron's Letters and Journals, Hall's Travels in America, The Travels of the Duke of Saxe Weimar, The Discovered, Tales of the Great St Bernard, and the Miscellanies of William Crofts.—

"It is not necessary to say of some of these essays," remarks Dr. Griswold after the enumeration of the preceding, "that they will bear a favourable comparison with the best productions of their kind; yet they are certainly not equal to the more carefully-prepared papers which he gave to the world at a subsequent period."—Prose Writers of America, q. v. 4th ed., 1852, 301.

His best known articles in the New York Review are, The Constitutional History of Greece, Demosthenes—the Man, the Orator, and the Statesman, and The Origin, History, and Influence of Roman Legislation. The title of the last named essay recalls forcibly to mind the darling object of Mr. Legaré's aspirations,—the marriage of the Civil and the Common Law. At home or abroad, amidst the relaxations of leisure or the perplexities of public duty, this favourite theory was never forgotten:

"He esteemed the law as his pursuit—as his object,—as the field of his ambition. Fifteen years ago [in 1828] I knew him as an eminent lawyer. He afterwards went abroad in a diplomatic capacity and at its close, where he resided, devoted himself to the study of the Civil Law, with a view to make it subservient to the great object of his life, the expansion of the Common Law, and the forcing into the enlarged and liberal principles and just morality of the Roman Jurisprudence. This object he seemed about to accomplish, for his arguments before the Supreme Court were crowded with the principles of the Roman Law, wrought into the texture of the Common Law with great success. In every sentence that I heard I was struck with the union of the two systems. At the same time, the whole was wrought into a style beautiful and classic, but never passing from the line of the argument nor losing sight of the cause. His argumentation was marked by the closest logic at the same time he had a presence in up-soaring which I have never seen excelled. He had a warm, rich style, but no declamation; for he knew that declamation belongs neither to the jurist nor to the scholar."—Judge Story's Address before the members of the Law School at Cambridge, June 22, 1843: in the Law Reporter, August, 1843, and in Story's Miscell Writings, 1852, 823-826.

For further information respecting Mr. Legaré and his writings, see Amer. Whig. Rev., ii. 416; South. Quar. Rev., iv. 347, ix. 321, xvi. 224; South. Lit. Mess., ix. 570. It is to be deeply regretted that this accomplished scholar and eminent jurist did not leave some great work upon those topics of legal lore which reverential regard and passionate admiration had alike endeared to his bosom. That he had meditated a translation of the Elementa Juris Naturæ et Gentium of Heineccius, we have his own confession to his friend Judge Story:

"It was only during the last summer [of 1842] that he wrote to me that he intended to translate Heineccius's Elements: for he, wished, he said, to entice the American lawyer to the study of the Civil Law. He added that he had nothing to gain by undertaking such a work, but that he would undergo the labor as a homage to his country. Knowing his eminent qualifications for the task, I advised him to make the translation, and to add to it notes of his own, so as to adapt the principles to the existing state of the Common Law,—telling him that he would thereby confer a benefit on his country which no man of his age would be likely to exceed."—Judge Story's Address, ubi supra.

But it was not so written: Hugh Legare must be added to the long list already chronicled in this volume, of those who left unfinished monuments of good intentions, whose devices were arrested by "the inexorable hour," and whose "purposes"—to use the affecting language of the patriarch—were "broken off" in the midst.

Legare, J. M., of Charleston, S. Carolina, a relative of the preceding, pub. in 1848, Orta Undis, and other Poems, in Latin and English. He has also contributed a number of essays to various periodicals, some of which have been commended.

Leggett, William, 1802-1840, a political and miscellaneous writer of considerable reputation, was a native of the city of New York, educated at the Georgetown College, D.C.; entered the United States Navy as a midshipman in 1822; retired from the service in 1826; established The Critic, a weekly literary gazette, in 1828; was connected with William C. Bryant in the editorship of the New York Evening Post, 1829-36; commenced the publication of The Plaindealer, in 1836; appointed by President Van Buren diplomatic agent to the Republic of Guatemala, in April, 1840, but died in the following month, whilst making preparations for his departure. His published vols. are—1. Leisure Hours at Sea, N. York, 1829, 18mo. This is a collection of poems written whilst the author was in the naval service. 2. Naval Stories, 12mo. 3. Tales by a Country Schoolmaster, 12mo. 4. Political Writings, edited, with a Preface, by Theodore Sedgwick, 1840, 2 vols. 12mo. He was also the author of Block House, in the Tales of Glauber Spa, 1832, of pieces in The Mirror and the Atlantic Souvenir, was the principal contributor to The Critic and The Plaindealer, and left an unfinished novel, of which one vol. was printed. See Sedgwick's Preface to Leggett's Political Writings, and the Memoir of Leggett, by the same gentleman, in Griswold's Biographical Annual, N. York, 1840; N. York Rev., viii. 383; Democrat. Rev., vii. 3. Mr. Bryant's poetical tribute to the Memory of William Leggett—"The earth may ring from shore to shore"—is doubtless well known to many of our readers. Leggett had devoted friends, and brilliant hopes were entertained of his future career:

"Every year was softening his prejudices and calming his passions. Every year was enlarging his charities and widening the bounds of his liberality. Had a more genial clime invigorated his constitution and enabled him to return to his labours, a brilliant and honourable future might have certainly been predicted of him. He would not have left a name only as the conductor of a periodical press,—he would not merely have left these transient and fleeting memorials of his ability and rectitude. It is not the suggestion of a too fond affection, but the voice of a calm judgment, which declares that, whatever public career he had pursued, he must have raised to his memory an imperishable monument, and that, as no name is now dearer to his friends, so few could then have been more honorably associated with the history of his country than that of William Leggett."—Tamsons Sedgwick, ubi supra.

Leighton, Alexander, M.D., 1583-1644? a Scottish divine, a physician, father of Archbishop Leighton, will ever be remembered to the lasting disgrace of the English Star-Chamber, as we shall see presently. 1. Speculum Belli Sacra; or, The Looking-Glasse of the Holy War. Printed, 1624, 8vo. 2. Appeal to the Parliament; or, Sion's Plea against the Prelacie. Printed the year and moneth [Sept. 1628] wherein Rochell was lost, 4to. Very rare; worth now (1857) about £3. A 2d ed., 4to, also without date, was printed abroad. For publishing this book he was sentenced (1.) To be publicly whipped at Westminster and set in the pillory; 2. To have one side of his nose slit, one ear cut off, and one side of his cheek branded with a hot iron; 3. To have the whole of this repeated the next week at Cheapside; 4. To have S. S. (Sower of Sedition) branded on his cheek with a red-hot iron; 5. To pay a fine of £10,000; 6. To suffer perpetual imprisonment in the Fleet. This beautiful exhibition of Christian charity occurred in June, 1630. To the shame of human nature, devils in human shape were found ready to put the barbarous enactment into force. The whole of this mild sentence was carried into execution (we suppose, indeed, that Leighton never had the ability to pay the fine) save the last item: after the martyr had undergone eleven years' confinement in jail, his prison-doors were thrown open by the Long Parliament in 1640. He is said to have died insane (in 1644 or '49) in consequence of the cruel hardships which he had suffered. Leighton, H. Linguæ Gallicæ Addiscendæ Regulæ, Oxon., 1659, '62, 8vo.

Leighton, Robert, D.D., 1611-1684, son of Dr. Alexander Leighton, a native of Edinburgh, (according to Pearson,) was educated at the university in that city, and in 1641 became Presbyterian minister in the parish of Newbattle, in the county of Edinburgh. He subsequently acted for ten years as Principal of the University of Edinburgh; about 1662 became Bishop of Dunblane, and in 1670 Archbishop of Glasgow. In 1673, after vainly attempting to effect an amicable compromise between the Episcopalians and Presbyterians, Leighton tendered his resignation, which, after a year's delay, was reluctantly accepted by the king. The good divine accordingly retired to Broadhurst, in Sussex, where he lived in retirement (but was constantly employed in doing good) until 1684, when he was unexpectedly summoned to London, and died there after six days' illness. The works of Leighton—which consist of a Commentary on the First Epistle of St. Peter, Lectures on different portions of the Old and New Testaments, Sermons, and theological tracts—were pub. collectively, with a Life of the author by Rev. Erasmus Middleton, 1805, 4 vols. 8vo; by George Jerment, with his Life of Leighton, 1806, 6 vols. 8vo; 1820, 4 vols. 8vo; by Rev. J. N. Pearson, with his Life of Leighton, 1825, 4 vols. 8vo; 1828, 2 vols. 8vo; 1830, 4 vols. 8vo; also 1830, 2 vols. 8vo; 1846, 2 vols. 8vo; 1849, 2 vols. 8vo. Whole Works, with Life by Aikman, 1837, 8vo. An excellent ed. was pub. by J. C. Riker, New York, 1845, r. 8vo, pp. 800. This ed. contains Pearson's Life, a Table of the Texts of Scripture, and an Index of Subjects.

"This is the only complete edition of Leighton's Works, as it contains every article found in both of the standard copies published in London and Edinburgh. It comprises the Commentary on the First Epistle of Peter, several minor Expositions on different parts of the Scriptures, thirty-one Sermons, Theological Lectures, Exhortations to Colleagues, and other more concise pieces. The value of this edition is greatly enhanced by the two Indexes which have been added to the volume, so that the archbishop's works are for the first time published complete, and with the essential facilities for the more edifying study of his superexcellent illustrations of revealed truth."

Pearson's Life of Leighton is commended by Bickersteth as "a delightful piece of biography," and by the British Critic as "a spirited and eloquent memoir." A number of Leighton's works have been pub. separately from time to time, and Selections have been given to the world. The last ed. of his Commentary on the First Epistle of St. Peter was pub. in 1849; one by the S. P. C. K., 2 vols. (p. 8vo; one by H. G. Bohn, 1849, 8vo. The Rev. J. Pye Smith, D.D., edited in 1836, (again pub. 1839,) 12mo, his Expositions on the Creed, the Lord's Prayer, the Ten Commandments, &c. The Commentary on St. Peter is the best-known and most highly prized of his productions.

"Perhaps there is no expository work in the English language equal altogether to the exposition of Peter. It is rich in evangelical sentiment and exalted devotion. The meaning is seldom missed, and often admirably illustrated. There is learning without its parade, theology divested of systematic stiffness, and eloquence in a beautiful flow of unaffected language and appropriate imagery. To say more would be unbecoming, and less could not be said with justice."—Orme's Bibl. Bib.

"This admirable Commentary is wholly practical, and has long been admired for its piety. Dr. Doddridge, in his paraphrase on this Epistle, has acknowledged himself deeply indebted to Archbishop Leighton for many important hints."—Horne's Bibl. Bib.

"Leighton on I Peter with the Prælections are productions of uncommon worth."—Wilmore's C. P.

Of the Prælectiones Theologicæ an ed. was pub. by Prof. Scholefield, 1828, 8vo: they were also pub. in Ward's Library of Standard Divinity, No. 1, 1839, 8vo. Newton calls the work

"A diamond set in gold," and said it united "the simplicity of the gospel with all the captivating beauties of grace and style."

"Consult the Academical Lectures of Archbishop Leighton, than whom no man knew better how to render human attainments the handmaids to personal and practical religion."—Christian Observer.

This is a true saying, and a cloud of witnesses can be produced in its attestation:

"Archbishop Leighton had the greatest elevation of soul, the largest compass of knowledge, the most mortified and most heavenly disposition, that I ever yet saw in mortal: he had the greatest parts, as well as virtues, with the perfectest humility, that I ever saw in man."—Bishop Burnet.

"There is a spirit in Leighton I never met with in any human writings, nor can I read many lines in them without being moved: more sententious than Reynolds, more refined than Howe, more eloquent than Baxter, more practical than Charnock, more sublime than Hall."—Brookes.

"His works ought to be reckoned among the greatest treasures of the English tongue: they continually overflow with love to God, and breathe an heart entirely transformed by the gospel, and above the views of every thing but pleasing God"—Dr. Doddridge.

"Leighton's praise is in all the churches. . . . He is one of the very first divines of the British Church; and his writings breathe throughout the spirit of devotion: they are distinguished by a noble strain of deep piety, a most humble, heavenly, and loving spirit, an elegant mind, and a scriptural standard of evangelical doctrine."—Bickersteth's C. S.

"All his works are admirable, . . . full of holy simplicity, humility, and benevolent zeal"—Williams's C. P.

"It is a reproach to the present age that his valuable writings, breathing as they do the sublimest and purest spirit of piety, rich in beautiful images and classical learning, throughout abounding in practical reflections, and all expressed with the sweetest and simplest eloquence, should have been neglected among us."—British Critic.

Bishop Burnet, to whom Leighton was indeed "guide, philosopher, and friend," cannot say enough in praise either of his learning or piety:

"He had great quickness of parts a lively apprehension, with a charming vivacity of thought and expression. He had the greatest command of the purest Latin that ever I knew in any man. He was a master both of Greek and Hebrew, and of the whole compass of theological learning, chiefly in the study of the Scriptures. But that which excelled all the rest was, he was possessed with the highest and noblest sense of divine things that I ever saw in any man. . . . He had so subdued the natural heat of his temper, that in a great variety of accidents, and in the course of twenty two years' intimate conversation with him, I never observed the least sign of passion but upon one single occasion. . . . There was a visible tenderness in all he said to raise his own mind and those he conversed with, to serious reflections. He seemed to be in a perpetual meditation. . . . His preaching had a sublimity both of thought and expression in it. The grace and gravity of his pronunciation was such, that few heard him without a sensible emotion. I am sure I never did."—History of his Own Time, ed. Oxford, 1833, vol. i. 242, 243, 244.

Burnet's account of the last interviews which he had with this good man is very touching. Burnet had despatched an earnest message to Leighton, begging him to come up to London, in the hope that he might have a beneficial influence upon Lord Perth, newly appointed Lord-Chancellor. Leighton was now in his seventy fourth year; but such an opportunity of doing good he would by no means permit to pass unimproved. He hurried to London, and was soon in the arms of his friend:

"When I took notice to him, upon my first seeing him, how well he looked, he told me he was very near his end for all that, and his work and journey both were now almost done. This at that time made no great impression on me. He was the next day taken with an oppression, and, as it seemed, with a cold and with stitches,—which was indeed a pleurisy.

"The next day Leighton sunk so that both speech and sense went away of a sudden; and he continued panting about twelve hours, and then died without pangs or convulsions. I was by him all the while. Thus I lost him who had been for so many years the chief guide of my whole life. . . . He used often to say that if he were to choose a place to die in, it should be an inn: it looked like a pilgrim's going home, to whom this world was all an inn, and who was weary of the noise and confusion of it. He added that the officious tenderness and care of friends was an entanglement to a dying man, and that the unconcerned attendance of those that could be procured in such a place would give less disturbance. And he obtained what he desired for he died at the Bell Inn, in Warwick-lane."—Ibid., vol. ii. 426, 428.

Le Keux, John, 1784–1846, an architectural engraver, a native of London, acquired considerable reputation by his admirable illustrations contained in works on Gothic architecture,—such as Britton's Architectural Antiquities, Cathedrals, &c.; the elder Pugin's Antiquities of Normandy; Gothic Specimens and Gothic Examples; Neale's Westminster Abbey, &c. Nor must we omit to mention the Memorials of Oxford and Memorials of Cambridge, both of which were projected and executed by Mr. Le Keux. His eldest son, J. H. Le Keux, also enjoys a wide reputation as an architectural engraver: see Ruskin's Modern Painters. See also English Cyc. Biography, vol. iii., 1856, 842; Lon. Gent. Mag., 1846, Pt. 1. 647.

Leland, Anna. Home; or, Recollections of a New England Family, N. York, 1856, 12mo. This work has been highly commended by several critics, and ridiculed in at least one other quarter.

Leland, Charles G., an accomplished American scholar, of the same family as the famous antiquary John Leland, was b. in Philadelphia, August 15, 1824, graduated at Princeton College in 1846, and subsequently continued his studies at the Universities of Heidelberg, Munich, and Paris, under the guidance of Germanus, Thiersch, and Schlosser. (See Davidson, D., M.D.) Since Mr. Leland's return to America, he has varied the severity of his erudite investigations by contributions to the periodicals of the day. Among these must be especially noticed a series of papers originally pub. in The Knickerbocker under the title of (1) Sketch-Book of Meister Karl, and afterwards given to the world in a collective form, Phila., 1855, 8vo, pp. 338.

"An extraordinary production full of natural sentiment, wit, amiable humor incidents of foreign travel, description moralizing, original poetry, odd extracts and curious learning, all combined so as to display effectively the author's information vivacity, and independence, and to illustrate the life of a student of the most catholic temper and ambition."—Griswold's Prose and Poetry of America, 16th ed. Phila., 1855, 586.

Washington Irving commends the Sketch-Book for "its curious and quaint erudition, its graphic delineations, its vein of genuine poetry, and its true Rabelais humour."

"It is not devoid of clever smartness: but the intention to be clever spoils the flavour, for cleverness prepense is almost as bad as malice prepense."—Lon. Athenæum.

2. The Poetry and Mystery of Dreams, 1855, 12mo, pp. 271. This is a work of more learning than would be inferred from the title. Mr. Leland has not only laid under contribution the works of modern authors, but has lingered with the enthusiasm of an antiquary (an ancient profession in his family) over the speculations of Artemidorus and Astrampsychius, and lent an indulgent ear to the vagaries of Achmet and Nicephorus. After an hour equitably divided between Macnish on the Philosophy of Sleep and Leland on the Poetry of Dreams, consider thy brain a hopeless dullard, O lethargic reader, if thy couch be unvisited by dreams. Write thyself down Somniculosus, and let thy "talk be of bullocks" for the rest of thy days.

3. Pictures of Travel; trans. from the German of Heinrich Heine. Pub. in Nos., Phila. and Lon.: commenced, 1855. This translation has elicited many warm—but not in all cases unmixed—commendations from a number of very respectable authorities. Lacking space for quotations, we must be content to refer the reader to the Westminster Rev., Jan. 1856; Lon. Athenæum, Dec. 29, 1855, (a portion of this notice was transferred to Littell's Liv. Age, xlviii. 427;) Lon. Economist, (transferred to Littell's Liv. Age, xlvii. 375;) Lon. Leader, Sept. 1, 1855; Lon. It is now known that the memoirs of Heine, the existence of which has been a matter of speculation, are extant in those gigantic characters which the poet's long of sight in his latter days obliged him to employ. It was the writer's request that these papers should not see the light during the lifetime of his widow: only those, therefore, who may reasonably hope to survive this respected lady can expect to peruse the autobiography of her late celebrated husband. A number of his posthumous poems will shortly be issued, and M. Alfred Meissner, who has been intrusted with the arrangement of Heine's literary remains, intends to publish at Hamburg a biography of the poet. It will be remembered that Heine was born at Dusseldorf in 1797, educated at Gottingen and Berlin, and died in 1847. To undertake the translation of the Reisebilder required no little courage; but it would appear, from the great preponderance of favourable criticism, that Mr. Leland did not overestimate his philological resources. This young but very successful writer is connected with the editorial department of the Phila. Evening Bulletin, and is also editor of Graham's Illustrated Magazine. Since the above was written, we notice the announcement of a translation of Heine's Book of Songs by John E. Wallis, Lon., 1856, cr. 8vo. See also Edin Rev., July, 1856; N. Amer. Rev., lxix. 216, (by W. H. Hurlbut,) and Fraser's Mag., xxvi. 733.

Leland, Henry P., brother of the preceding, a favourite contributor to the New York Knickerbocker, the New York Spirit of the Times, and other American periodicals, has recently pub. a collection of his fugitive pieces under the title of The Grey Bay Mare, and other Humorous Sketches of American Life, Phila., 18.6, 12mo. This vol. is highly commended by the Petersburg Express, and styled "an agreeable companion" by the New York Criterion of June 21, 1856.

Leland, Leyland, or Laylonde, John, an eminent English antiquary, born in London in the beginning of the sixteenth century, died, after two years' insanity, (produced by intense mental application,) in 1552, was educated in early youth at St. Paul's School, under the famous William Lilly, and subsequently studied at Christ's College, Cambridge, and All Souls' College, Oxford. After accumulating a vast store of learning at home and abroad, he became chaplain to Henry VIII., who gave him the rectory of Popding in the marches of Calais, and in 1533 dignified him with the title of his antiquary. By this commission his majesty laid his commands on him to make search after "England's antiquities, and peruse the libraries of all cathedrals, abbeys, priories, colleges, &c., and places where records, writings, and secrets of antiquity were reposited." Never did the enraptured heir of broad acres and well-filled coffers peruse a loving father's last testament with more delight than swelled the heart of our erudite Dominie Sampson as he gloated over this ravishing parchment: so, grasping his oaken staff, girding his loins, and binding tightly his sandal-shoon, the happy Oldbuck of a former generation went on his way rejoicing. Gruff old Harry, who, in spite of his odd habit of plundering monasteries and chopping off his wives' heads after breakfast, knew how to enjoy a quiet joke, no doubt gave a sly wink to some of the attendant courtiers (delighted with his honest enthusiasm) as he grasped the antiquary's hand at parting, charged him not to leave a parchment unturned nor a Roman hypocaust unexplored, and dismissed him with his benedictions and applause. Six years did the zealous Leland travel from library to scriptorium, from tumulus to tower, from castle to monastery. In 1542, he returned to give an account of his explorations to his royal master. But we must let him tell his own story:

"I have so travelled in your dominions, both by the seacoasts and the middle parts, sparing neither labour nor costs, by the space of these six years past, that there is almost neither cape nor bay, haven, creek, or pier, river or confluence of rivers, branches, washes, lakes, meres, fenny waters, mountains, valleys, moors, heaths, forests, chases, woods, cities, boroughs, castles, principal manor-places, monasteries, and colleges, but I have seen them, and noted in so doing a whole world of things very memorable, . . . And because that it may be more permanent and further known than to have it engraved in silver or brass, I intend, by the leave of God, within the space of twelve months following, such a description to make of your realm in writing, that it shall be no mastery, after, for the graver or painter to make a like, by a perfect example."

But the good antiquary had been building a monument in more senses than one: he was buried under the prodigious number of MSS. he had collected, and, after six years spent in the endeavour to arrange and digest them, he found himself still at a hopeless distance from the press. In his despair—suffering from the want of an intelligent amanuensis, &c.—he thus writes to his friend Cranmer:

"Est congesta mihi domi supellex
Ingens, sacra, nobilis,
Qua totus studeo Britannicarum
Vero reddere gloriam nitori;
Sed fortuna meis novercæ cœptis
Jam felicibus invidet maligne.
Quare, ne pereant brevi vel hora
Multarum mihi noctium labores
Omnes——
Cranmere, eximium decus priorum!
Implorare tuam benignitatem
Cogor:" &c.

The pressure was too great: the brain cannot with impunity be so mercilessly taxed,—we had a melancholy proof of this, latterly, in the case of Hugh Miller!—and Leland became first a moody man, and then a madman.

"Proh tristes rerum humanarum vices! proh viri optimi deplorandam infelicissimamque sortem."—Tho. Smith: Pref. to Camden's Life.

"The precious and voluminous MSS. of Leland were doomed to suffer a fate scarcely less pitiable than that of their owner. After being pilfered by some and garbled by others, they served to replenish the pages of Stow, Lambarde, Camden, Burton, Dugdale, and many other antiquaries and historians. 'Leland's Remains,' says Bagford, 'have been ever since a standard to all that have anyway treated of the Antiquities of England.'"—Dibdin's Bibliomania, ed. 1842, 242-245, q. v.

We have already noticed Hall's publication of Leland's Commentarii de Scriptoribus Britannicis, (see Hall, Anthony, D.D., No. 1,) Hearne's eds. of Leland's Itinerary and of his Collectanea, (see Hearne, Thomas, Nos. 5 and 6,) and for further information regarding this laborious antiquary and his works must refer the reader to the Lives of Leland, Hearne, and Wood, edited by W. Huddesford, Keeper of the Ashmolean Library, 1772, 2 vols. 8vo; Bliss's Wood's Athen. Oxon.; Chalmers's Biog. Dict.; Watt's Bibl. Brit.; Lowndes's Bibl. Man., 892, 1116, 1117; Dibdin's Lib. Comp., ed. 1825, 156, 185, 205, 225, 226, 516, 517; Disraeli's Quarrels of Authors; Calamities of Authors; On the Literary Character, in collective ed. of these works, 1840, 123, 124, 292, 294, 479. The greater part of Leland's works are included in the Itinerary and the Collectanea just noticed. Many of his MSS. will be found in the Cottonian and Bodleian Libraries. We must not omit to mention that Henry VIII. rewarded his indefatigable labours by giving him the rectory of Hasely, in Oxfordshire, a canonry of King's College, (now Christ Church,) Oxford, and the prebend of East and West Knowle in the church of Sarum. We have quoted some of the antiquary's verses, and will add a brief criticism upon his merits as a poet:

"The epigrams and hendecasyllables of Leland, the first Englishman who, after the restoration of letters, wrote Latin poetry, without any pretensions to classical taste, have occasionally much eloquence and beauty."—Dr. Drake.

It would be very hard to demonstrate the priority in point of time which Dr. Drake is willing to assign to Leland. Nothing is more difficult than to decide with any degree of probability upon questions of this character.

Leland, John, D.D., 1691-1766, a native of Wigan, Lancashire, pastor of a congregation of Presbyterian dissenters in Dublin, acquired great reputation by his treatises in defence of Christianity against its enemies. 1. A Defence of Christianity, Dubl., 1733, 2 vols. 8vo; Lon., 1740, 2 vols. 8vo; 1753, 2 vols. 8vo. This is an answer to Tindal's Christianity as old as the Creation. 2. The Divine Authority of the O. and N. Test. Asserted, 1739, 2 vols. 4to; 1837, 8vo. This is an answer to Morgan's Moral Philosopher. 3. Remarks on [Dodwell's] Christianity not founded on argument: in two Letters, 1744, 2 vols. 8vo. 4. Remarks on Lord Bolingbroke's Letters on the Study and Use of History, Dubl. and Lon., 1753, 8vo. 5. The Case fairly Stated, Dubl., 1754, 8vo. 6. A View of the Deistical Writers, &c., 1754-56, 3 vols., and two Supplements. A new ed. of the whole, with an Appendix by W. L. Brown, D.D., appeared in 1798, 2 vols. 8vo. The 5th ed. and the best, with a valuable Introduction, comprising a succinct View of the Subsequent History of the Controversy, by Cyrus R. Edmonds, was pub. in one octavo vol., pp. 730, Lon., 1837. This we have carefully read through, and know not how to say enough in its commendation. He who can read this work and yet remain an unbeliever in Christianity must be hopelessly obtuse or perversely prejudiced. See Landner, Nathaniel, D.D. 7. A tract on the Liberty of the People of Ireland, 1754, 8vo. 8. The Advantage and Necessity of the Christian Revelation, Lon., 1764, 2 vols. 4to; 1768, 2 vols. 8vo; 3d ed., Glasg., 1819, 2 vols. 8vo. 9. Discourses on Various Subjects, with the Life, &c. of the Author, by the Rev. Dr. Isaac Weld, 1769, 4 vols. 8vo. Bishop Jebb (see his Correspondence with Alexander Knox) at one time intended to reprint these Discourses. For further information respecting Leland, see Weld's Life as above, and the life in British Biography, vol. x. Bishops Tomline, Watson, and other eminent divines, strongly recommend the perusal of Leland's works.

"One of the ablest champions against the deists, and for the defence of Christianity, that ever lived in any age or nation; and his works will remain as immortal monuments of clear, fair, masculine reasoning, and convincing demonstration, as long as reason and the world shall endure."—Dr. John Eyland.

"Leland's View, as likewise his Treatises on the Necessity of Revelation, and on the Authority of the Old and New Testament, all display the superior powers of his mind, the soundness of his judgment, and his intimate acquaintance with all the subterfuges of deism."—Rogue.

"Every one who wishes to make himself master of the Deistical controversy will carefully study Leland's Divine Authority of the Old and New Testament and his View of the Deistical Writers; yet Leland's greatest and most useful work is his Necessity and Advantages of the Christian Revelation. He who desires to know the full value of the Bible should above all things study this book. It contains the latest and maturest thoughts of the very able author."—Williams's C. P.

"Leland's Advantages and Necessity of the Christian Revelation is a work full of information as to the state of religion among the Heathen. His other works in defence of religion are equally ... An able Champion of the Christian faith."—Beveridge's C. A.

The reader must refer to Leland's own account of Nos. 1, 2, 3, and 4 in Edmonds's ed. of the View of the Deistical Writers, 1837, 8vo, pp. 102, &c., 114, &c., 120, 155, 208, et seq.

Leland, Thomas, D.D., 1722–1785, a native of Dublin, educated at, and Fellow of, Trinity College in that city; Prof. of Poetry, 1763; Pub. of St. Patrick's, and Vicar of Bray, 1785. He was a profound scholar and a most eloquent preacher. 1. Orations of Demosthenes, and Latin Version, and Notes, Lon., 1754, 2 vols. 12mo; in conjunction with Dr. John Stokes. 2. Orations [19] of Demosthenes, in English, 1756–61–70, 3 vols. 4to: last ed., 1831, 12mo.

"The eloquent translator of Demosthenes"—Disraeli's Quarrels of Authors, ed. 1840, 167.

"The elegant translation which they say you have made of Demosthenes"—Bishop Warburton.

But Warburton did not mean to please Leland. See Disraeli, ubi supra, 174.

"The orations are distinguished for simplicity, and, and for and they are translated with great ability and accuracy. He says the orations present to us models which, all in positions, approach the nearest to perfect ... His eulogy appears to be extravagant, when we consider how ... his orations are read and studied even by scholars of state-craft ... when we recur to the speeches of Pitt, Fox, Burke, Hamilton, Alex. Webster, or Clay, or Brougham."—Chancellor Kent: Lectures of a Course of Eng. Reading, Oakley's ed., N. York 1840, 8vo.

3. Hist. of the Life and Reign of Philip, K. ... of Macedon, 1758, 2 vols. 4to; last ed., 1820, 2 vols. 8vo.

"The Life of Philip contains many curious researches into the principles of government established among the leading States of Greece, many sagacious remarks on their intestine discords, many exact descriptions of their most celebrated characters, together with an extensive and correct view of the subtle intrigues and those ambitious projects by which Philip, at a favourable crisis, gradually obtained an unexampled and fatal mastery over the Grecian republics."—Dr. Parr: Tracts of a Warburtonian

4. Dissert. on the Principles of Human Eloquence, &c., 1764, 4to. Elicited by Bp. Warburton's Discourse on the Doctrine of Grace. Answered (anonymously) by Hurd, on behalf of Warburton, in a very petulant letter. See Answer to a Letter to him, &c., 1764, 4to. This is a reply to Hurd.

"Leland answered for himself, and, in the opinion of all the world, completely demolished his antagonist."—Lord Jeffrey's Obs. to Edin. Rev., Lon., 1853, 8vo, q. v.

5. Serms., 1769, 4 vols. 8vo. 7. The Orations of Æschines and Demosthenes on the Crown; trans. into English, with Notes, 1770, 3 vols. 8vo. 8. Exam. of Arguments in a late introduc. to the Hist. of the Ancient Irish and Scots, 1772, 4to. Anon. This is levelled at James Macpherson's Hist., 177 , 4to. 9. Hist. of Ireland, 1773, 3 vols. 4to. Comprises the period from the Invasion by Henry II. to the Revolution in 1688. Leland was assisted by Drs. O'Connor and other members of the Dublin Society.

"It is written with judgment, care, and just discrimination."—Chancellor Kent: A Course of Eng. Reading, &c.

"The Dictionary which Mr Lemon wrote with the aid of papers left to him by the learned Mr. Spelman, of Norfolk, is a decided proof of erudition."—Dr. Parr.

4. Hist. of the Civil Wars, &c.: see Spelman, Edward.

Lemon, Mark, b. in London, Nov. 30, 1809, is the author of about sixty plays, principally farces and melodramas, of which The School for Tigers, The Serious Family, and The Ladies' Club, are among the best-known. He has pub. The Enchanted Doll, Lon., 1849, sq., (a Christmas Fairy Tale for children,) and a vol. entitled Prose and Verse, 1852, 12mo, originally contributed to the Illuminated Magazine and other periodicals. He was one of the editors of Punch from its commencement, and two years after the event became sole editor, which post he still retains (1857). He is also well known as the literary editor of, and a large contributor to, the Illustrated London News, and as one of the writers in Dickens's Household Words.

Lemon, Robert. Calendar of State Papers, &c., 1547–1580, Lon., 1856, 8vo. The publication of these papers is an event of no small interest to historical students. Mrs. Everett Green, and Messrs. Bruce, Brewer, and Hamilton, are engaged in the preparation of other vols.; so that by January we shall probably have at least (including the present vol.) 3 vols pub., each containing an account of 8000 to 10,000 MSS.

"Facts of moment in our national history and in the biography of our worthies—facts over which the fullest seem to have long closed—will here be recovered"—Lon. Athenæum, Jan. 24, 1857, 107 sqq., q. v.

Lempriere, William, Apothecary to his Majesty's Forces, afterwards M.D. 1. Tour from Gibraltar to Tangier, &c., Lon., 1791, 8vo; 1793, 8vo.

"The author of this work (who was a medical man, sent by the Governor of Gibraltar, at the request of the Emperor of Morocco, whose son was dangerously ill) possessed, from the peculiar circumstances in which he was placed, excellent opportunities of procuring information. The most interesting and novel parts of his work relate to the harem of the emperor, to which, in his medical character, he had access: the details into which he enters respecting its internal arrangements and the manners of its inhabitants are very full and curious."—Stevenson's Voyages and Travels.

Those who possess this work must not fail to add to it A Corrective Supplement to Mr. Lempriere's Tour, by F. Sanchez, a Spanish Gardener in Morocco, 8vo. Printed at Amsterdam. 2. Diseases of the Army in Jamaica, 1792–97, &c., 1799, 2 vols. 8vo. 3. Chalybeate Water at Sandrocks, 1812, 8vo.

Lennox, Charles. The Duchess de la Vallière: a Histor. Novel, from the French, Lon., 1814, 2 vols. 12mo.

Lennox, Charlotte, 1720–1804, a native of New York, of which city her father, Colonel James Ramsay, was Lieutenant-Governor, was sent at the age of fifteen to London, where she supported herself by her literary talents. She was on friendly terms with Richardson and Dr. Johnson, and the latter considered her intellectual abilities equal to those of either Hannah More or Fanny Burney. 1. Poems, Lon., 1747, 8vo. Pub. under her maiden name. 2. Memoir of Harriet Stuart, 1751. 3. The Female Quixote, 1752, 2 vols. 8vo. A very good work.

"But her [Dorothy Osborne's] favourite books were those ponderous French romances which modern readers know chiefly from the pleasant satire of Charlotte Lennox."—T. B. Macaulay: Art. on William Temple, Edin. Rev., Oct. 1838, and in his Works, 1854, ii. 292.

Leslie, Charles, 1650?–1722, a native of Ireland, second son of Dr. John Leslie, Bishop of Clogher, was educated at Trinity College, Dublin; entered himself in the Temple at London, 1671; admitted into holy orders, 1680; Chancellor of the Cathedral of Connor, 1687. Refused to take the oaths to William and Mary, and appeared himself to theological and political controversy, on which subjects he pub. many treatises. He was a defender of arbitrary power, endeavoured by his writings to promote the cause of the banished Stuarts, and retired abroad with the Pretender from 1713 to '21.

"His abilities and his connexions were such that he might easily have obtained high preferment in the Church of England. But he took his place in the front rank of the Jacobite leaders and remained there steadfastly through all the dangers and vicissitudes of three-and-thirty troubled years. Though constantly engaged in theological controversy with Deists, Jews, Socinians, Papists, and Quakers, he found time to be one of the most vehement political writers of his age. Of all the clergy he was the best-qualified to discuss constitutional questions before he had taken orders he had resided for some time at the Temple and had been studying English history and law, while most of the other chiefs of the schism had been poring over the Acts of Chalcedon, or seeking for wisdom in the Targum of Onkelos."—T. B. MACAULAY: Hist. of England, vol. iii., 1855, chap. xxviii. [xxvii.] chap. xviii., n.

But his legal education does not appear, according to Mr. Hallam, to have been of much benefit to the p

"Leslie's Case of the Regale and Pontificate . . . is full of enormous misrepresentation as to the English law. Leslie, however, like many other controversialists, wrote impetuously and hastily for his immediate purpose."—Const. Hist. of England, 7th ed., 1854, 175, n. See also p. 218.

Of Leslie's Theological Writings, a collective ed was pub. by himself, Lon., 1721, fol.; new ed., Oxf., 1832, 7 vols. 8vo. Of his political works there has been no collective ed., and probably never will be. A new ed. of The Regale and Pontificate was pub., Lon., 1838, 8vo; of the Divine Right of Tithes, 1845, fp. 8vo; of the Case stated between the Churches of Rome and England, (see HALLAM, p. 218, ubi supra,) 1849, p. 8vo; 1855, 12mo. Of his theological tracts the best-known are—1. A Short and Easy Method with the Jews, 1689. 2. A Short and Easy Method with the Deists, 1694, 8vo. 3. The Snake in the Grass, 1697, 8vo: against the Quakers. His Select Works, with a Life, were pub. 1841, 8vo. The last ed. of No. 2 was pub., Edin., 1854, 18mo. It has been supposed by some that this excellent little work was borrowed from the Abbé St. Réal, but this opinion is altogether untenable. For theological treatises have elicited so much commendation as The Short and Easy Method with Deists.

"No book of this period among many that were written reached so high a reputation as Leslie's Short Method with the Deists, published in 1698,—in which he started an argument, pursued with more critical analysis by others on the peculiarly distinctive marks of credibility that pertain to the Scripture miracles. The authenticity of this little treatise has been idly questioned on the Continent. . . . The internal . . . that the Short Method written by a Protestant should be conclusive."—Hallam's Lit. Hist. of Europe, 4th ed., 1854, iii. 288.

See the note, where the Biographie Universelle is deservedly rebuked for its unfair version of this controversy,—if, indeed, it be worth that name. See also Prosper Marchand's Dictionnaire Historique, art. SAINT RÉAL: and the authorities at conclusion of this article.

"No single theological work was perhaps received so much applause as his Short and Easy Method with the Deists, . . . of which the reprints are innumerable."—Dublin's Lib. Compn., ed. 1825, 89.

"We have the historical evidence for the truth of Scripture exhibited in a form so convincing and satisfactory that the mind which can resist such evidence must evince a total perversity of reason as well as an abjuration of all such testimony as can substantiate the truth of any by-gone event in the world's history."—Dr. CHALMERS.

"Leslie's most excellent work contains irrefutable arguments in favour of Christianity, but it is rather theological, requiring more attention than men in general are willing to afford any subject, however important."—Blackwood's Mag. xxxii. 100. Review of Dr. Wm. E. Channing's Last Ser. on the Evidences of Christianity, before the Univ. of Cambridge, Mass., 14, 1841.

"Since infidelity is constantly reviving, and though repeatedly laid prostrate by the weapons of truth still rises with unexhausted vigour, the chances are that Christians will do well neither to abandon nor neglect such arms as Leslie has prepared for him, of which time has not injured the temper nor taken off the edge."—Christian Remembrancer, xxxiii. 1857.

Leslie, Charles. Com. to Med. Com., 1774.

Leslie, Charles Robert, R.A., b. in London, Oct. 19, 1794, of American parents, of Scotch descent, besides painting many good pictures, has written two good books,—which last fact entitles him to a place in our columns. Those who desire to read some comments upon the artist (for we have only to do with the author) are referred to the English Cyclopædia, Lon., 1856, Biography, vol. iii. 863; Man of the Time, 1856, 475, Blackw. Mag., xv. 507, xvi. 134, 507, xxiv. 699, xlii. 326 also 315, xlviii. 378, l. 347. Mrs. Jameson—a most competent critic—has no hesitation in pronouncing Leslie "the finest interpreter of the spirit of Shakspeare."

1. Memoirs of John Constable, R.A., chiefly from his Letters, Lon., 1843, fol., with illustrations; 2d ed., with addit. Correspondence, 1845, sm. 4to.

"Got up in a peculiar, antique, and handsome manner, congenial to, and worthy of, the subject. The world at large will find much to entertain and instruct in this interesting biography; artists and amateurs in particular will derive great instruction, and every class of readers useful intelligence and agreeable amusement. Mr. Leslie has performed his task with infinite taste and discrimination,—giving the opinions of a competent authority upon the productions of his contemporary and friend, and bringing out the remarkable qualities and estimable points of poor Constable's amiable private character in every relation of life with unaffected simplicity and consequent effect."—Lon. Literary Gazette.

See Lon. Athenæum, Jan. 27, 1844, 101, and Jan. 6, 1855, 21.

2. A Hand-book for Young Painters, 1855, cr. 8vo. This may be called an improved and enlarged ed. of the author's Lectures to the Students of the Royal Academy, whilst Professor of Painting, 1847–51.

"Mr. Leslie adds one more to the number of accomplished men who, like Sir Joshua Reynolds, write as admirably as they paint. Though the title of this Hand-book might lead to the inference that it was only adapted for artists, it will be read with delight and instruction by every person who has any enjoyment in pictures."—Lon. Quar. Rev., April, 1856.

"The book abounds in quotable, melodious passages, pregnant with thought, observation, and tenderest feeling, and falling sweetly upon the ear like the echoes of a poetic mind. Indeed it is a book of Wisdom and Goodness as well as of Art and Taste,—'wholesome literature,' as we have said."—Westminster Rev., April, 1855.

"It is a thoroughly readable book written in an agreeable and modest style, without either pretension or pedantry."—Blackwood's Mag., Dec. 1855.

"Mr. Leslie's mind, while very universal and academic in its tastes, is certainly not beyond its age, nor free from ultra conservative and conventional peculiarities. His genius is not innovating nor subversive, and rests quite satisfied with old truths, and sometimes, we almost think, with old errors. . . . It is as an opposer of many of Mr. Ruskin's opinions, however, that Mr. Leslie chiefly demands the thanks of the artistic world. He shows that it is from Lord Lindsay that this reformer has so largely borrowed. . . . On Turner, as put into competition with Claude, and absurdly praised by Mr Ruskin, Mr. Leslie is justly severe." Lon. Athen., Jan. 6, 1855, 20–22.

"By all [illegible] repeat, let the [illegible] who [illegible] to the galleries of modern art for fashion's sake carefully read Mr. Leslie's book, and get a hint of the way in which good pictures should be studied."—Lon. Examiner.

Leslie, David, Lord Newark. 1. Two Speeches touching Bishops, Lon., 1641, 4to. 2. Speech to the trained bands of Nottinghamshire, 1642, 4to.

Leslie, Eliza, a very popular American writer, a native of Philadelphia, sister of Charles Robert Leslie, the artist, is a descendant of Robert Leslie, a Scotchman, who settled in this country about 1745. Her father, a valued friend of President Jefferson, Benjamin Franklin, and other representative men of the day, was noted for quick perceptions and extensive scientific knowledge, which he delighted to communicate to others, and all of his five children have given evidence of more than ordinary abilities. Of these, all yet survive: Thomas Jefferson is a major in the United States army; Anna Leslie, who resides in New York, has attained wide celebrity by her skill as an amateur painter: and the youngest of the family is the wife of the distinguished writer on Political Economy, Henry C. Carey, (see p. 338 of this Dictionary.) Miss Leslie has told her own story in so interesting a manner that it will only be necessary for us to refer the reader to the charming autobiography (originally communicated to Mrs Alice B. Neal) in Hart's Female Prose Writers of America, whilst we pass on to an enumeration of her contributions to the literature of her country. 1. Seventy-Five Receipts for Pastry, Cakes, and Sweetmeats, 1827. 2. The Mirror: Juvenile Stories. 3. The Young Americans. 4. Stories for Emma. 5. Stories for Adelaide. 6. Atlantic Tales. 7. Stories for Helen. 8. Birth-Day Stories. 9. The Wonderful Traveller: an abridgment, with alterations, of Munchausen, Gulliver, and Sinbad. 10. American Girl's Book, 1831. 11. Pencil Sketches: Three Series, 1833–35–37.

"They are all written in a correct, easy, and spirited style, and exhibit a very keen and nice observation of the various scenes of domestic life, with a happy talent for working up the results in a narrative form. . . . Mrs Washington Potts is perhaps the best, as it is the longest and most elaborate, of the tales, though Frank Finlay is in some respects the most agreeable. Uncle Philip and The Deserted Lady are also particularly good. . . . We shall be happy to meet Miss Leslie as a painter of scenes and subjects which would give pleasanter impressions of American society to those who do not know our country, and bring back pleasanter recollections to those who do. Vulgarity, foolishness, and affectation are the growth of every soil: human nature, there is much reason to believe, is very much the same on this as on the other side of the globe."—W. B. O. Peabody: N. Amer. Rev., xxxvii. 466: review of First Series.

12. Domestic Cookery-Book, 1837. This book reached its 41st ed. (not one of which consisted of less than 1000 copies) before 1851. The gross sale of Miss Leslie's Cookery and Receipt Books has been about 100,000 to this date, (1857.) 13. Althea Vernon; or, The Embroidered Handkerchief, 1838. 14. Henrietta Harrison; or, The Blue Cotton Umbrella, 1838. 15. Kitty's Relations. 16. Leonilla Lyamore. 17. House-Book, 1840; last ed., 1854.

"The work which Miss Leslie has here given them might be studied half a year with great benefit, even though the lady never had occasion to exercise her knowledge. . . . Miss Leslie takes the student by the hand and leads her over her home that is to be, explaining the use and benefit of each apartment, the proper mode of caring for it, gives directions for furniture, with curtains to match, &c."—Southern Literary Gazette.

18. Lady's Receipt-Book, 1846. 19. The Maid of Canal Street, and the Bloxhams. 20. Indian Meal Book. 21. Amelia; or, A Young Lady's Vicissitudes, 1848. This is the only novel which Miss Leslie has written. 22. The Dennings and their Beaux, with Alina Deriay, 1851. 23. French Cookery. 24. Stories for Young People. 25. Stories for Summer Days and Winter Nights. 26. Russel and Sydney, and Charles Loring: Tales of the American Revolution. 27. Behaviour Book, 1853.

"A work apparently much required in some parts of America."—English Cyclopædia: Biography, 1856, vol. iii. 864.

Undoubtedly, "in some parts" of all countries. Miss Leslie has edited The Gift, The Violet, &c., and contributed largely to Godey's Lady's Book, Graham's Magazine, and other periodicals.

"Miss Leslie has much individuality, and in all her writings has exhibited decided talent. Her style is mature and spirited, her fable sufficiently simple and probable, her characters boldly and clearly, and perhaps in all cases accurately, drawn, and her description narrative, and dialogue uniformly well managed."—Griswold's Prose Writers of America, q. v.

"Her tales are perfect daguerreotypes of real life: their actors think, act, and speak for themselves, with a keen eye for the ludicrous, the failings of human nature are never portrayed but to warn the young and the thoughtless. Her writings are distinguished for vivacity and ease of expression, strong common sense, and right principle. In her juvenile tales the children are neither 'good little girls or bad little boys,' but real little boys and girls, who act and speak with all the genuineness and naïveté of childhood. No writer of fiction in our country has ever had a wider or [illegible] circle [illegible] admirers and [illegible] clergymen, proved by the increased circulation of all those publications in which her name has appeared as a regular contributor."—Prof. Hart's Female Prose Writers of America.

"Miss Leslie has quick observation, a retentive memory, a sprightly fancy, and a persevering mind, she has also the great merit of being free from affectation: her purpose is always to be useful, to correct faults, expose follies, and wage war with what is perverse and contemptible."—Mrs Hale's Woman's Record.

But the most celebrated of his papers in the Encyclopædia is the Dissertation in vol. i. on The Progress of Mathematical and Physical Sciences, chiefly during the Eighteenth Century. For this essay the author received about £500,—an amount for which some good-natured authors would engage to furnish a whole book. Sir John was never married. "It would be impossible, we think, for any intelligent and well-constituted mind, thoroughly acquainted with the powers and attainments of Sir John Leslie, to view them without a strong feeling of admiration for his vigorous and inventive genius, and of respect for that extensive and varied knowledge which his active curiosity, his excursive reading, and his happy memory had enabled him to amass and digest. His theoretical notions may be thrown aside or condemned; but his exquisite instruments and his experimental combinations will ever attest the mighty no less than the originality of his labours and continue to act as helps to further discovery."—Prof. Napier; ubi supra.

"The business of licensing books was entrusted to Sir Roger L'Estrange, a well known pamphleteer of that age, and himself a most scurrilous libeller on behalf of the party he espoused,—that of popery and despotic power. It is hardly necessary to remind the reader of the objects to that were raised to one of two Houses of Parliament."—Hallam's Constit. Hist. of England, 7th ed., 1854, iii. 4

This eminent critic admires Sir Roger's literary taste as little as his political principles

"The pattern of bad writing in this respect (slang) was Sir Roger L'Estrange: his pages [illegible] will present every thing that is [illegible] in wit and readiness in railing L'Estrange was a popular writer, and may even be admired with some moderation."—Lit. Hist. of Europe, 4th ed., 1854, iii. 553.

"Sir Roger L'Estrange among his rivals was esteemed as the most perfect model of political writing. He was a strong party-writer on the government side for Charles the Second, and the compositions of the author seem to us coarse, yet they contain much idiomatic expression. His Æsop's Fables are a curious specimen of familiar style."—Disraeli's Curiosities of Lit., ed. Lon., 1851, 57

"His Æsop's Fables was more a new work than a translation. The most valuable of his books is his translation of Josephus, which though in a better style than most of his writings, has been very justly censured. He was one of the great corrupters of our language, by exploding words and other letters and commonly pronounced and introducing pert and affected phrases."—Granger's Biog. Hist. of Eng., 5th ed., 1824, v. 270.

In a notice of Quevedo's Visions, by Mr. Ticknor, in his History of Spanish Literature, this eminent scholar remarks

"All the translations I have seen are bad. The best is that of L'Estrange, which at least the most spirited, but still L'Estrange is not always a child when he knew the meaning, and he is sometimes unfaithful from ignorance. Indeed the great popularity of his translation [illegible] the additions he boldly made to his text, and the frequent accommodations he hazarded of its jests to the scandal and taste of his time, by allusions entirely English and local."—Vol. ii. 551, n. N. York, 1855

"L'Estrange was by no means deficient in readiness and shrewdness, and he does [illegible] though coarse and disfigured by a mean and flippant party-spirit which then passed for wit in the green-room and the tavern, was not without keenness and vigour. But his nature, at once ferocious and ignoble, showed itself in every line that he penned."—T. B. Macaulay's Hist. of Eng., vol. i.

Lever, Sir Ashton, d. 1788, was noted for his excellent museum. Companion to his Museum, Lon., 1790, 4to. See Lon. Gent. Mag., 1788; European Mag., 1788.

Lever, Charles James, M.D., the popular novelist, was born in Dublin, August 31, 1806, was educated at Trinity College in his native city, and afterwards took a degree at Göttingen; practised medicine with great success in the North of Ireland, during the cholera-season of 1832; was subsequently nominated to the post of Physician to the British Embassy at Brussels, and filled this office for three years; in April, 1842, became editor of the Dublin University Magazine; in 1845 removed to Florence, where he has since resided, still writing for the periodical formerly under his superintendence. Mr. Lever has been a voluminous author, as the following list of his works—to which might be added a number not acknowledged to be from his pen—gives ample evidence.

1. Confessions of Harry Lorrequer, 1840, 8vo; 1845, 8vo; 1850, 8vo. 2. Charles O'Malley, the Irish Dragoon, 1841, 2 vols. 8vo; 1850, 2 vols. 8vo. 3. Jack Hinton, (Our Mess, vol. i.,) new ed., 1843, 8vo; 1850, 8vo. 4 Tom Burke of Ours, (Our Mess, vols. ii. and iii.,) 1844, 2 vols. 8vo; 1850, 8vo. 5. Arthur O'Leary, 1844, 3 vols. p. 8vo; 1845, 8vo. 6. The O'Donoghue; a Tale of Ireland, 1845, 8vo; 1850, 8vo. 7. St. Patrick's Eve, 1845, 16mo; 1849, 16mo. 8. The Knight of Gwynne; a Tale, 1847, 2 vols. 8vo; 1850, 8vo. 9. Diary and Notes of Horace Templeton; 2d ed., 1849, 2 vols. 8vo. 10. Roland Cashel, 1849, 8vo; 1852, 2 vols. 8vo. 11. Tales of the Trains, by Tilbury Tramp, 16mo. 12. The Daltons; or, Three Roads in Life, 1852, 2 vols. 8vo; 1854, 2 vols. 8vo. 13. Maurice Tiernay, 1852. 14. The Nevilles of Garrettstown. 15. The Dodd Family Abroad, 1853–54, 8vo. 16. Sir Jasper Carew, 1854. 17. The Commissioner; or, De Lunatico Inquirendo. 18. Con Cregan. 19. The Mystic Vial. 20. Heirs of Randolph Abbey, 8vo. 21. The Martins of Cro' Martin, 1856, 8vo. On the first of the present year (1857) Messrs. Chapman & Hall, of London, commenced the publication of a cheap and uniform edition of Lever's Novels, (with illustrations in each vol. by H. K. Browne,—"Phiz,") in crown 8vo vols. at only four shillings each. Mr. T. B. Peterson, of Philadelphia, has also issued a selection from the novels of Lever, in 4 vols. r. 8vo.: Vol. I., Charles O'Malley; II. Harry Lorrequer, Arthur O'Leary; III. Jack Hinton, Knight of Gwynne; IV. Tom Burke of Ours, Kate O'Donoghue, Horace Templeton.

Mr. Lever is not only exceedingly popular with readers at large, but his exuberant jollity has achieved a great triumph in overcoming the gravity even of the staidest of the rigid tribe of reviewers, and eliciting commendation where one of less assurance or less fun would have been cudgelled into sobriety by unsparing castigation.

"We have a very undue propensity to underrate these stories of adventure; but we think it remains to be proved that our books of emotion and sentiment are really of a higher class, as they certainly are not of a healthier. It is good to be the favourite of youth,—good to awake the eager interest, the laugh which rings from the heart. . . . There is no dulness in Mr. Lever's dashing, daring, rapid books. Of their kind they are capital. . . . It is not Mr. Lever's forte, perhaps, to dive into the secret heart of things, or analyze his heroes and heroines: but who can take a standing leap like the author of Harry Lorrequer? Who can witch the world with such noble horsemanship? He has the true spring of Irish humour and Irish shrewdness in him. Mickey Free is as merry and honest a rogue as ever happy fancy invented: and all the secondary bits of life and character in the home-country are admirable."—Blackwood's Mag., May, 1865: Modern Novelists, Great and Small.

"The author is pre-eminent for his mirth-moving powers, for his acute sense of the ridiculous, for the breadth of his humour, and for his power of dramatic writing, which renders his boldest conceptions with the happiest facility."—Lon. Athen.

"The intense spirit and frolic of the author's sketches have made him one of the most successful writers of the day."—Lon. Lit. Gaz.

Lewes, George Henry, b. April 18, 1817, in London, after a short trial first of commerce and then of medicine, determined to gratify his strong partialities for a literary life, and, judging by his devotion to his philosophical studies, does not seem to have regretted his final choice of a profession. 1. "It does not often fall to the lot of novel-readers to meet with so clever a work as the one before us; and it is as instructive as it is amusing."—Jerrold's Newspaper.

"There is no book in our recollection where infirmity of purpose is made keenly unintelligible or more successfully demonstrated."—Lon. Britannia.

See Brit. Quar. Rev., vii. 332. 6. The Noble Heart; a Tragedy, 1850, 8vo. 7. Biographical History of Philosophy, 4 vols. 18mo, bound in 2, 1845; again, 1852.

Mr. Lewes is now (1857) engaged in rewriting this work. Since the above was written, the new ed. of the Biographical History of Philosophy has made its appearance, Lon., 1857, 8vo; N. York, 1857, 8vo.

"Seven new names have been added to the list of philosophers,—Abelard, Algazzali, Giordano Bruno, Hartley, Darwin, Ubaldis, and Gall. An Introduction setting forth the distinguishing characteristics of Philosophy and Science, replaces the original Introduction. Under the heads of Socrates, the Sophists, Aristotle, Hume, Condillac, Kant, and Eclecticism, considerable additions and alterations will be found; and throughout the revision has been such that scarcely a paragraph remains unaltered."—Author's Preface.

This work is not without value to the student; but we imagine that a little more of the spirit of true philosophy will cause the third edit., should one appear, to vary more from the second than the second does from the first.

8. Life and Works of Goethe, with Sketches of his Age and Contemporaries, from published and unpublished Sources, 1855, 2 vols. 8vo. On this work Mr. Lewes employed much labour during the ten years which preceded its publication. It has pleased the Germans greatly,—which is no marvel, considering the biographer's devotion to his hero. Dr. Julius Frese has pub. (Dec., 1856) the first vol. of an intended translation of Mr. Lewes's work.

"A more faithful and lifelike biography than this we have rarely read. The image of the living man is presented with much skill and much candour. Mr Lewes speaks often of the 'many-sidedness of Goethe,' and he shows his weak sides and dark sides as well as his great and brilliant ones, of which we all know. If the reader does not form the same high estimate of Goethe the man as Goethe the author, it will not be from want of ample materials for forming a judgment. His whole history is here laid open, and the facts are derived not from books only but from the testimony of those who knew the man, and from other authentic sources of information."—Lon. Literary Gazette, 1855, 691–693. See also 776–777.

But this critic condemns—what most dispassionate minds will deplore—the excessive exhibition of the furor biographicus which saps Mr Lewes's integrity of judgment.

"Mr G. H. Lewes has written a very good and very interesting life of Goethe. He has brought eminent qualifications to this task, for, though he is an ardent admirer of his hero, and indeed may be ranked among the Goethe idolaters, he has acuteness, discrimination and good sense."—Fraser's Magazine.

The reviewer then proceeds to rebuke Mr. Lewes for his attempt to defend Goethe against the oft repeated charges of immorality as a writer and irreligion as a man. The Life of Goethe "whilst as yet unfinished" and its author are thus referred to by the late Margaret Fuller:

"The second time Mr Carlyle had a dinner party, at which was a witty, French, flippant sort of man, author of a History of Philosophy in Love writing a life of Goethe. A task for which he must be as rigid as irreligion and sparkling shallowness can make him."

It will be remembered that the favourite object of Miss Fuller's literary life was a Memoir of Goethe, for which she had made long and assiduous preparation. Mr. Lewes was the editor of the Leader newspaper from its commencement, in 1849, until July, 1854, and he has been a contributor to the Edinburgh, Westminster, Foreign Quarterly, British and Foreign, and British Quarterly Reviews, to Blackwood, Fraser, the Classical Museum, the Monthly Chronicle, and to the Morning Chronicle and Atlas newspapers.

Lewis, Elisha J., M.D., b. 1820, in Baltimore, is a son of A. J. Lewis, an eminent merchant of Philadelphia, and a grandson of Captain Joseph Lewis, of the American Revolutionary army. The subject of our notice passed two years of his collegiate life at old Nassau Hall, Princeton, subsequently pursued his medical studies under Dr. John K. Mitchell, a distinguished physician of Philadelphia, graduated at the University of Penn-sylvania, vigorously prosecuted his medical and scientific studies in Paris, afterwards settled in Philadelphia, where he has since resided. 1. Lewis, Sir George Cornewall, Bart., M.P., a son of the late Rt. Hon. Sir Thomas Frankland Lewis, was b. in Oct. 1806, graduated at Christ Church, Oxford, with distinguished honours, in 1828; was called to the bar at the Middle Temple in 1831, and, after filling several important political posts, was made Chancellor of the Exchequer in 1855. On assuming the duties of this responsible position he resigned into the hands of Mr. Henry Reeve, of the Privy Council, the editorship of the Edinburgh Review, in which he had succeeded Professor Empson in the early part of 1864. In 1844 Sir George was married to the widow of Thomas Henry Lister, Esq., a sister of the Earl of Clarendon, and a descendant of the great Lord-Chancellor. Lady Lewis is not unknown in the Republic of Letters: see LEWIS, LADY MARIA THERESA VILLIERS.

Sir George Cornwall Lewis has given to the world the following publications: 1. Augustus Boeckh's Public Economy of Athens, &c.; trans. from the German, Lon., 1828, 2 vols. 8vo; 2d ed., 1842, 8vo.

Lewis, Matthew Gregory, M.P., 1775–1818, a son of the Deputy Secretary-at-War, and the grandson of Sir Thomas Lewis, Master of the Rolls, after studying at Christ Church, Oxford, resided for some time in Germany, where he "stocked full" of those tales of supernatural horrors which he afterwards reproduced in a new shape in his dramas and romances. In early life he was dependent upon an income allowed by his father, which young Lewis shared with his mother,—for his parents lived separately; but by the death of the former, in 1812, he came into possession of large estates in Jamaica, where he resided in 1815 and '17. To this circumstance we owe the work which (next to his Correspondence) does him the most credit,—The Journal of a West India Proprietor. He commenced authorship at a very early age, as the date of the first work in the annexed list testifies. 1. The East Indian: a Comedy written when the author was but sixteen. 2. The Monk: a Romance, Lon., 1795, 3 vols. 12mo. Often reprinted. This immoral production, founded on the story of Saxton Barlam, in The Guardian, was in danger of prosecution by the Government on account of its revolting licentiousness. Of course it sprang at once into great popularity, or, rather, was sold with great rapidity. To avert prosecution, Lewis pledged himself to recall the printed copies and to omit the objectionable passages in a future edition. To procure one of the early impressions, therefore, is now difficult, and it is to be regretted that it is not (as Dr. Johnson wished respecting the complicated piece of music which tortured his nerves) quite impossible. It is a melancholy fact that some eminent characters of the day encouraged the shameless offender in his violations of decency, literary as well as moral purity, and good taste:

"Charles Fox paid the unusual compliment of crossing the House of Commons that he might congratulate the young author, whose work obtained high praise from many other able men of that able time."—Sir Walter Scott.

The "Mothers of England" displayed more good sense:

"His Monk, that strange and extramundane production, made the reader 'sup so full of horrors' that mothers were obliged to lock it up from their sickly and sentimental daughters,—more especially as its morale was not of the choicest."—Moir's Sketches of the Lyt. Lit. of the Past Half-Century.

Allan Cunningham, after noticing Mrs. Radcliffe as "the leader of those who superseded the true supernatural by means of the false supernatural, and wrought her wonders by and of mystical machinery," &c., continues:

"The Monk by Lewis is of the same race of wild creations. All is forced and exaggerated; men and women are exhibited under a light which both distorts and discolours: human nature has not fair play for a moment: yet there is great force,—not of passion, but of posture, and great vigour of colouring,—not of nature but of artifice. This melo-dramatic sort of representation of life, startled for a time, but could not last: when truth and true passion took the field, the fictions of Lewis were of the same avail as the false rods of the prophets in the presence of the true rod of Moses."—Biog. and Crit. Hist. of the Lit of the Last Fifty Years

Sir Walter Scott styles the Monk "no ordinary exertion of genius." It is to be regretted that genius should be so perverted. Undoubtedly a strong attraction of the book was the poetry scattered through its pages:

"In spite of the objections we have stated, (indelicacy, supernatural machinery, and plagiarism,) The Monk was so highly popular that it seemed to create an epoch in our literature. But the public were chiefly captivated by the poetry with which Mr. Lewis had interspersed his prose narrative."—Scott's Essay on Imitations of the Ancient Ballad, in his Poetical Works, Abbotsford ed., Edin., 1850, 502, et seq.

"Lewis was a poet of no mean calibre. The ballads and little pieces scattered throughout his novel of the Monk were, in their day, the most popular things known. They were chanted in the street and in the drawing room: while the subject of the most terrific, (Alonzo and Imogene,) and many episodes in the novel, were represented on the stage."—Dodsley's Lib. Compn., ed. 1825, 748.

"After Mrs. Radcliffe, Monk Lewis was the greatest master of the art of freezing the blood. The robber-scene in the Monk is only inferior to that in Count Nathom and perfectly new in the ed[illegible] the che[illegible] This dev[illegible] are chargeable with unpardonable grossness; but the pieces of poetry interspersed in the fashioned novel, such as the flight of Roncesvalles and the Exile, in particular, have a romantic and delightful harmony, such as might be chanted by the moonlight pilgrim, or might lull the dreaming mariner on summer seas."—Hazlitt's Lects. on the English Novelists, Lect. VI.

We shall have something more to say respecting Lewis as a poet before we have concluded this article. We may dismiss the Monk with the remark that Southey considered it no slight condemnation when he recorded his verdict against Cumberland's novels as "More profligate in their tendency than Matthew Lewis's unhappy book."—Letter to G. C. Bedford, June 12, 1803: Southey's Life and Corresp.

The copartnership of Lewis and Scott in these marvellous tales presented too fair a mark to the author of English Bards and Scotch Reviewers to be passed over in silence:

"Oh, wonder-working Lewis, Monk, or Bard,
Who fain wouldst make Parnassus a churchyard!

All hail, M. P.! from whose infernal brain
Thin-sheeted phantoms glide, a grisly train;
At whose command 'grim women' throng in crowds,
And kings of fire, of water, and of clouds,
With 'small gray men,' 'wild yagers,' and what not,
To crown with honour thee, and Walter Scott."

One of the best descriptions we have met with of Lewis's literary peculiarities, both in poetry and prose, occurs in Moir's Sketches of the Poet. Lit. of the Past Half-Century. We have no space for further quotations; but, as we have promised to say something more of Lewis as a poet, a few lines must not be denied:

"Lewis was a man rather of enthusiastic temperament than of high and sustained imagination. He could not face the sunlight and the clear blue sky; he required clouds and tempest, a howling wind, and a troubled sea. He was what the vulture is to the eagle, what the leopard is to the lion, what the scene-painter is to the artist. His plays are what melodramas are to tragedy; and the terrors of his poetry trench as much on the burlesque as on the sublime. . . . He had an exquisite ear for versification, as demonstrated in his Durandarte, and Alonzo the Brave,—of which latter The Fire King of Smith, in The Rejected Addresses, was a legitimate and scarcely extravagant burlesque."—Ubi supra, ii, 20.

On Lewis's pieces just noticed who can reflect without pleasure when he remembers what he owes to them?

"Lewis, whatever Scott might, on maturer consideration, think of his title to such fame, [that of a poet,] had certainly done him no small service: for the ballads of Alonzo the Brave, and the Fair Imogene, and Durandarte, had rekindled effectually in his breast the spark of poetical ambition."—Lockhart's Life of Scott, Abbotsford ed., Edin., 1850, p. 81.

And see in this connection Scott's Poetical Works, Abbotsford ed., 570–571.

Southey appears to think that the influence of Lewis's poetry on Scott's youthful muse was not at all of a happy character:

"In all these modern ballads there is a modernism of thought and language-curtus to me very perceptible, and very unpleasant, the more so for its mixture with antique words —polished steel and rusty iron! This is the case in all Scott's ballads . . . Matthew G. Lewis, M.P., sins more grievously in this way; he is not enough versed in old English to avoid it. Scott and Leyden are, and ought to have written more purely."—Letter to C. B. Wilson, June 9, 1803: Southey's Life and Corresp.

It is a satisfaction to be assured that Lewis was a much better man than the character of his early writings would lead one to infer:

"Lewis," writes Lord Byron, "was a good man, a clever man but a bore. My only revenge or consolation used to be setting him by the ears with some vivacious person who hated boredom . . . Mad de Staël or Hobhouse, for example. But I liked him, he was the jewel of a man, had he been better set.—I don't personally,—but less tiresome, for he was tedious as well as contradictory to every thing and everybody. Poor fellow! he died a martyr to his new riches,—of a second visit to Jamaica.

'I'd give the lands of Deloraine
Dark Musgrave were alive again'

That is,

'I would give many a sugarcane
Mat. Lewis were alive again!'

"I would pay my share" adds Scott. He few friends one has whose faults are only ridiculous! He was one of humanity, to ameliorate the condition of [illegible]. He did much good by stealth, and was a most generous creature."

Much interesting information respecting Lewis will be found in Scott's Essay on Imitations of the Ancient Ballad, in his Poetical Works, Abbotsford ed., Edin., 1850, 562–567, 569.

Lewis, Captain Meriwether. 1774–1809, a native of Virginia, private Secretary to President Jefferson, 1801–03; Governor of Louisiana, 1806; was associated with Captain William Clarke in the command of the exploring-party, directed by Government, across the continent to the Pacific Ocean. They left St. Louis, May, 1804, had ascended the Missouri 3843 miles by July, 1805, reached the Pacific Ocean at the mouth of the Columbia in November following, and returned to St. Louis in November, 1806, having travelled about 8680 miles. The account of their travels was first made known to the world by Jefferson's Message to Congress, read Feb. 19, 1806; pub., N. York, 1806, 8vo, pp. 128; repub., Lon., 1809, 8vo, pp. 309. Another account was pub by Patrick Gass, (see p. 654 of this Dictionary,) and a complete account—prepared from the MSS. by Nicholas Biddle, but pub. under the name of Paul Allen, who only conducted the publication through the press—appeared in 1814, Phila., 2 vols. 8vo, with a Memoir of Lewis by President Jefferson. This was repub in Lon., 1814, 4to; again, 1815, 3 vols. 8vo; 1817, 3 vols. 8vo. The 1st English ed. was reviewed by Robert Southey in the London Quarterly Review, xii. 317–368. Other notices of this expedition will be found in the Edin. Rev., xxiv. 412. (by Dr. Gordon;) South. Quar. Rev., viii. 191; Analec. Mag., v. 127, 219; Method. Quar. Rev., ii. 556. Nor must the reader fail to procure the last Amer. ed., with valuable additions, of Lewis and Clarke's Travels, by Archibald McVickar, N. York, 1843, 2 vols. 18mo. President Jefferson gives Lewis a high character:

"Of courage undaunted, possessing a firmness and perseverance of purpose which nothing but impossibilities could divert from its direction; intimate with the Indian character, customs, and principles; guarded, by exact observation of the vegetables and animals of his own country, against losing time in the description of objects already possessed," &c.

Lewis's end was a melancholy one: he committed suicide near Nashville, Oct. 11, 1809, in consequence, as was supposed, of the protest of some bills drawn by him on public account. At the time of this sad occurrence he was on his way to Washington, with a view to the settlement of his affairs with the Government. The collector of books on America must not neglect to add Lewis and Clarke's Travels to his library:

"This is an interesting work, and exhibits not only some valuable geographical notices, but very copious and amusing details respecting the manners, habits, and divisions of the Indian North American tribes."—Lon. Critical Review.

Lewis, William David, a resident of Philadelphia, b. in Christiana, Delaware, 1792, visited Europe in 1811 as private Secretary to the Hon. Henry Clay, one of the American commissioners appointed by the United States to negotiate a treaty of peace with Great Britain. He subsequently resided for ten years in Russia, engaged in commercial pursuits, and, devoting his leisure to the acquisition of the language of that country, he acquired a facility in its use which he has since retained. In 1849 (32mo, pp. 72) he printed at Philadelphia, for circulation among his friends, a few copies of The Bokchesarian Fountain, by Alexander Pooshkeen, and other Poems by various Authors; translated from the original Russian by William D. Lewis. Dedicated to my Russian Friends. This is the first collection of translations from the Russian ever made by an American. This little work was the fruit of Mr. Lewis's literary researches in Russia. Several of the minor pieces in this collection were pub. anonymously, many years since, in the (Phila.) National Gazette when edited by Robert Walsh, and in the Atlantic Souvenir and other periodicals. Those who are so fortunate as to possess this little volume (which, we trust, will be reprinted for general circulation) are advised to note particularly Lewis's translation of Derjavin's Ode to God, and the note which prefaces it, pp. 66–72, and the stanzas entitled Time, pp. 57–59. We shall be mistaken if the latter do not remind him of Longfellow's admirable translation of Coplas de Manrique. It so happened that, some time after the publication of these versions, Alexander Nosewitch Czaslet, the Russian Counsellor of Manufactures, was in America, and on his return to his native country Mr. Lewis confided to him several copies of his volume of translations for presentation at home. It may well be supposed that the many attached friends in Russia, whose genial hospitality had softened to the young traveller the rigours of a Northern clime, hailed with no ordinary pleasure this evidence that the pilgrim from a far country had not forgotten, in his restoration to the pleasures of home, those who had cheered his exile in the land of strangers. Among those who referred to this pleasing souvenir with the most enthusiasm was Nicholas Graitch, who, in an article in the Northern Bee, (of which he is editor,) of July 18, 1851, after bearing testimony to Mr. Lewis's intimate acquaintance with the Russian tongue, remarks:

"When he left us for America, in taking leave of him, I said among other things, that he would forget us in his native land 'No!' he exclaimed, with warmth; 'I shall never forget my Russian friends: I shall always remember them with affection.' And he has kept his word."

After describing the volume of translations, Mr. Graitch proceeds:

"It is a pleasant reflection that beyond the Atlantic Ocean, on the shores of Lake Erie or of the river Mississippi, the productions of Russian writers are read, understood, and appreciated according to their true value: it is still more agreeable to know that there beats a noble heart, loving our good Russia, and returning to her good for good."

Amen! say we: may such truly honourable and kindly feelings ever be cherished by all citizens of all nations! And what can tend more effectually to promote, expand, and strengthen them than the cosmopolitanism of letters and the fraternity of the press? He who brings mind into contact with mind, and shows its thousand heaven-born affinities, is your true philanthropist; the intelligent translator is worth a hundred diplomatists, and the unprejudiced, candid, and generous conductor of the press will gain more conquests for his country by his pen than an "army with banners" can achieve by the sword.

Leyden, John, M.D., 1775–1811, the son of a farmer of Denholm, county of Roxburgh, Scotland, studied at the University of Edinburgh, and in 1800 was ordained a minister of the Church of Scotland. A short trial having satisfied him that he had mistaken his calling, he applied himself assiduously to the study of medicine, was made assistant surgeon in the East India Company's service in 1802; Professor of Hindustani in Fort William College, 1806; shortly afterwards appointed Judge of the Twenty-four Pergunnahs of Calcutta; a Commissioner of the Court of Requests in Calcutta, 1809; Assay Master at the Calcutta Mint, 1810. In 1811, Leyden accompanied Lord Minto in the expedition against Java, and died there, on the 28th of August of the same year, of a fever contracted while ransacking a library in an unwholesome atmosphere. He was a man of astonishing erudition acquired under discouraging circumstances, possessed a remarkable facility in the acquisition of tongues, and had made great progress in the knowledge of Eastern literature. For further particulars of his life the reader is referred to the admirable biography by his attached friend, Walter Scott, first pub. in the Edinburgh Annual Register for 1811, and subsequently incorporated in Scott's Prose Works: our citations will be from the Abbotsford ed., Edin., 1850, 375–389. "The Scenes of Infancy have many picturesque passages, and record the traditions and delineate the landscapes of pleasant Teviotdale with equal feeling and truth: original verse is waiting where it cannot well be dispensed with, and the work may be accused of lulling us with sweet sounds more than elevating us with bright, brief bursts of natural emotion."—Allan Cunningham's Biog. and Crit. Hist. of the Lit. of the Last Fifty Years.

"The Scenes of Infancy—his most laboured and ambitious poetical effort—possesses many fine passages, and is characteristic, and to worthy of his genius. Many of its descriptions and illustrations linger in the memory of the reader, and must be original in it some, as they remind us of nothing else."—Mair's Sketches of the Poet. Lit. of the Past Half-Century. 1851

"His love of Scotland was delightful. It breathes through all his writings and all his proceedings, and imparts to his poetry its most attractive charm."—Lord Cockburn's Memorials of his Time, 1856.

"Indeed, as Leyden's reading was at all times somewhat ostentatiously displayed, so in his poetry he was sometimes a little too ambitious in introducing scientific allusions or terms of art, which embarrassed instead of exalting the simplicity of his descriptions. But, when he is contented with a pure and natural tone of feeling and expression, his poetical powers claim the admiration and sympathy of every reader."—Sir Walter Scott: Prose Works, 382.

Leyden contributed The Elf King to Lewis's Tales of Wonder, (see Lewis, Matthew Gregory, M.P.,) The Mermaid and The Court of Keeldar to Scott's Minstrelsy of the Scottish Border, (see Scott, Sir Walter,) and several papers to the Asiatic Researches, and New London Review, was editor of the Scots Magazine for 1802, and left many MS. treatises on the Eastern languages, grammars of the Malay, Prakrit, and other dialects, and translations from the Sanscrit, Arabic, and Persian tongues. In addition to the authorities quoted above, we may refer to Memorials of Leyden, in the New Scots Magazine, Jan. 1829: Lord Minto's Speech at the College of Fort William, soon after Leyden's death; and General Sir John Malcolm's letter to the editor of the Bombay Courier, and his poetical tribute to Leyden's memory in the Edinburgh Annual Register, 1811. The last stanza of the preceding runs as follows:

"Yes, he who struck a manful lyre
O'er Flodden's field and Bothwell's wave
With trembling hand now leads the choir
That mourns his Leyden's early grave."

The reference here is to Scott's lines in the Lord of the Isles:

"Scarba's Isle, whose tortured shore
Still flings to Corrievrekin's roar,
And lonely Colonsay,—
Scenes sung to him who sings no more!
His bright and brief career is o'er,
And mute his tuneful strains;
Quench'd is his lamp of varied lore,
That loved the light of song to pour!
A distant and a deadly shore
Has Leyden's cold remains."

Canto IV st. 2.

Scott's allusion is to Leyden's Mermaid, the scenery of which is laid at Corrievrekin.

Nor must we omit to quote the impressive conclusion of the same writer's charming biography of the "early-lost, the long-deplored" friend of happier years and brighter days.

"I never heard Scott name Leyden," says Allan Cunningham, "but with an expression of regard and a moistening eye." But to the promised extract. After quoting Leyden's "affecting farewell to the graves of his ancestors," viz. the solemn passage which concludes the Scenes of Infancy, Scott continues:

"But the best epitaph is the story of a life engaged in the pursuits of virtue and the pursuit of honourable knowledge; the best monument, the regret of the worthy and of the wise, and the rest may be summed up in the sentiment of Sannazario:

"Hæc tumulo fessum fallite cuncta meum!
Hospitia et tot terrarum barbara labores?
Pone tam ... ignotis, pone monimenta parentum
Aut ne vana spondia tibi funera regnis;
Gratis quæ patrum, sed et omnia terra sepulchrum."

"No man whatever his condition might be, ever possessed a mind so entirely exempt from every sordid passion, so negligent of fortune and all its grovelling pursuits.—In a word so entirely disinterested.—Never owned a spirit more firmly and nobly independent."—Lord Minto: ubi supra.

Lieber, Francis, LL.D., for more than twenty years Prof. of Hist., Polit. Econ., and Philos. in the State College of South Carolina, now (1857) Prof. of History and Political Science in Columbia College, New York, member of the French Institute, (of the Academy of Morals and Politics,) &c., was born in Berlin, March 18, 1800. When fifteen years old, he joined the army against Napoleon, and was severely wounded, by several balls, at Waterloo. When, in 1819, the Liberals were persecuted all over Germany, he—then a student of the University of Berlin—was imprisoned, and the police published some of his poems, found among his papers, in order to expose him to the public as a revolutionist. He was, however, released, and went to the University of Jena to continue his studies. When the Greeks called on Western Europe for assistance, he joined the Philhellenes and went to Greece to fight against their oppressors. On his return, he went to Rome, where the historian Niebuhr, then Prussian ambassador, received him kindly and made him an inmate in his family. He wrote here, (in Niebuhr's house,) in German, his Journal in Greece, in 1822, (Leipsig, 1823,) which was translated into other languages. With the king's promise of protection, he returned to Berlin, and went to the University of Halle, but was again imprisoned. Niebuhr's influence, at length, released him. He published a small volume of poems, made in prison, under the name of Franz Arnold, and when he learned that a new arrest threatened him, always for old affairs, he fled to England, where he supported himself for a twelvemonth by giving private lessons. He contributed here to German periodicals, and wrote a tract on the Lancasterian system of instruction, in German. In 1827 he went to the United States, and soon commenced the Encyclopædia Americana, which was finished in 13 vols. 8vo, Phila., 1828–32. This work was edited and written in Boston. He published here a translation of a French work on the July revolution, and of the Life of Caspar Hauser by President Feuerbach. This work went through several editions.

From Boston he went to New York, where he translated the work of Messrs. de Beaumont and de Tocqueville on the Penitentiary System in the United States, with an Introduction and many notes, (Phila., 1833, 8vo,) which in turn was translated in Germany. While in N. York he received the honourable charge of writing a plan of education and instruction for Girard College, which was published by the Board of Trustees, Phila., 1834, 8vo. Reviewed in The Heidelberg Annals, 1834, No. 24, &c. He went to reside in Philadelphia, and published there Letters to a Gentleman in Germany on a Trip to Niagara, (Phila., 1834, 8vo,) which was published in London under the title of The Stranger in America, 1835, 2 vols. p. 8vo. Reviewed in the Lon. Quar. Rev., liii. 290. He also wrote here his Reminiscences of an Intercourse with Niebuhr the Historian, (Phila., 1835, 12mo,) which was likewise published in London, in 1835, and translated in Germany. Reviewed in Lon. Quar. Rev., lv. 126; Lon. Athenæum, 1835, 797; N. Amer. Rev., xliii. 120, (by Prof. C. C. Felton:) South. Lit. Mess., ii. 125, 535. In 1835 he accepted a call to a chair in South Carolina College, at Columbia, and discharged the duties of this post with eminent ability and success until his resignation in 1856.

Here he wrote his Manual of Political Ethics, Bost., 1838–39, 2 vols. 8vo; 2d ed., 1847, 2 vols. 8vo; republished in London, 1839, 8vo; an Essay on Penal Law and Solitary Confinement at Labour, published by the Philadelphia Prison Discipline Society, Phila., 1838, 8vo; Legal and Political Hermeneutics; or, Principles of Interpretation and Construction in Law and Politics, Bost., 2d ed., 1839, 12mo; a Translation of Ramshorn's Latin Synonymes, 1839, 12mo; Great Events described by Great Historians, N. York, 1847, 12mo; Essays on Labour and Property, 1842, 18mo; 1854, 18mo; On the Character of the Gentleman, Charleston, S. C., 12mo; (reviewed in Southern Presbyterian Review, June, 1847;) also essays and papers On the Use of the Study of Latin and Greek as elements of education; On the Study of History and Polit. Economy as branches of a superior education; On Laura Bridgman's Vocal Sounds, (in the Smithsonian Transactions;) On the Abuse of the Pardoning Power, (published as a document by the N. York Legislature;) Remarks on Mrs. Fry's Views of Solitary Confinement, (published in England;) A Letter on the Penitentiary System, (published by the Legislature of South Carolina;) A Letter on Anglican and Gallican Liberty, (translated by Mittermaier into German;) A Letter on International Copyright, addressed to his friend, the Hon. Wm. C. Preston, then Senator of U. S.; A Lecture on the Origin and Development of the First Constituents of Civilization. The Phila. Prison Society also published his Letter on the Relation between Education and Crime and A Popular Essay on Subjects of Penal Law. His last work is his Civil Liberty and Self-Government, published in Philadelphia, 1853, 2 vols. 12mo; Lon., 1853, 8vo.

In 1844, the trustees of South Carolina College allowed Lieber to make a trip to Europe, during which, he published, in Germany, an essay on Extramural and Intramural Executions, proposing measures which have since been adopted, and Fragments on Subjects of Penology. In 1845 he revisited Europe, and during that visit published two essays, one on the Independence of the Judiciary and one on the Legislative System of Two Houses. An essay on Postal Reforms was published previous to our first juncent Reform.

The United States Senate printed in 1839 (?) an Exposé of Lieber's on the Establishment of a Statistical Bureau at Washington. In 1848, while he was in Europe, a small volume, The West, and other Poems of his, was published in N. York.

Among his minor publications we notice, in addition to those already enumerated—1. A Letter on the Great London Exhibition (The World's Fair) of 1851; published in the National Intelligencer, Washington, June, 1851. 2. A Lecture on the History and Uses of Athenæums; delivered at the request of the Columbia Athenæum, March 17, 1856. This is an admirable discourse. 3 Was Napoleon a Dictator? Published in Putnam's Mag., Jan. 1855, 12–21. In this article will be found a long and interesting letter from Joseph Bonaparte (late King of Spain) to Dr. Lieber, dated Point Breeze, 1st July, 1829, explanatory of Napoleon's line of policy. Lieber has a number of letters from Joseph Bonaparte, and, of course, many from distinguished individuals in Europe and America; and all these, we trust, will some day or other see the light. 4. Shall Utah be admitted into the Union? Published in Putnam's Mag., March, 1855, 225–236. In the present state of this question, it is well to quote the decision (recorded in the last three lines of the essay) of so able a publicist as Dr. Lieber:

"Once more: the question we proposed to ourselves was, Ought the Mormons to be admitted? And we answer, No."

In our opinion, the Mormons ought forthwith to be admitted—not into the Union, but—into the penitentiaries of the Union, there to remain until authentically punished for their monstrous offences against the Common Law and statute-enactments of the land. 5 An Ode on the Sub-Atlantic Telegraph. Published in the National Intelligencer. In this connexion we must refer the reader to Lieber's Ode on the Proposed Ship Canal between the Atlantic and the Pacific, (pub. in The West and other Poems,) of which Professor Longfellow remarks, "It is strong enough to make the canal itself if it could be brought to bear." 6. A Monody to the memory of Dr E. K. Kane, the Arctic Navigator. Pub. in Elder's Life and Travels of Dr. Kane, 1857. This is the last of Lieber's publications. In former years he was a contributor to the Southern Literary Messenger and the Southern Quarterly Review, and pub. a number of essays in European periodicals. We understand that a selection from his minor publications will shortly be published in Boston, probably in 2 vols. 12mo. We should not omit to state that, as regards Political Economy in its exterior relations, Lieber is looked upon as—to quote the language of the late Secretary Robert J. Walker—"The philosophic head of the Free-Traders in the United States."

To quote Lieber's own language, he is

"An unhesitating advocate of the necessity as well as blessing of the freest possible exchange, on grounds of philosophy, religion, civilization, civil liberty, and the eminent utilitarian interests, as well as the highest humanitarian ends."—Letter to the Author of this Dictionary. New York, 1st July, 1858.

The three works by which Lieber is best known—and by which he will continue to be known to the latest posterity—are the Manual of Political Ethics, Legal and Political Hermeneutics, and Civil Liberty and Self-Government.

On each of these great works we proceed to adduce some opinions from eminent authorities,—regretting that, from the narrow limits to which we are confined, our citations must necessarily be few in number and brief in extent.

1. MANUAL OF POLITICAL ETHICS. This work is used as a text-book in Harvard University, and has been quoted as authority in the New York Court of Appeals and in the Supreme Court of Michigan. One of the most eminent of American lawyers and orators remarked, many years since, that he never considered himself fully prepared on a great case until he had looked over this work, and that he generally found in it something serviceable or suggestive:

"It is excellent,—abounding in elevated ethics, sound common sense, statesmanlike views, and enlarged philosophy. . . . The work abounds with profound views of government, which are illustrated with various learning."—JAMES KENT: Life and Letters, Bost., 1851, ii. 278, 279.

"Dr. Francis Lieber, in his Manual of Political Ethics, 2 vols. Boston, 1838, has shown with great force, and by the most striking and apposite illustrations, the original connection between right and morality, and the reason and necessity of the application of the principles of ethics to the science of politics and the administration of government. The work is excellent in its doctrines, and is enriched with various and profound erudition."—CHANCELLOR KENT. Commentaries, ed. 1854, vol. i. p. 3.

"Well worthy the perusal of those who take an interest in political science. It is far from being a formal treatise, but is a most admirable preparation for the gradual introduction of scientific form."—American editor's note, in the Boston ed. (1841) of The Theory of Human Progression, p. 234.

"An admirable treatise. . . . A profound and elaborate work." GEORGE S. HILLARD: Boston Courier, Jan. 13, 1844.

A review of this work, by Mr. David J. Mac Cord, will be found in the Southern Review, Oct. 1847. It is highly commended by the London Athenæum, 1839, 633. A less favourable notice will be found in the Edin. Rev., lxxiii. 55. 76.

2. LEGAL AND POLITICAL HERMENEUTICS. This work is used as a text-book in Harvard University.

"A treatise replete with accurate logic, and clear and sound principles of interpretation, applicable to the duties of the lawgiver and the science of jurisprudence."—CHANCELLOR KENT: Comment., ed. 1854 vol. i. p. 521.

"I am exceedingly pleased with it; it is full of excellent hints and principles and guiding rules and, what is very important, written in a clear, compact style, with great force of illustration and accuracy of statement, and, withal, in a spirit (without which all other qualities are of little avail) of candour, and without partisanship."—JUDGE STORY: Life and Letters, ii. 295.

"I regard the Hermeneutics as a work eminently useful to our profession,—not merely useful to students, but to men of long experience at the bar,—as a most lucid exposition of the principles, and admirable illustration of the science, of interpretation and construction."—Letter of Simon Greenleaf, Professor of Law at Cambridge.

It will be noticed, by the legal reader, that Lieber's distinction between Interpretation and Construction, established in his Hermeneutics, has been sanctioned and adopted by Greenleaf in his work on the Law of Evidence, and by other writers on law.

A very favourable review of Legal and Political Hermeneutics, written by Robert von Mohl, Professor of Political Science in the University of Heidelberg, Cabinet Minister to the Vicar-General of the German Empire in 1849, and one of the most eminent of German publicists, will be found in the first number of the 14th vol. of the Heidelberg Critical Annals of Jurisprudence. Von Mohl extols the work for its soundness and originality. Another commendatory notice of the same volume, written by Pedheiro-Ferreira, ("Ancient Cabinet Minister of Portugal,") occurs in the Revue Etrangère et Française, Paris, June, 1840, vii. 494. We give an extract.

"L'auteur a donné à son travail une extension qui en augmente l'intérêt: il s'efforce d'établir des principes propres à concilier les antinomies apparentes des deux manières d'une même source. Il va même plus loin; il indique des règles judicieuses pour éviter les anomalies qui obligent d'avoir recours à l'herméneutique."

3. ON CIVIL LIBERTY AND SELF GOVERNMENT. This work is used as a text-book in Yale College. The main idea of this work is that democracy, or equality of itself, has nothing to do with LIBERTY; that democratic absolutism is the most stringent of all absolutisms; and that true LIBERTY—"Anglican, American, liberty—is institutional. This important truth Dr. Lieber demonstrates with great force, and displays it in broad contrast with the Gallican error which confounds the ideas of liberty and equality. To the last chapter—on Vox Populi Vox Dei—we would especially recommend the attention of our young politicians.

"The reader could do better than make Professor Lieber's volumes the subject of attentive study, if he wishes to store his mind with sound leading principles in statesmanship and jurisprudence. . . . His great work on Civil Liberty."—Creasy on The Rise and Progress of the English Constitution, 2d ed., Lon., 1854, 240, q. v.

In a recent work, entitled "Die Geschichte und Literatur der Staats-Wissenschaften," &c., von Robert von Mohl, Erlangen, 1855, (The History and Literature of Political Science, by R. von Mohl,) the author refers, in terms of commendation, to the work of Mr. Calhoun, expressing, however, his dissent from some of the opinions of the "great Southern statesman," and then introduces Dr. Lieber:

"Lieber's treatise on Civil Liberty and Self-Government in the United States is also an important work: and here, truly, praise is to be awarded without any admixture of blame. The author does not, indeed, treat of the entire foundation of American political institutions, since he restricts himself to a discussion of the democratic principle. So far, however, as he goes, he shows himself to be a man learned in general and in political science, calmly exploring his subject and grasping sound political fact and wisdom."

Von Mohl continues his remarks, which extend over several pages.

"We commend it especially to all who are, or who expect to be, in public life, to all lawyers and law students, and to all persons interested in political and historical discussions. Our high sense of its merits is gathered from what we have before said. We look upon it as a permanent as well as valuable accession to political literature,—destined to take its place with the Federalist and the writings of Adams, Hamilton, and Jefferson."—GEORGE S. HILLARD: Boston Courier, Jan. 13, 1854.

"An admirable work. . . . To those who have access to the volumes, a careful reading of them is warmly recommended."—NOAH PORTER, D.D.: Prof. to Sera. on Civil Liberty, July, 1856.

"The events that are passing around us in both worlds, the Old and New, are referred to with an accuracy and copiousness of detail not usually found in Professors of any country. Dr. Lieber exalts the principle of self-government; and has produced, therefore, by implication, a very fine apology for the Constitution of the United States. His work may be read with advantage by those who wish to appreciate the manly tone in which political subjects are treated amongst the best-educated classes over the Atlantic."—Lon. Athenæum, 1854, 436.

"Few writers . . . given more clear and comprehensive views of many of the points which Englishmen and Americans agree in holding as to civil liberty and self-government. . . . The work from its historical facts and philosophical principles form a valuable manual of political science."—Lon. Literary Gazette, 1854, 133–135.

"His work may be consulted with the greatest advantage, whether by American or English readers, who desire to make themselves accurately acquainted with the political resemblance and the political difference between the two great nations which have so immense an interest in understanding each other."—Lon. Globe, Nov. 7, 1853.

"There is no work of which this volume of Dr. Lieber's reminds us so much as of the famous work of Montesquieu, De l'Esprit des Lois. What the great French jurist did for forms of government in general, our author has done for those forms of government in particular which have the idea of liberty for their base. For loseness of coherence and perspicuity of argument his work stands preeminent among works on political science."—John Bull, Nov. 12, 1853.

"A profound and admirable work. Whoever will follow that very able writer in his masterly exposition of the principles of Anglican liberty," &c.—GEORGE TICKNOR CURTIS: Hist of the Constitution of the U. States, N. York, 1854, vol. i. 488, n.

"It is a work of rare merit, and should be read by every citizen and adopted as a text-book in every academy, college, and university in the Republic."—De Bow's Review.

"It is written with great clearness and force, and is one of the most valuable we possess upon the fundamental principles of political institutions."—Journal of Useful Knowledge.

See also a review of Civil Liberty and Self-Government, written by Rev. Dr. T. D. Woolsey, President of Yale College, in the New Englander for August, 1856, 329, 362.

Lieber's political works are often referred to by the Rev. Dr. Arnold, of Rugby School, (see his Works and Letters;) by Mittermaier, in his Penal Process and other volumes; by Tremenheere, in the Constitution of the United States Compared with our Own, Lon., 1854, p. 8vo; by Dr. W. Cooke Taylor, in his Natural History of Society, 1840, 2 vols. p. 8vo; and by many other European and American authorities.

Mr. Prescott remarks, (Hist. of the Conq. of Mexico, 23d ed., Bost., 1855, i. 170, n.,) "Such works could not have been produced before the nineteenth century."

Professor Greenleaf says that Lieber "always leaps into the deepest water, and always comes up like a good and easy swimmer;" and Chancellor Kent once observed that when he "read Lieber's books he always felt that he had a safe pilot on board, however dangerous the navigation might be."

"No greater tribute can be paid to the substantial worth of his writings," remarks Mr. Hillard, "than the fact that they have earned him the proud distinction of a place in the French Institute, as Corresponding Member, an honour which he shares with Mr. Prescott, Mr. Bancroft, Prof. Agassiz, and Prof Bond, and with them alone, on this continent."—Boston Courier, Jan 13, 1854, q. v. for an able review of the literary characteristics of Dr. Lieber.

Mr. Bancroft, the distinguished American historian, referring to the honours which crowd around the name of Lieber,—quoted, admired, and lauded at home and abroad, by his own people, and by foreign nations,—remarks that others may do justice to the great variety and accuracy of Lieber's acquisitions, but that his homage is to the manliness of heart which leads him to the love of the right cause, and the integrity of character which makes him at all times true to himself in the support of it. He declares that Lieber's "admirable work" on Civil Liberty and Self-Government well entitles Lieber "to the honours of a Defender of Liberty."

Some interesting accounts of Lieber's early history—and the lives of few men offer so tempting a subject for the pen of the novelist as that of this youthful soldier, political captive, earnest student, and celebrated professor—will be found in Niebuhr's letters to his sister-in-law, Madame Hensler, under date of 6th April, 7th and 22d June, 1822; 22d March, and 2d and 6th April, 1825.

These letters express the deep concern which Niebuhr felt in his young friend's efforts in the cause of freedom, his military services in Greece, &c.

As Professor of History and of Political Philosophy and Economy in the State College of South Carolina, Lieber's chair was for many years thronged with delighted and zealous students, whom their preceptor sent forth, from time to time, to take their places in the halls of legislation, the academies of science, the camp, or the forum, to instruct others by their wisdom or profit them by their example. The address of this great man to his former pupils, in the dedication to his treatise on Civil Liberty and Self-Government, reminds the reader of some of the finest remains of classical antiquity; and the work which it prefaces should be carefully and frequently perused by every American who earnestly covets for his country the inestimable blessings of peace within her own borders, and honour and reputation among the political families of the earth.

It will readily be believed that Lieber's resignation of a post the duties of which he had discharged so faithfully and with such eminent credit to himself, to his pupils, and to his college, exhibited feelings of no ordinary regret. No man, perhaps, ever entered an institution of learning under higher auspices, supported so eminent a character with such unbounded reputation, and proved so successful in gaining at once the affection of his pupils and the admiration of the learned of every land.

The illustrious Niebuhr, Kent, Story, and Livingston united in his praises when he entered the walls of the college which so long profited by his labours, and Preston, King, Pettigru, and Allston were among the large number of those who mourned his departure from its gates. The eulogistic resolutions unanimously passed, and the costly testimonials proffered the beloved preceptor of many studious days delightfully passed in the impartation and reception of knowledge, were felt to be a very inadequate expression of their appreciation of his worth.

On the 18th of May, 1857, a new professorship was created in Columbia College, New York, for the purpose of securing the services of Dr. Lieber, and he now occupies the chair of History and Political Science in that institution. In this case, as on the occasion of his election to his professorship in the College of South Carolina, he received a unanimous election of boards composed of about twenty-five members each. Such evidences of esteem must be grateful to the one thus distinguished; but they have been amply earned.

America indeed owes a large debt of gratitude to Lieber; for we speak advisedly when we say that few men, living or dead, have directly and instrumentally—orally and through the press—instructed so many of our countrymen in the laws of science, the principles of philosophy, the canons of ethics, and the institutes of politics and political economy. Long may this distinguished teacher continue to instruct his race; to form and mature the minds of those who are preparing for, and those who are now acting their part on, the stage of active life,—of social, political, and domestic duties; long may he be spared to qualify our youth for usefulness, and to "teach our senators wisdom."

Lieber, Oscar Montgomery, son of the preceding, b. 1830, in Boston, Massachusetts, educated professionally at Berlin, Göttingen and the mining-school at Freiberg in Saxony, is the author of Assayer's Guide, or Practical Directions to Assayers, Miners, and Smelters, (Phila., 1852, 12mo,) and a translation of Woehler's "Beispiele zur Uebung in der Analytischen Chemie," entitled "The Analytical Chemist's Assistant," with an introduction, illustrations, and copious additions, (Phila., 1852, 12mo;) also of a "Sketch of the Geology of the State of Mississippi," with a geological map of that State, where he was State-geologist in 1850–51, published in the New York Mining Magazine for July, 1854; translator of Cotta's Observations on the Formation of Metalliferous Veins, (N. Y. Mining Magazine for Oct., Nov., and Dec. 1854;) Remarks on Whitney's Metallic Wealth of the United States, (N. Y. Min. Mag. for Nov. and Dec. 1854.) He wrote Some Remarks on the Metalliferous Veins of the South, developing a new theory as to the real similarity of apparently different veins, (N. Y. Min. Mag. for Oct. 1855.) It appeared translated in Hartmann's Berg- und Hüttenmannische Zeitung, and in Cotta's Gangstudien, vol. iii. fasc. 1. He is the author of various articles on the metalliferous veins of the South, and on metallurgical operations, in Cotta's Gangstudien, and the Berg und Huettenmannische Zeitung, (both German publications.) In 1854–55, he was engaged as assistant in the geological survey of Alabama. At the close of 1855 he was elected, by the Legislature of South Carolina, Mineralogical, Geological, and Agricultural Surveyor of the State, and is now (1857) engaged in the duties of this survey. His First Annual Report, embracing the progress of the survey during the year 1856, with Plates and Maps, was pub. at Columbia, S.C., in 1857, 8vo, pp. 136.

The editors of the Amer. Journal of Science and Arts, No. 70, July, 1857, page 145, observe, respecting O. M. Lieber's Mineral., Geol., and Agricultural Survey of South Carolina:

"The author has a field of great interest, and has taken hold of it with energy and success. There is no department in American geology requiring more study than the metamorphic rocks of the Atlantic States, and especially those of the South. The description and handsome maps of Mr. Lieber's report throw much light on the subject, and when the survey is completed—which we trust will be without interruption—the doubts as to the age of the metamorphic rocks, and the period of metamorphism, must certainly be much lessened, if not wholly removed. The structure of the gold-veins, and their true relations to the containing rocks, their resources, and the value and nature of copper and other mines in the States, are additional topics of great importance, which Mr. Lieber has begun to elucidate."

Lightfoot, John, D.D., 1602-1677, a native of Staffordshire, educated at Christ's College, Cambridge, and minister of Stone, Staffordshire, in 162[illegible] Repton, Derbyshire, and Ashley in 1631; minister of St. Bartholomew's, London, 1642; a member of the Assembly of Divines, 1643, and, in the same year, Master of Catherine Hall, Cambridge, and Rector of Much-Munden, Hertfordshire. Vice Chancellor of Cambridge, 1655. The best ed. of his works—which consist of Chronicles and Harmonies of the Old and New Testaments, learned annotations upon the Scriptures, explanations of Jewish antiquities, sermons, &c.—is the one edited by the Rev. J. R. Pitman, with a Life of the author, Lon., 1822–25, 13 vols. 8vo, £7 16s. This ed. contains matter before unpublished. The first ed. of his works was pub. at London, 1684, 2 vols fol. A 3d ed. was printed at Amsterdam, 1686, 2 vols fol., containing all his Latin writings, with a Latin trans. of those which he wrote in English. At the end of both these there is a list of such pieces as he left unfinished. It is the chief of these in Latin which make up the third vol. added to the former two in a 3d ed. of his Works by John Leusden, Utrecht, 1699, fol. They were communicated by Mr. Strype, who pub. in 1700, 8vo, another collection of Remains of Lightfoot, with a Preface. His works were published in foreign countries, and valued as highly by European critics as by English divines.

"Of all the theologians of his time, this celebrated divine (whose opinion was consulted by every scholar of note, both British and foreign) is supposed to have been the most deeply versed in the knowledge of the Scriptures. . . . The writings of Dr Lightfoot are an invaluable treasure to the Biblical student. By his deep researches into the Rabbinical writings, he has done more to illustrate the phraseology of the Holy Scriptures, and to explain the various customs, &c. therein alluded to particularly in the New Testament, than any other author before or since."—Horne's Bibl. Bib., 1839, 129, 239, q. v.

"Singulari doctrinâ conscripta."—Poole.

"Most of this author's remarks are deeply critical and curious."—Williams's C. P.

Gibbon says that our author,

"By constant reading of the Rabbis, became almost a Rabbin himself."—Miscell. Works, vol. v. 226.

"Lightfoot, with extensive knowledge of the Rabbinical writers, poured his copious stores on Jewish antiquities, preceded in this by a more obscure labourer in that region, Ainsworth."—Hallam's Lit. Hist. of Europe, 4th ed., Lon., 1854 ii. 357.

"One of the most profoundly learned of the bright constellation of scholars and divines which adorned that age, and shone, perhaps, in any other. His Talmudical learning he most happily applied to the illustration of Scripture."—Hales.

"In Biblical criticism I consider Lightfoot the first of all English writers; and in this I include his learning, his judgment, and his usefulness. His learning was immense; his judgment deep and acute; and his usefulness as a writer, on the subjects he has discussed, is far beyond that of any other writer with whom I am acquainted."—Dr. Adam Clarke.

"I entreat the attention of the student to Lightfoot's Works. The honour of opening to the world the fountains of Talmudical learning, I rejoice to say, belongs to one of our own countrymen. To use the expression of Schoettgen, 'nisi Lightfootus tenuit, nemini non saltuosum.'"—Tow ssend.

"Lightfoot, from his great Rabbinical learning, is an admirable illustrator of obscure passages in the Scripture."—Dr. Ashurst.

"That profound Rabbinist, Lightfoot."—Dr. J. Pye Smith.

Orme thinks that our author laid too much stress upon his discourses in Jewish antiquities and philology:

"The Talmudical expectations partake largely of the unsatisfactoriness, and even silliness, of rabbinical learning,—to which Lightfoot attached more importance than he ought, for assistance in interpreting the New Testament. If any man could have made a good use of the works of ancient and modern rabbins, for illustrating the Bible, Lightfoot certainly was the man. But even in his hands the material is very unproductive; and, though we are grateful to him for the collections which he has made, we cannot help regretting that so much labour has been expended to so little purpose. All that is really valuable in them might be put into a small compendium."—Orme's Bib. Bib., q. v.

Lightfoot's Chronicle of the Times and the Order of the Texts of the Old Testament (in vol. ii. of Pitman's ed. of his Works) cannot be too highly commended:

"Notwithstanding the differences in opinion entertained by the learned concerning the chronology of particular events, the general method of this Chronicle has been and still continues to be held in the highest estimation by all who are competent duly to appreciate its merits."—Horne's Bibl. Bib., 1839, 129.

"No divine" says Dr Dibdin, "anxious to become versed in a knowledge of Jewish rites and observances, can view his theological library with 'comfort,' without a copy of the works of John Lightfoot."—Lib. Comp., ed. 1825, 56.

"In the work the learned author follows the example of Dr. Lightfoot. He goes over the same books, but superficially, and supplies what was wanting on the Epistles and Revelations. Lillo, George, 1693-1739, a London jeweller, wrote seven dramas, of which George Barnwell, Arden of Feversham, and Fatal Curiosity, for a long time held possession of the stage; and the first is still a favourite. His Dramatic Works and Life were pub. by Thos. Davies in 1770, 2 vols. 12mo; again, with addits., 1810, 2 vols. r. 8vo.

"He is a master of terrific but not of tender impressions. We feel a harshness and gloom in his genius, even while we are compelled to admire its force and originality."—Campbell's Specimens of the British Poets.

Lilly, Lylie, Lyllie, or Lyly, John, b. about 1553, pub. nine dramatic pieces between 1579 and 1600, Pap with a Hatchet, (about 1589,) and the following romance, by which he is best known: Euphues: The Anatomy of Wit, 1st ed., 1580, 4to. Euphues and his England, 1581, 4to. This is a sequel to the preceding. For eds., see Lowndes's Bibl. Man., 1133. This work, the style of which "exhibits the absurdest excess of pedantry, to which nothing but the most deplorable bad taste could have given even a temporary approbation," was intended to reform and purify the English language. It soon became the court standard:

"Our nation are in his debt for a new English, which he taught them: Euphues and his England began first that language: all our ladies were his scholars; and that beauty at court which could not parley Euphuisme (that is to say, who was unable to converse in that pure and reformed English which he had formed his work to be the standard of) was as little regarded as she which now there speaks not French."—Blount's Preface to Lilly's Six Court Comedies. Lon., 1632, 12mo.

But all of Lilly's contemporaries did not think so favourably of his philological purifications and improvements. Shakspeare ridiculed the new dialect in Love's Labour Lost, (Holofernes,) and Ben Jonson in Every Man out of his Humour, (Fastidious Brisk.) Euphues, to quote the language of a modern learned critic,

"Did incalculable mischief by vitiating the taste, corrupting the language, and introducing a spurious and unnatural mode of conversation and action."—Gifford.

"The style, which obtained celebrity, is antithetical and sententious to affectation, a perpetual effort with no adequate success, rendering the book equally disagreeable and ridiculous, though it might not be difficult to find passages rather more happy and ingenious than the rest."—Hallam's Lit. Hist. of Europe, 4th ed., Lon., 1854, ii. 194-196, q. v. for specimens.

"Ah that I had with me my Anatomie of Wit, that all-to-be unparalleled volume, that quintessence of human wit, that treasury of quaint invention, that exquisitely-pleasant-to-read and inevitably-necessary-to-be-remembered manual of all which is worthy to be known! &c."—SIR PIERCIE SHAFTON: Scott's Monastery.

Of Lilly's dramatic pieces, perhaps the one we are about to name was the best known, but all are now almost entirely forgotten:

"His comedy in prose, Campaspe, [1584, '91, 4to.] is a warning example of the impossibility of ever constructing, out of mere anecdotes and epigrammatic sallies, any thing like a dramatic whole."—SCHLEGEL: Lects. on Dramat. Lit.

Linacre, Linacer, or Lynacer, Thomas, M.D., 1460-1524, an eminent physician and divine, was a native of Canterbury, educated at, and Fellow of, All Souls' College, Oxford, was one of the most distinguished Greek and Latin scholars of his age. He pub. a number of translations from Galen and other authors, 1499, &c., Rudimenta Grammatices, and the following very learned work: De Emendata Structura Latini Sermonis libri sex, Lon., 1524, 4to; many eds. on the Continent. This is composed principally of criticisms on distinctions in the Latin tongue.

"It has been remarked that, though Linacre formed his own style on the model of Quintilian, he took most of his authorities from Cicero. This treatise, the first-fruits of English erudition, was well received, and frequently printed on the Continent."—Hallam's Lit. Hist. of Europe, 4th ed., 1854, i. 338.

His translations from Galen were so excellent that his friend Erasmus, when sending them to a correspondent, remarks:

"I present you with the works of Galen, now, by the help of Linacre, speaking better Latin than they ever before spoke Greek."

Lindsay, Alexander William Crawford, Lord, the eldest son of James Lindsay, twenty fourth Earl of Crawford and Balcarres and premier Earl of Scotland, was born in 1812, educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, and subsequently travelled in the East.

1. Lives of the Lindsays, or, a Memoir of the Houses of Crawford and Balcarres, 1840, 4 vols. 8vo. These Memoirs were privately printed in 1835. The 3d ed. appeared in 1849, 3 vols. 8vo. The work was not originally intended for publication. To these vols. should be added, Case of James, Earl of Balcarres, claiming the Title and Dignities of Earl of Crawford, &c., [in the House of Lords] 1845, fol., pp. 239. The Case was drawn up by Mr. Riddell, perhaps the first peerage-lawyer of the age in Scotland, and a most erudite genealogical antiquary. When it is remembered that the noble house of Lindsay is traceable through a descent of twenty eight successive generations, it will at once be perceived that his lordship rather suffered from the embarras de richesses than from any lack of materials for his graceful and sprightly "Muse of History." The noble chronicler has well acquitted himself of his laborious task.

"Some of the very best specimens of Family History that our language affords. . . . Our readers are well aware that Lord Lindsay early has distinguished talents on all and was under the influence of deep religious feelings. Lindsay, Sir Coutts. 1. Alfred; a Drama, Lon., 1845, fp. 8vo. 2. Edward the Black Prince; a Tragedy, 1845, fp. 8vo.

Lindsay, or Lyndsay, Sir David, 1490?–1568? a native of Garmylton, Haddingtonshire, Knight of the Mount, Lord Lyon King-at-Arms under James V., contributed considerably to the establishment of the Reformation in Scotland by his satirical poems against the Church of Rome. His principal pieces are—The Historie and Testament of Squyer Meldrum, The Monarchie, The Dreme, The Complaynt, The Complaynt of the King's Papingo, Satyre on the Thrie Estatis, Answer to the King's Flyting, and The Complaynt of Basche, the King's Hound. For an account of his productions we refer the reader to the excellent ed. of his Poetical Works, with a Life of the Author, Prefatory Dissertations, and an appropriate Glossary, by George Chalmers, Lon., 1806, 3 vols. 8vo. See also Herbert Ames's Typ. Antiq.; Ellis's Specimens; Warton's Hist. of Eng. Poet.; Watt's Bibl. Brit.; Brit. Crit., vol. xxxiv.; Lowndes's Bibl. Man., 1175–1176; Irving's Lives of the Scottish Poets; Lord Lindsay's Lives of the Lindsays; Blackw. Mag., xxvi. 491. The first collection of Lindsay's poems was pub. by Jascuy, in 1558, who in the same year printed two impressions, one in 12mo and one in 4to. John Skott pub. a 3d ed. in 1559, and others followed.

In the earlier part of this period of thirty years [1520–1550] we can find very little English poetry. Sir David Lyndsay, an accomplished gentleman and scholar of Scotland, excels his contemporary Skelton in such qualities, if not in fertility of genius. Though inferior to Dunbar in richness of imagination and in elegance of language, he shows a more reflecting and philosophical mind; and certainly his satire upon James V. and his Court is more piquant than the other's panegyric upon the Thistle. But in the ordinary style of his versification he seems not to rise much above the prosaic and tedious rhymers of the fifteenth century. His descriptions are as circumstantial without selection as theirs; and his language, partaking of a ruder dialect, is still more removed from our own."—Hallam's Lit. Hist. of Europe, 4th ed., 1854, i 423–424.

A graver objection to Lindsay's lines is their gross indecency. The Satyre on the Thrie Estatis holds up the clergy to great contempt. It was played before James V. and his queen at Linlithgow in 1539, &c.

"It is a singular proof of the liberty allowed to such representations at the period, that James V and his queen repeatedly witnessed a piece in which the corruptions of the existing government and religion were treated with such satirical severity."—Sir Walter Scott.

The name of Sir Walter will doubtless remind the reader of the beautiful introduction of our herald-poet in Marmion:

"Still is thy name in high account
And still thy verse has charms,
Sir David Lindesay of the Mount,
Lord Lion King-at-arms!"

Pinkerton estimates the religious services of our author's satirical poetry at a very high rate:

"Lyndsay had prepared the ground, and John Knox only sowed the seed"

Mr. Hallam speaks with less extravagance:

"Lyndsay's poetry is said to have contributed to the Reformation in Scotland,—in which, however, he is but like many poets of his own and preceding times. The clergy were an inexhaustible theme of bitter reproof."—Lit. Hist. of Europe, 4th ed., 1854, i. 424.

Lindsey, Theophilus, 1723–1808, a native of Middlewich, Cheshire, educated at St. John's College, Vicar of Catterick, Yorkshire, 1764, resigned this living in 1773, and in the next year opened a Unitarian chapel in London. In 1793 he was obliged, from failing health, to discontinue preaching, and was succeeded in his charge by Dr. Disney. He pub. several sermons, and treatises in defence of Socinianism, and the following work, which is his most important production: An Historical View of the State of the Unitarian Doctrine and Worship from the Reformation to our own Times, &c., Lon., 1783, 8vo.

In 1812 were pub. Memoirs of T. Lindsey, &c., by Thomas Belsham, 8vo, pp. 554. We give brief extracts from two reviews of this volume:

"Mr. Belsham never loses sight of his real object, which is to hold up to mankind the pure Unitarian doctrine as the standard of truth, never fails to adorn the professors of it with every epithet of exuberant panegyric, as the wise and excellent of the earth. . . . It was the advice to his pupils of an eminent tutor in one of those illustrious seminaries [the English universities] never to take up a book of reasoning without attempting to confute it. Even in their hands, young as they are, we can trust Mr. Belsham."—Lon. Quar. Rev., viii. 422–437.

"Of Mr. Lindsey considered as a writer, it is sufficient to observe that the measure of intellect he displayed was the most ordinary, and that he was not possessed of the power, in its lowest degree, of either inventing what was rare, or embellishing what was common."—Robert Hall: Eclectic Rev., and in Hall's Works, 11th ed., 1853, iv. 188–225.

Lingard, John, D.D., LL.D., Feb. 5, 1771–July 15, 1851, a native of Winchester, England, studied at the Roman Catholic College at Douay, and subsequently accompanied the members of this institution to England, when they were driven from home by the horrors of the French Revolution. After completing the preliminary course of instruction, Dr. Lingard received holy orders in the Church of Rome, and through the course of a long life was distinguished for his zeal in defense of the religious principles of his communion, and not the less so for his literary industry, sincere piety, and exemplary deportment. For the last forty years of his life he held the small preferment belonging to the Roman Catholic Church to the village of Hornby, Lancashire, where "he grew old in the midst of a community who honoured him for his worth" and mourned his decease as that of a much-loved friend. The recluse had no small difficulty in preserving the "illustrious obscurity" which he cherished,—as the head of his Church had warmly urged a cardinal's hat upon his acceptance. But for this proffered dignity the doctor declared he was altogether unsuited; "and," continued he, "it would quite put a stop to the progress of my history." Leo promised that he should not be interrupted in his literary pursuits, if he would listen to his proposal; but Lingard was inexorable, and the Pope had to be satisfied with the declaration that the modest churchman should be a cardinal in petto. Here was an authentic case of Nolo Episcopari. During the latter years of his life Dr. Lingard was in the receipt of a pension from the queen of £300 per annum, which, with the copyright-money paid him for his History of England, placed him in comfortable circumstances. The work just referred to was sold not long since (1857) for the respectable sum of £4683. A consideration of its merits will engage our attention after reciting the titles of the author's other principal publications. "1. Catholic Loyalty Vindicated. 1805, 12mo. This series of letters originally appeared in The New Courant. 2. The Antiquities of the Anglo Saxon Church, 1809, 2 vols. 8vo; 1810, 2 vols. 8vo; 1810, 8vo; 1815, 8vo. It is stated that the 1st ed. of this work was pub. in 1804, and we have heard of one copy which bears date 1806. There was pub. in 1845, 2 vols. 8vo, The History and Antiquities of the Anglo Saxon Church,—called the 3d ed. of The Antiquities, &c. But really this new ed. is a new work, although the substance of the old work is incorporated in it. The earlier publication was reprinted at Phila., 1841, 12mo.

"Is not that the proper place to notice Lingard's Antiquities of the Anglo Saxon Church, 1815, 8vo? The author is a Roman Catholic; and his work, although a heavy and destructive fire was opened upon it in the Quarterly Review, vol. xv. p. 92, is not to be consulted without advantage. It has learning and accuracy."—Dibdin's Lib. Comp., ed. 1824, 122, n.

We have the "heavy and destructive fire" to which Dibdin refers now before us. It certainly cannot be called a complimentary article. Towards the conclusion of his review the critic remarks:

"Such are the principles, and such are a few of the misrepresentations, of the work before us. If we had noticed the whole, we must have stopped at every page."—P. 110.

Southey declares that it is "A work not more full of erudition than it is of Catholic sophistry and misrepresentation."

"We can safely recommend his book for the curious matter it contains and the agreeable style in which it is written. Its defects are inseparable from the nature of his subject. Candour and impartiality are least of all to be expected from ecclesiastical historians."—xxv. 346-354.

These are the edits.; but of some of these there have been more than one impression. Abridgt. by Sadlier, 2 vols. 12mo, 12s.; new abridgt., 1855. Hume, &c. American eds. pub. by Dunnigan, N. York 13 vols. 12mo, $12; by Phillips, Sampson & Co., of Boston, 1853-54, 13 vols. 12mo, $9 75. In this ed. the editor has avoided some errors of the press which crept into the London edit. (the 5th) on which it is based. He has also occasionally dropped an explanatory note. We should not omit to notice that Lingard's history was trans. into French by M. Roujoux, and under the Government of Charles X. was used as the standard history of England in all the colleges of France. We presume that it still retains its favour in that quarter. The first ed. of Lingard's History was first reviewed by Dr. John Allen in the Edinburgh Review for April, 1825, 1-31, and for June, 1826, 94-155. The critic gives the historian credit for laborious examination of original records, great excellence of style, and a remarkable talent for narration, but charges him with the suppression of truth and perversion of facts:

"Dr Lingard's book is the fruit of great industry, learning, and acuteness, directed by no ordinary talents. It is written in a clear and agreeable manner. His periods are posed, and musical in their cadence, with a variety in their structure that pleases without palling on the ear. His style is nervous and concise, and never enfeebled by useless epithets or encumbered with redundant, narcotizing phrases. If it be deficient in that happy negligence and appearance of ease of expression, if it want 'those careless graceable beauties,' which in Hume excited the despair and admiration of Gibbon, there is no other modern history with which it may not challenge a comparison. The narrative of Dr Lingard has the perspicuity of Robertson, with more freedom and fancy. His diction has the ornament of Gibbon, without his affectation and obscurity. . . Dr Lingard also we are sorry to say, has no generous sympathy in the cause of freedom. He appears to take little interest in the struggles for liberty that form the brightest part of our annals. . . Dr. Lingard we need scarcely say, is a decided partizan of the Church of Rome. That he should be devoted to her doctrines was to be expected from the faith he holds and the profession he has embraced. But he is not only a believer in the creed and advocate for the discipline of his church, he is the defender of all her saints and confessors, the eulogist of all who have laboured or suffered in her cause, the denier of all who have resisted her usurpations. . . The devotedness of Dr Lingard to his church is an amiable and laudable feeling. When he maintains the antiquity of her rites and discipline and vindicates the purity of her dogmas from vulgar misrepresentation and calumny, we approve his labours and applaud his learning. But when he dissembles what might injure her reputation when he disowns whatever tends to her honour and credit he weakens our confidence in his truth as an historian and sinks himself into a common polemic. . . Dr Lingard has indeed a wonderful talent for quoting as much of a passage as suits his purpose and omitting whatever makes against him. . . We can discover, also, that his political predilections are adapted as likely to enlarge his accuracy as the ecclesiastical, and that he will require to be watched as closely in his account of our free constitution as of our Protestant church."—April 1825, 7, 10, 22, 30-31.

It is to be observed that the Anglo Saxon portion of Lingard's history is that to which the reviewer's strictures are chiefly confined. The second part of Dr. Allen's review of Lingard's History (Edin. Rev., June, 1826, 94-155) is confined exclusively to an examination of the historian's misrepresentation—as his critic deems it—of the facts connected with the Massacre of St Bartholomew. He refuses to credit Lingard's assertion that his "opinion of the case was formed only after a diligent perusal and comparison of the most authentic documents on the subject," charges him with a servile adoption of the version of the Abbé de Caveyrac, and declares that, on the whole,

"We are forced to the conclusion that Dr. Lingard's account of that transaction is a specimen of diligence or research and many plain indications of carelessness and haste of little real learning and unpardonable indifference to historical accuracy."—P. 95.

How far Dr. Allen is justified by the facts of the case in these grave charges, it is not, of course, for us to decide. He certainly had not determined to arraign the alleged offender without taking due time for consideration, for almost two years before the appearance of the first review we find the following entry in Tom Moore's Diary:

"Spoke of Lingard's History of England, reign of Philip and Mary very curious. Allen has detected him in many falsifyings, or rather giving a false colour to, his authorities,—particularly about the visit of the clergy, which he contrives to suppress or soften off."—Life, Letters, Lord John Russell's Memoirs, Journal, and Corresp. of Thomas Moore, Lon., 1853, iv. 134.

Under date of 22d May, 1844, we find the following lines, which, as a veracious chronicler, we are not at liberty to omit:

"Was much surprised the other day at hearing Mr. Lemon (of the State-Paper office) say that Lingard had never come to consult their papers. This from any other authority I should have pronounced downright impossible: but, so far as I have yet had time to examine, was inclined to believe it true. So, in a volume of his which I am at present employed upon, all the authorities he cites are from other sources. I have since seen one of two references by Lingard to letters in the State-Paper office."—Vol. v., 1850, 208.

It is to be remembered that the last edit. of the History appeared about six years after the date of the above entry, and the author—even upon the presumption of former neglect—may have taken pains to refer to documentary authorities whilst engaged in the revision of his text. That he carefully examined the new historical matter which had been pub. since the date of his last edit., we have the evidence of a most respectable witness:

"We may as well take this opportunity of saying that Dr. Lingard's ultimate revision of his work seems to have been most elaborate. As far as we have been able to examine the text, (10 vols. 8vo, London, 1850,) he has neglected nothing, either of authority or argument, that had emerged in the interval from his preceding appearance before the public. Mr. Macaulay has a full share of the doctor's attention."—Lon. Quar. Rec., Sept. 1851, 289, n.

We have the last ed. (6th, 1854-55) before us, but have not adopted Mr. Moore's plan of running the eye over foot-notes in quest of evidence of visitations or non-visitations to the State-Paper Office. Such indications, the historical student will agree with us, are of little value one way or the other.

Dr. Lingard was not disposed to remain silent under accusations of so heavy a character as those preferred by Dr. Allen, and he soon gave to the world A Vindication of certain passages in the 4th and 5th volumes of the History of England; 2d ed., Lon., 1826; Postscript, in answer to Dr. Allen's reply, 1827. Of this pamphlet there were at least four edits. The doctor's preface to his Vindication proved that, whilst deeply wounded by what he considered a most unjustifiable assault upon his candour and veracity, (the two most essential qualities of a good historian,) he felt fully able to encounter the foe who had provoked him to the combat:

"It has pleased the reviewer [Edinburgh] to constitute himself my accuser: it remains for me to repel the accusation. If I fail in the attempt, the failure will justify his conduct: if I succeed, (and of success I cannot entertain a doubt,) his will be the disgrace of defeat and the shame of misrepresentation. He has provoked the contest: he must submit to the consequences."—P. 8.

That the historian's defence did not fail to favourably impress at least a number of his judges—the public—the following verdicts give ample evidence:

"Dr. Lingard's Vindication, in short, is satisfactory and complete; and the pamphlet is altogether beyond comparison the most masterly and the best-conducted piece of controversial argument which our times have produced."—Monthly Review, February, 1827.

"His pamphlet is a model of controversial style: the scholar, the gentleman, and the divine appear in their best character; the calm dignity and the spirited firmness with which the historian rejects the coarse language and virulent accusations of his antagonist are strong assurances of the rectitude of his intentions and the truth of his cause."—We Quarterly Review, January, 1827.

"Whatever be the process by which Dr. Lingard has become qualified a true—and his enemies admit it—that he must take his station among the most distinguished of the writers who have investigated the annals of this country."—Ibid

"We scruple not to assert our conviction that Dr. Lingard has a manifest triumph over the reasoning and judgment of his opponents."—New Month. Mag., January, 1827.

"The historian's superior accuracy, fidelity, and research are too clearly manifest to require comment, beyond our record of the fact."—Ibid.

"We admire, and cannot too highly praise, the manly, temperate, and Christian spirit of Dr. Lingard's Vindication"—Lon. Mag., March, 1827.

"We do not envy or covet the feelings of the Edinburgh reviewer when he reads the indignant and triumphant pages of Dr Lingard's Vindication. His punishment reminds us of the story of the end of Haman"—Ibid.

The Dublin Review, in a notice of the 4th ed. of the History, 1837-39, remarks:

"It is impossible to convey an idea of the labour bestowed on the revisal of this edition. From the appearance of the first volume of the first edition in 1819, the author has been assailed in every imaginable form. Hence it was necessary to go through every charge to examine the authorities on which it was founded: where an error had been committed, to admit it; where not, to defend the original position. We know not a single point of importance on which the assailants succeeded, while those on which they are triumphantly discomfited are almost innumerable."—No. 24.

Among these "assailants" of Lingard's historical accuracy, it will be remembered, was Archdeacon Todd, to whose publications in this controversy we have already referred in our life of THOMAS CRANMER, D.D., p. 447 of this Dictionary. In this connexion, the testimony of Robert Southey, one of the warmest champions of the Established Church, in favour of Dr. Lingard, is too valuable to be omitted:

"He [Southey] spoke freely of his contemporaries. Lingard he praised for true earnestness and a desire to state the facts."—Dr. R. Shelton Mackenzie's Recollections of Southey, in Southey's Life and Corresp.

Dr. Dibdin, also a zealous defender of the English Church, remarks,

"There will be few who, on account of the religious creed (of the Church of Rome) of the author, alone, will deny this history a place on their shelves. The style is clear, vigorous, and unaffected: the facts are, upon the whole, fairly developed, and the authorities faithfully consulted. Nor is Mr. Lingard, like David Hume, afraid of encountering the tough and prolix authors of the Middle Ages. His notes bear evidence of his research; and, although his colouring of some characters will necessarily be seen with different eyes by Papist and Protestant, yet it must be fairly acknowledged that the cause of historical truth (if TRUTH there be in HISTORY) is in all respects promoted by the cautious investigations and dispassionate remarks which characterise by far the greater portion of his work. Mr. Lingard has caused the historical critic to examine anew the data from which his inferences have been drawn respecting the reigns of Henry VIII. and Queens Mary and Elizabeth."—Lib. Comp., ed. 1825, 246, n.

Even Dr. Allen, when about to criticise with great severity the Anglo-Saxon portion of Lingard's narrative, prefaces his strictures with the high compliment:

"To one desirous of making a study, and not a mere amusement, of the history of his country, we know no general history of England that we should sooner recommend than the work before us."—Edin. Rec., April, 1825, 2.

In the same periodical, for March, 1831, 1-48, will be found another review of Lingard's History, much more favourable than Dr. Allen's, but qualifying commendation with no slight censure. See other notices of the work in Lon. Quar. Rev., i. 273; Westminster Rev., vii. 87; Lon. Month. Rev., lxxxix. 293, xc. 43, cviii. 1, cxii. 159, cxviii. 389; Blackw. Mag., xix. 313, xxxi. 757, xxxix. 22, n., xlv. 492; Sir Archibald Alison's Essays, Edin. and Lon., 1850, iii. 425; N. York Eclec. Mag., xxiv. 350; N. York Internat. Mag., iv. 285.

Dr. Dibdin, in the passage from which we have just quoted, speaks of the "different eyes of Papist and Protestant" in inspections of historical data. The remark reminds us of a reflection of Mr. Prescott in his reference to the character of Elizabeth of England:

"If one need be convinced how many faces history can wear, and how difficult it is to get at the true one, he has only to compare Mr. Lingard's account of this reign with Mr. Turner's."—Hist. of Ferdinand and Isabella, 11th edn Bost., 1856, iii. 201, n.

See Mr. Prescott's remarks quoted in our life of HENRY HALLAM, LL.D., in this Dictionary, p. 769, col. 2. A few brief quotations from other authorities not yet cited before our tribunal must conclude an article already lengthened beyond its intended limits. Mr. Macaulay characterizes Dr. Lingard as "A very able and well informed writer, but whose great fundamental rule of judging seems to be that the popular opinion on a historical question cannot possibly be correct."—Art. on Sir William Temple, Edin. Rev., Oct. 1838; and in his Crit. and Hist. Essays, Lon., 1854, ii. 308.

"In truth," says Allan Cunningham, "Dr. Lingard, with all his research and learning and genius, is but a monk of the fourteenth century as far as respects freedom, civil and religious. . . . He is ready to aid no one but the clergy in pulling down kings; and he only does this that he may raise up a clerical idol in their stead"—Rise and Cur. Hist. of the Lit. of the Last Fifty Years, 1833.

It must not be denied that the graver errors with which Dr. Lingard was charged by Dr. Allen—a want of candour and impartiality, suppression of the truth in some cases, and perversion of the facts in others, where the truth is too well known to admit of disguise—are repeated to this day by judges whose erudition in the lore of history cannot be lightly questioned:

"His secret bias appears, not from what he tells us, but from what he conceals: the best-informed critic will not easily detect him in a false allegation, but the most superficial will have no difficulty in discovering much that is known and true, but adverse to his side, that is kept out of view."—SIR ARCHIBALD ALISON: Hist. of Europe, 1815-52, vol. i. chap. v.

The authorities next to be cited are not disposed to let Dr. Lingard escape so easily:

"A late writer, whose acuteness and industry would raise him to a very respectable place among our historians if he could have repressed the inveterate partialities of his profession, has used every oblique artifice to lead his readers into a belief of Anne Boleyn's guilt, while he affects to hold the balance and state both sides of the question without determining it. Thus, he repeats what he must have known to be the strange and extravagant lies of Saunders about her birth,—without vouching for them, indeed, but without any reprobation of their absurd malignity."—Hallam's Const. Hist. of Eng., 7th ed., Lon., 1854, i. 31, n. See also 33, n.; 101, n.; 105, n.

"No one of our historians," remarks Mr. Hallam, "has been so severe on Mary's reign, except on a religious account, as Carte, on the authority of the letters of Noailles. Dr. Lingard, though with these letters before him, has softened and suppressed till this queen appears honest and even amiable."—Hist supra, 105, n.

"The extreme prejudice under which this amiable and respectable author writes is a great drawback to his work. His history is far more learnedly and carefully composed than any other of our country; and yet, owing to his partiality, it leaves unsupplied the blank admitted by all to have been left by Mr. Hume,—for we meet in every one part of his narrative with the apologist or advocate of the Pope and Popery. So Romish a history could hardly have been supposed possible to have been written in this country, and by a person of the most respectable character."—LORD BROUGHAM: Political Philosophy, 2d ed., Lon., 1849, iii. 378, n.

His lordship cites, as instances of "the working of carnal prejudice in an accurate, and, generally speaking, a liberal mind:" I. The historian's comments on that provision of the Constitutions of Clarendon which made a clergyman triable for a crime before a civil or temporal judge, (ubi supra, 210;) II. His apology for King John's surrender of the kingdom into the hands of the Pope in 1213:

"Dr. Lingard, though he does not defend this base transaction, is anxious to extenuate it by all the means in his power. Nor can any thing be conceived much more flimsy than the topics he resorts to: for example, that the condition of vassalage was reckoned honourable in those times."—Ubi supra, 211.

III. His remarkable defence of Mary, Queen of Scots:

"As for the Stuarts, Mr. Hume, with all his prepossessions and his habitual 'love of kings and queens,' must be admitted to have been very far surpassed by Dr. Lingard. The former had too masculine an understanding to let Mary's conduct pass unreproved. The latter carries his partiality to the Scotch queen so far that he not only acquits her of all knowledge of Darnley's murder, but of all belief that Bothwell was an object of suspicion, and of all blame respecting his mock trial and scandalous acquittal; nay, he cannot even bring himself to censure the marriage itself, looks upon it as quite a becoming thing for a woman to marry a few weeks after a husband's violent death, and seems quite satisfied that a queen can be married by force, but worse than all, he appears absolutely to be the apologist of Bothwell himself and gives an account of his end wholly different from all other writers."—Ubi supra, 278–279.

In our lives of Curte, Gibbon, Hume, Laing, and other historians, we have quoted the recorded judgments of the late Professor Smyth, of Cambridge; and his testimony is entitled to too much respect to be properly omitted in an impartial review of the merits and demerits of the author now under consideration:

"Dr. Lingard has lately published a History of England, and we have now, therefore, the views and reasonings of those who are members of the Roman Catholic communion, presented to us by a writer of great controversial ability. Dr. Lingard also consults records and judges for himself, and his book must therefore be always referred to on every occasion of story of England in too cold a manner Catholic history of England: but his w the reader knows that the writer is not man of research and of antiquarian learn can be conjectured beforehand what nev he will produce or the sentiments that times differs with his predecessors, even not always with good reason."—Lect. o

Thus have we endeavoured to s partiality the evidence which ha offered for and against the merits of Dr. Lingard's great historical work The decision is now left to the jury, —that jury by whose verdict, willing or unwilling, we must all at last abide,— an enlightened public. Ourself the advocate of neither party, we are confident that we cannot be properly charged with injustice to either: not affecting to emulate the indifference of him who garnished his despatch with the Epicurean device of "No Religion," we trust that we shall always carry unchallenged upon our critical shield the more honourable motto, "No Bigotry nor Misrepresentation; Charity and Candour to all, Malevolen Asperity to none."

Litsfield, Edmund. On O. Cromwell, 1654, fol

Littell, Eliakim, b. Jan. 2, 1797, at Burlington, New Jersey, may well claim the proud title of an eminent literary benefactor to the public mind. He has published and edited the following journals: 1. THE NATIONAL RECORDER, commenced (at Philadelphia) Jan. 1819, 16 pp. per week, $5 per annum. This periodical at first consisted of selections from the newspapers, with the occasional introduction of original matter. Invited by the literary wealth of English journals, the editor was induced borrow largely from their pages; and the foreign element soon became so important a feature of the work that its original title was dropped as inappropriate, and altered to (2.) THE SATURDAY MAGAZINE, in July, 1821, 24 pp. per week, $5 per annum. In this periodical were first pub. in America Confessions of an English Opium-Eater; and in the pages of this journal and its predecessor many of our elderly readers first made the acquaintance of Charles

A trial of one year proved to Mr. Littell the inconveniences of continuing long copied articles from one week to another, and he therefore determined to change his Saturday Magazine into a monthly journal, under the title of (3.) THE MUSEUM OF FOREIGN LITERATURE AND SCIENCE, in July, 1822, 96 pp. per month, $6 per annum. For the first year of its existence this periodical was edited by Robert Walsh, then editor of the (Philadelphia) National Gazette; but after that time it was (with the exception of the year 1835) edited for twenty years (until the end of 1842, to vol. xlv. inclusive) by Mr. Littell, assisted for a portion of his time by his brother, Squier Littell, M.D. In 1843, The Museum was united with another work, was called THE ECLECTIC MUSEUM OF FOREIGN LITERATURE, pub. in New York, and not edited by Mr. Littell, although he was half-owner of the joint work. In April, 1844, encouraged by Judge Story, Chancellor Kent, John Quincy Adams, Messieurs Prescott, Bancroft, Ticknor, and other gentlemen deeply interested in the intellectual advancement of the country, this indefatigable enterer for the public mind commenced, in Boston, the publication of (4.) LITTELL'S LIVING AGE, 64 pp. double columns per week, $6 per annum. Composed of extracts from the Edinburgh (Quarterly) and other Reviews, and the best British magazines and weekly periodicals, each weekly number of this journal contains more matter than the monthly numbers of THE MUSEUM at the beginning. It makes four large vols. per year, equal in quantity of matter to 12 vols. of the Edinburgh or London Quarterly Review. After issuing 50 vols., a second series was commenced in April, 1853, Vol. lii. of the whole work commenced with April, 1857. They are all now reposing on our library-shelves, and should be in every collection in the country. The sale of THE MUSEUM averaged about 2000 numbers monthly; that of LITTELL'S LIVING AGE is over 3000 weekly. In July, 1855, Mr. Littell commenced the publication, in Boston, of (5.) THE PANORAMA OF LIFE AND LITERATURE, 144 pp. per month, $3 per annum. This journal contains only half the amount of matter comprised in THE LIVING AGE. It is meant to be of a lighter character than the latter, excluding political articles, resembling more of the nature of THE MUSEUM. We should not omit to state that, in addition to the periodicals thus edited as well as published by Mr. Littell, he pub., (1.) THE RELIGIOUS MAGAZINE and SPIRIT OF THE FOREIGN THEOLOGICAL JOURNALS, commenced in 1826, same plan as THE MUSEUM, but confined to religious literature, edited by the late Rev. George Weller. This magazine survived until the expiration of the 4th vol., when it was gathered to its fathers with the significant epitaph, "Very much liked, but did not pay." About a year since, Mr. Littell was urged by a person in New York to make another attempt to establish a religious magazine of this character. 2. THE JOURNAL OF FOREIGN MEDICAL SCIENCES commenced in 1828, same plan as THE MUSEUM, but confined to medicine, edited by Squier Littell, M.D., (post,) 3 vols. pub.

Few men indeed have labored so long and so successfully in the great cause of public education, and few, therefore, are so well entitled to the gratitude of their countrymen, as the subject of this notice. Many of them owe to him their first introduction to the great minds of the past half century, the commencement of that profitable acquaintance which hath soothed the pangs of sorrow, dispelled the gloomy shades of care, and made them wiser and better, happier and more contented, men.

Littell, John Stockton, b. at Burlington, New Jersey, a resident of Germantown, Penna., is a brother of Eliakim and Squier Littell. He has edited—with biographical and historical notices—Alexander Graydon's Memoirs of his Own Times, Phila., 1846, 8vo, and Alexander Garden's Anecdotes of the American Revolution, and pub. A Sketch of the Life, Public Services, and Character of Henry Clay. We hope that Mr. Littell will favour the reading public with some of the results of his researches into the unwritten passages of the Revolutionary period of this country.

Littell, Squier, M.D., b. 1803, at Burlington, New Jersey, a brother of Eliakim and John Stockton Littell, has acquired extensive reputation from his learned investigations into the nature, the probable causes, and modes of cure, of diseases of the eye. He has filled the responsible post of Surgeon to Wills's Hospital (Philadelphia) for Diseases of the Eye, from the opening of the Institution, in 1834, to the present time, (1857.) 1. Manual of Diseases of the Eye; or, A Treatise on Ophthalmology, Phila., 1837, 12mo; 2d ed., 1840, 12mo; with Notes by Hugh Rowston, Lon., 1838, fp. 8vo; 1840, 12mo.

"Our limits will not allow us to notice the work of Dr. Littell in detail; but, after an attentive perusal of the volume, we can heartily recommend it to the senior as well as junior members of the profession. It is replete with information, yet so terse in style and compressed in bulk as at once to entice and repay perusal. The descriptions are short, but comprehensive, while the treatment is characterized by great prudence. He has introduced almost all that is valuable, and every thing absolutely necessary to the student, within the compass of 250 small pages; and we would deliberately recommend our young friends to read this work before encountering the voluminous treatises of Lawrence, Travers, Mackenzie, Middlemore, &c."—*Brit. and For. Dr. Littell, as we have already stated, (see LITTELL, ELIAKIM,) edited, in 1828-29, the Journal of Foreign Medical Science, and was connected for some years with the editorial department of his brother's Museum of Foreign Literature and Science: he also edited, for a number of years, The [Philadelphia] Banner of the Cross, has been a contributor to the Medical Examiner and other journals connected with his profession, and is the author of many articles, in prose and verse, pub. in the literary periodicals of the day.

Littleton, Adam, D.D., 1627-1694, a native of Shropshire, educated at Christ Church, Oxford, Rector of Chelsea, and Prob. of Westminster, 1674, pub. 61 Serms., Lon., 1680, fol., some theological treatises and translations from the Latin and Greek, and some learned philological works, of which the principal is a Latin-English and English-Latin Dictionary, 1678, '85, '93, 1703, '15, 4to; 6th and best ed., 1723, 4to. Littleton was dictating his Dictionary to his amanuensis, and when they reached the word concurro, "Concurro,—to concur, I suppose," remarked the youth. "To concur,—to condog!" replied the lexicographer. The scribe took him at his word; and in the first ed., and in at least one copy of the 3d ed., (1693,) it still stands, "To concur,—to condog." Littleton, Lyttleton, Luttelton, or Luttleton, Sir Thomas, d. August 23, 1481, aged about 60, the celebrated author of Les Tenures, was the eldest son of Thomas Westcote, Esq., of the county of Devon, Esq., by Elizabeth, the daughter and sole heiress of Thomas De Littleton, of Frankley, Worcestershire, Esq., whose name and arms he took. On leaving the University, he removed to the Inner Temple and became one of the readers of that Society; was appointed, by Henry VI., Steward or Judge of the Court of the Palace, or Marshalsea of the King's Household; made King's Sergeant, 1455, one of the Judges of the Court of Common Pleas, 1466, Knight of the Bath, 1475. Littleton's great work on English Tenures, written in Norman French, has been already referred to in our life of Lord Edward Coke, in this Dictionary; and to that article and the references attached to it, the article CARY, HENRY, (p. 351,) and the following authorities, we must send the reader for further information respecting "the principal pillar on which the superstructure of the law of real property in Great Britain is supported." The 1st ed. of The Tenures is without date, but supposed to have been printed in 1481, London, fol. The late eds. (Tenures without Coke's Comment.) are—in English, from the 2d ed. of Coke Littleton, with Notes and Pref. by H. B. Kerr, Lon., 1813, 12mo; in English, from the Rohan ed., with Notes by H. Roscoe, 1825, 12mo; in English, new ed., 1841, 18mo; 2d ed., 1845, 24mo; in English, with Explanatory Notes, 1846, 8vo; in French and English, by T. E. Tomlins, 1841, 8vo. The eds. in French and English are more numerous than those of any law book, except perhaps those of the Corpus Juris Civilis and its component parts. See Lord Coke's Pref. to his Comment., Hargrave's First and Second Addresses to the Public, and Charles Butler's Pref. to 13th ed. of Coke upon Littleton; (these are reprinted in the 19th London ed., and in R. H. Small's ed., Phila., 1853, 2 vols. 8vo:) 4 Reeves's Hist. Eng. Law, 113; Fulbeck's Preparative, 71; Blaxland's Codex, 126; Pref. 16 Reports, 30; Ritso's Law Educ., 163; 1 Butler's Reminis., 115; 1 Bart. Conv., 17; North's Study of the Law, 11-72; Crabb's Hist., 425; Godbolt, 297; Willes, 332; McClel. and Y. Rep., 193; Young and J. Rep., 618; 1 Kent Com., 503; Hoff. Leg. Stu., 221-230; No. 54 Law Mag., 286; 3 Law Mag., 152; Bridgman's Leg. Bibl.; Martin's Leg. Bibl., 467, (from whom many of these references are taken;) Camden's Britannia; Bp. Nicolson's Eng. Hist. Lib., 169; Plowden, 55; 2 Angell's Law Intell., 264; Pref. to Henry Cary's ed. of Comment., (see p. 351 of this Dictionary;) Dibdin's Typ. Antiq. of G. Brit. We observe that Lord-Keeper Guilford (North's life of his lordship) recommends that Littleton be first read without Coke's Commentary; Judge Sharswood (Professional Ethics, Phila., 1853, 123) gives the same advice; and our experience—though a layman's opinion should be modestly proffered—endorses the wisdom of this dictum. Indeed, this is Coke's own advice to the reader:—to read Littleton by himself, again and again, and strive to understand him without recourse to the Commentary. But it would be a great error to suppose that the student is to be satisfied with one or two perusals of The Tenures. He must revert to it constantly.

"The very adepts in the law are not ashamed frequently to read it. I knew a Lord-Keeper [we may imagine who this was] that read it every Christmas, as long as he lived."—Roger North.

"Thomas Littleton, alias Westcote, the famous lawyer, to whose Treatise of Tenures the students of the Common Law are no less beholden than the Civilian to Justinian's Institutes."—Camden's Britannia.

"Littleton, out of the great books of the law, gathered the most special Cases, which were either generally agreed upon or by the Courts awarded to be law, or else in all ages received for positive rules. His book, doubtless is of such singularity that Littleton is not now the name of a lawyer, but of the law itself."—Fuller.

Lord Hobart went quite as far as this when he would not allow Littleton's authority to be questioned, declaring that "The sayings of Master Littleton are adjudged for law, and are judgments."

This is something more than he of The Tenures claimed for himself:

"And know, my son, that I would not have thee believe all which I have said in these books is law, for I will not presume to take learn of my wise masters learned in the law."—Epilogue: to his son, for whose benefit The Tenures was written.

The intelligent reader of the author of The Tenures and his learned commentator will share with Mr. Hargrave

His encomiums on the merits of Littleton and Coke, his admiration of their writings, his persuasion that an attentive contemplation of them, by the highest models, will be its own reward."—Lord Ludlow's Pref. to Coke on Littleton.

But it is hardly worth while to quote any more testimonies to the value of this work: in the words of Charles Butler,

"The reputation of LITTLETON'S TENURES is too well established to require any mention of the praises which the most respectable writers of our country have [illegible] on them."—Pref. to 13th ed. Coke on Littleton.

Mr. Butler proceeds to observe,

"But some foreign writers have spoken of it in very different terms."

After an examination of some of the [illegible] Tenures thus referred to, Mr. Butler continues:

"It it were proper to enter into a [illegible] of Littleton, it might be done by observing that it must [illegible] of great doubt whether Hottoman ever saw, or [illegible] saw, the work they so severely censure. Hottoman if he had [illegible] he might think it indigent and aimed; but he could not think it dictative of a disposition to slander."

Lord Coke did not let Hottoman off so easily:

"It is a desperate and dangerous matter (exclaims the indignant lordship), "for Civilians and Canonists to speak what they know and not without just cause to write either of the Common Laws of England, which they profess not, or against that which they know not. And for Littleton's Tenures I affirm, and will maintain against all opposites whatsoever, that it is a work of absolute perfection in its kind, and as free from error as any book that I do know to be written of human learning."

His lordship at a later period repeats his challenge, and dismisses Littleton's detractors with the following complimentary assurances:

"Such as in words have endeavoured to offer him disgrace never understood him, and therefore we leave them in their ignorance, and wish that by these our labours they may know the truth and be converted. But herein we will proceed according to Solomon et stultorum opiniones aversatus repellere: it is more fully to reprove absurd opinions with too much curiosity."—Pref. to Duke's Comment.

Having thus satisfactorily despatched the enemy, and unchecked by any apprehension of carping criticism, his lordship gives his enthusiasm full play, and proceeds to inform the awe-struck lyre, whilst he detains him a while in wondering admiration at the portals of wisdom, that "Certain it is that there is never a period, nor (for the most part) a word, nor an &c., but affordeth excellent matter of learning. . . . And it is to be observed that every word of Littleton is worthy of observation."

His lordship concludes his glowing eulogy with an irrefutable declaration:

"And albeit the reader shall not at any one time reach to the meaning of our author (or of our) yet let him never discourage himself, but proceed: for in some other day, in some other place, that doubt will be cleared."

We call this assertion irrefutable: for certainly no man can prove that what is now unperceivable to him now will remain an impenetrable mystery to the end of his pilgrimage upon earth.

Talfourd in the London Magazine, reprinted in his Crit. and Miscell. Writings. In his Life of Charles Lamb, Talfourd remarks:

"He wrote, indeed, pleasing verses and with great facility,—a facility fatal to excellence; but his mind was chiefly remarkable for the fine power of analysis which distinguishes his London, and other of his later compositions. In this power of discriminating and distinguishing, carried to a pitch almost of painfulness, Lloyd has scarcely been equalled: and his poems, though rugged in point of versification, will be found, by those who read them with the calm attention they require, replete with critical and moral suggestions of the highest value."

Locke, John, August 29, 1632-October 28, 1704, one of the most illustrious of philosophers and excellent of men, was a native of Wrington, Somersetshire, the son of a captain in the Parliamentary army, who subsequently practised as an attorney and clerk of the sewers in Somersetshire. After "completing" (or, as he would himself have said, commencing) "his education" at Westminster School, and Christ Church, Oxford, the subject of our notice applied himself with great industry to the study of medicine, and with such success that the celebrated Dr. Sydenham considered Locke's endorsement of his theory of the proper mode of treatment of acute diseases of sufficient weight to carry conviction to any unprejudiced mind:—

"You know," says he to Dr. Mapletoft, (the elegant Latinist,) "how much my method has been approved of by a person who has examined it to the bottom, and who is our common friend; I mean Mr. John Locke, who, if we consider his genius and penetrating and exact judgment, or the strictness of his morals, has scarce any superior, and few equals, now living."—Observationes Medicæ circa Morborum Acutorum Historiam & Curationem, 1675, 8vo.

It occurs to us to refer, in this connexion, to Locke's Latin verses.—Auctori, in Tractatum ejus de Febribus. See Boswell's Life of Johnson, ed. Lon., 1848, r. 8vo, 293, n. It was in the same year in which Sydenham gave these Observations to the world (1675) that Locke was admitted to the degree of Bachelor of Physic; and it is an interesting fact that his skill in medicine not only elicited the admiration of Sydenham, but was the stepping-stone to that series of good fortunes which so remarkably distinguishes the life of our philosopher.

The story runs on this wise. In 1666, Mr. Locke (who—with the exception of a few months spent on the Continent as secretary to Sir William Swan, envoy to the Elector of Brandenburgh—had devoted his time since leaving college to intense study) prescribed most successfully for Lord Ashley, who was suffering from a dangerous abscess in the breast, occasioned by a fall. His lordship placed his life in the hands of the intelligent stranger, who had quite accidentally become his medical adviser, and declared that he would strictly follow his orders. Locke insisted upon a surgical operation: the abscess was opened; the cure was complete, though the wounded part never closed, and the patient lived to become a grateful and lifelong benefactor to the friend to whom, under the blessing of God, he owed the prolongation of his earthly existence. But it was not the tie of gratitude alone which henceforth united the fortunes of the young physician and his noble patient: the charms of conversation, the boundless stores of recondite knowledge, the equanimity of temper and benevolence of heart, which so eminently distinguished the young practitioner, completed a conquest in the library which was commenced in the chamber of sickness, and the enraptured peer henceforth refused to be satisfied until he found his friend living with him under his roof and sitting daily with him at his table. Whether it was to save his physician trouble, or himself weariness, during the physician's dreaded absence whilst visiting prospective patients, we know not; but certain it is that Locke was not permitted to scatter his boluses indiscriminately in the neighbourhood: his lordship took care that the life of no mortal out of the range of his own social circle should be abbreviated or lengthened by Locke's professional agency, and not a pill or prescription could he had save by the patron's consent.

But the "medicine of the mind," (to borrow a phrase from the learned Diodorus,) which Locke knew so well how to administer, the master of the house was not disposed to monopolize so selfishly. On the contrary, when he had secured the coveted prize so earnestly desired, he made a feast—many feasts—and called around him his friends and his neighbours to rejoice with him over his acquisition. That young Locke was not disposed, on these occasions, to permit either himself or the company to pay such exclusive devotion to their host's good things as should entirely preclude their enjoyment of his own, we have the following anecdote in evidence:—On one occasion, when Villiers, Duke of Buckingham, Lord Halifax, and some other noted wits, were varying the pleasures of the table with games at cards and undignified badinage, Mr. Locke, after regarding them for a few moments in disapproving silence, took out his pocket-book and commenced writing with great earnestness. The singularity of his conduct excited the curiosity of one of the lords, who begged to know what it was which he was recording with such interest:—

"My lord," responded the philosopher, "I am endeavouring to profit as far as I am able in your company; for, having waited with impatience for the honour of being in an assembly of the greatest geniuses of this age, and at last having obtained the good fortune, I thought I could not do better than write down your conversation; and, indeed, I have set down the substance of what has been said for this hour or two."

Some extracts were then read for the edification of the late dramatis personæ, and it needed only the repetition of a few lines to induce the illustrious interlocutors to turn the conversation into a more rational channel. The fact that these great wits and—stranger still—great lords would thus patiently submit to be tutored by their self-titled "guide, philosopher, and friend" redounds not a little to the credit of all parties. So successful, indeed, was Mr. Locke in turning the minds of his visitors to topics of intellectual investigation that a number of them, anxious that others should profit by the wisdom which they had learned to appreciate, urged him to communicate to the world the results of his speculations in a branch of metaphysical philosophy then little understood either by writers or readers at home or abroad. Accordingly, as early as 1670 we find Mr. Locke forming the plan of his great work, which did not see the light until twenty years later,—The Essay on the Human Understanding.

As an additional proof of the great influence which the philosopher possessed over the mind of his friend and host, Lord Ashley, we may notice the fact that when his lordship, fearful of the extinction of his noble line, desired to find a suitable wife for his only son, Locke's pupil, (in the spirit of the patriarch of old, who welcomed a Rebekah to his household,) he confided the whole matter to his friend, and begged him from among the daughters of the land to select one whom he would be satisfied to recommend as likely to make his son happy and himself a grandfather. Had Mr. Locke's commission been publicly announced, it is not to be doubted that the sage would suddenly have become very popular with the ladies, even with those who had but little taste for metaphysical speculation; for to marry into this great family was no ignoble object of ambition. Our author, although he never saw fit to look for a wife for himself, proved as successful in the direction of the affections as he afterwards did in the "Conduct of the Understanding." The young gentleman was happily married; and his eldest son was, in his youth, the pupil of Locke, and, in his maturer years, the celebrated author of The Characteristics,—a work which has already come under our notice in a preceding page. (See Cooper, Anthony Ashley.)

In 1672, Locke's patron, Lord Ashley, was created Earl of Shaftesbury and made Lord High-Chancellor of England. He immediately appointed Locke Secretary of Presentations; and in the following year, when the latter lost this post by his lordship's losing the great seal, he made his friend Secretary of the Board of Trade. This office also Mr. Locke retained but a year, the commission being dissolved in 1674. When the earl fell under the suspicion of the court, in 1682, and was obliged to return to Holland, Locke accompanied him, and this fact, added to the freedom of his intercourse with disaffected Englishmen abroad, brought the philosopher under such odloquy that, in 1684, the king ordered his name to be stricken from the roll of the students of Christ's Church. In the next year, orders were issued for his arrest as a party to the intended invasion of England by the Duke of Monmouth, and Locke, though entirely innocent of the offence charged, was obliged to hide himself from the eye of power for nearly a twelvemonth. Upon the accession of King James, William Penn, the Quaker, procured for his old friend Locke the promise of a pardon; but this offer the latter declined to accept, alleging that he had been guilty of no crime

In 1686, he formed a literary society at Amsterdam, where he was at least once a week surrounded by Limborch, Le Clerc, and other learned men, who knew how to profit by his instructions. Two years later, the Revolution of 1688 afforded an opportunity to Locke and many of his countrymen to return to the native land from which they had long been banished; and it is an interesting fact, worthy to be noted, that the illustrious exile was one of the happy band of patriots who sailed in the fleet which conveyed the Princess of Orange to a country which hailed her and her royal consort as the restorer of its lost liberties. Mr. Locke now made an unsuccessful attempt to regain his studentship at Christ Church. The society did not feel at liberty to deprive his successor, who had been regularly elected, but offered Locke a post as supernumerary student,—which he declined. As some compensation for his sacrifices in the cause of freedom, Locke was named Commissioner of Appeals, with a salary of £200 per annum; and in 1695 the king appointed him one of the Commissioners of Trade and Plantations,—a place worth £1000 a year. For the duties of this office his published writings on politics and subjects of political economy had proved him to be amply qualified, and public expectation was not disappointed when the intelligent theorist found himself in a position to carry his speculations into practice. In 1700, the increase of an asthmatic disorder which had long troubled him obliged him to desist from active employment; and he was too conscientious to accede to the king's proposition that he should retain his post and salary whilst others assumed his labours. His remaining days were passed in retirement at Oates, in Essex, about twenty miles from London, at the seat of Sir Francis Masham, of whose family he had long been an inmate,—his time being exclusively occupied with the diligent study of that inspired volume which, to quote his own eloquent eulogy "has God for its author, salvation for its end, and truth, without any mixture of error, for its matter."

When unable, from increasing infirmity, to read for himself, his excellent friend, Lady Masham, soothed the pains of approaching dissolution by rehearsing to him those blessed promises on which his hopes had long been stayed, which had consoled him when an exile from an ungrateful land and a fugitive among a strange people. It was whilst thus piously occupied, on the 28th of October, 1704, that his attentive friend noticed that he had ceased to breathe, and had at last entered into that rest which "remaineth for the people of God."

"You will not, perhaps, dislike to know," writes Lady Masham, shortly after the decease of this truly great man, "that the last scene of Mr. Locke's life was no less admirable than any thing else in him. All the faculties of his mind were perfect to the last; but his weakness of which only he died, made such gradual and visible advances, that few people, I think do so sensibly see death approach them as he did. During all which time, no one could observe the least alteration in his humour; always cheerful, civil, conversible, to the last day, thoughtful of all the concerns of his friends, and omitting no fit occasion of giving Christian advice to all about him. In short, his death was like his life,—truly pious, yet natural, easy, and unaffected: nor can time, I think, ever produce a more eminent example of reason and religion than he was, living and dying."—Letter to Mr Langdon.

For further accounts respecting the life and works of this eminent man, we must refer the reader to the sources indicated at the conclusion of this article, and to the authorities from which we shall make extracts of greater or less extent as our limited space may permit.

Index at the end of each volume. Locke's Philosophical Works, with a Preliminary Discourse, Prefaces, and Notes, by J. A. St. John, were pub in 1843, 2 vols. 8vo; again, 1854, (Bohn's Standard Library,) 2 vols. post 8vo. These vols contain Locke's philosophical writings: 1. On the Conduct of the Understanding; 2. An Essay concerning the Human Understanding; 3. Controversy with the Bishop of Worcester; 4 An Examination of P. Malebranche's Opinion of seeing all things in God; with Remarks upon some of Mr. Norris's Books; 5. Elements of Natural Philosophy; 6. Some Thoughts concerning Reading and Study for a Gentleman. Of the Essay on the Human Understanding, the last English ed. was pub. by Mr. Tegg, London, 1853, 8vo. The consideration of this great work, upon which the fame of the author will always rest,—and securely rest,—will be postponed for a few moments, until we have designated the other principal productions of its author. These are—1. A Common-Place Book to the Holy Bible, 1686; 2d ed., 1697; revised and improved by Rev. Wm. Dodd, LL.D., 1765, 4to; 1824, 8vo. We could not with propriety omit to record this vol. in this place; yet it is by no means certain that it is correctly ascribed to Locke. But this is a matter which has already claimed our notice: see Dodd, William, D.D. 2. Three Letters Concerning Toleration: the

First, anon., in Latin, Geodæ, 1689, 8vo; in English, Lon., 1689, 4to. The Second, in English, 1690, 4to. The Third, in English, 1692, 1765, 4to, in Latin, 1765, 4to

"The first Letter on Toleration," remarks Sir James Mackintosh, "the most original perhaps of his works, was composed in Holland in a retirement where he was forced to conceal himself from the tyranny which pursued him into a foreign land, and it was published in England, in the year of the Revolution to vindicate the Toleration Act of which he lamented the imperfection

After quoting some of Locke's strictures, Sir James proceeds to remark, in a note

"How far are we at this moment [1831] from adopting those admirable principles and with what absurd confidence do the enemies of religious liberty appeal to the authority of Mr Locke for continuing those restrictions on conscience which he so deeply lamented"—Sir James Mackintosh Miscell Works, Lon., 1846, i 328

"Locke's invaluable Letter on Toleration appeared in 1689 It was, as might be expected opposed and the controversy was continued in subsequent letters till 1706 Many exceedingly disliked it"—Buckingham

A late eminent prelate remarks of the first Letter that it "added the treatises of Taylor, Stillingfleet, and Bayle "should be carefully studied they give a complete view of the subject Such who have wrote since in support of the divine principle of toleration may be said only to turn upon it"—Bishop Watson

Lord Grenville declared Locke's Letter on Toleration to be "unanswerable"

"A complete and satisfactory work on Toleration —Bp Llandaff's Coll ed Lon 1845 380

"Locke was engaged in a controversy through his first Letter on Toleration which produced a second and a third but it does not appear to me that these though larger than the first, have considerably modified its leading positions It is to be observed that in pleading for the universal toleration of all modes of worship not immoral in their nature or involving doctrines inimical to good government, placing in the latter category some of the doctrines of the Church of Rome He denies altogether that the care of souls belongs to the civil magistrate as it has never been committed to him All the power of civil government relates only to men's civil interests is confined to the things of this world and hath nothing to do with the world to come"—Hallam's Lit Hist of Europe, 8th ed Lon 1854 iv 200 201

3 Thoughts concerning the Education of Children, 1693, 8vo. Many eds

"Education in England has been in danger of losing but two of its greatest men Milton and Locke Milton plan is impracticable, and I suppose has never been tried Locke's I know has been tried often enough but is very imperfect it gives much to one side and so little to the other it gives a little literature —Dr Johnson Boswell's Life ed Lon 1848 i xxviii

An eminent critic of our own day by no means endorses this opinion

"Much has been written and often well since the days of Locke but he is the chief source from which it has been ultimately derived, and, though the Emile is more attractive in manner it may be doubted whether it is as rational and practical as the Treatise on Education If they have both the same defect that their authors wanted sufficient observation of children it is certain that the caution and sound judgment of Locke have rescued him better from error

"There are indeed from this defect also which causes several passages in the Treatise on Education to which we cannot give an unhesitating assent Locke appears to have somewhat exaggerated the efficacy of education There is much error on the right side in a work that aims at persuasion to practical matters but we are now looking at the theoretical truth alone Hallam's Lit Hist of Eur ps, 4th ed, 1854 iii 421

"Locke's reflections on the effects of education in multiplying the intellectual faculties and where skilfully conducted in supplying their original defects have been distributed into the fourth paradox of Helvetius that the mental capacities of the whole human race are the same at the moment of birth —Sir James Mackintosh Ed Prelim Discourse to Encyc Brit 7th ed viii 249 250 n

4 Two Treatises of Government, against Sir Robert Filmer, 1690, 8vo, 6th ed, 1764, 8vo In French, Amst and Geneva, 1722

"Composed of three parts of different character and very unequal merit Locke whose praise is less that of being bold and original than of being temperate sound lucid and methodical deserves the immortal honour of having systematised and rendered popular the doctrines of civil and religious liberty Locke's writings were on day to lessen the misery suffered by mankind from cruel laws and unjust judges —Sir James Mackintosh Miscell Works, ed Lon 1846, i 325, (q v, ii 27, iii 141

See Filmer, Sir Robert.

"John Locke hated tyranny and persecution as a philosopher, but his intellect and his temper preserved him from the violence of a partisan"—T B Macaulay Hist of Eng, 1848, vol i chap v

"Hobbes seems to have been one of the first who had any thing like a distinct perception of the real source of wealth Locke, however had a much clearer apprehension of this doctrine His Essay on Civil Government, published in 1689, is, in fact, the earliest work in which the true sources of wealth are distinctly pointed out Locke has here all but completely established the fundamental principle which lies at the bottom of the science of wealth But though Locke gave, in the passage referred to above a far more distinct and comprehensive statement of the fundamental principle that labour is the grand source of value, and consequently of wealth than is to be found even in the Wealth of Nations, it was but little attended rice or by subsequent inquirers. Locke was [illegible] the vast importance of the principle he had developed and two quarters of a century elapsed before it began to be generally perceived that an inquiry into the means by which labour might be rendered most efficient was the object of that portion of political economy which treats of the production of wealth."—McCulloch's Lit of Polit Econ., Lon., 1845, 2, 3, 4

See also (for notices of Locke's work on Money and Report of Board of Trade on the Poor) pp. 145, 156, 157 275

Mr. Hallam remarks of this same chapter,

"The excellent chapter on property would be sufficient, if all Locke's other writings had perished, to leave him a high name in philosophy"—Lit Hist of Europe, 4th ed., Lon., 1854, iii. 241

It may be expected that the author of this Dictionary, as an American, should offer some comments upon Locke's famous Constitution for the Carolinas; but our limited space forbids any detailed examination of a subject which indeed is now of but little importance and excites no considerable interest in any quarter. We would not be understood as expressing any opinion upon the following animadversions of an eminent political philosopher of our own day

"In 1669 a Constitution for the Carolinas was framed by the celebrated John Locke and as widely different in practical statesmanship from profound philosophy that it was bad altogether many passages grounded on principles extremely illiberal and wholly inconsistent with its author's theoretical love of freedom It was universally loathed and vehemently opposed nor did the colony according to the common tradition, ever enjoy a day of peace or happiness and it fell in fact it was abandoned and the old government restored"—Lord Brougham's Polit Philos, Pt 3, 2d ed Lon 1849 23

5 The Reasonableness of Christianity as delivered in the Scriptures, 1695, 96, 8vo, new ed., 1842 In French, by Coste 2 vols 12mo Vindication of the same from Mr Edwards's Exceptions, 1695, 96, 8vo Second Vindication, 1697, 8vo Animadversions, 1697 4to See Edwards John, D D, p 311, Boyle, or Boyse, Samuel, Mr Bold defended Locke and Edwards as we have seen, attacked him in his Socinianism Unmasked. But Locke afterwards found a more formidable opponent in Bishop Stillingfleet, who considered that some of Locke's expressions in his Essay on the Human Understanding tended to favour Toland's notions, who in his Christianity not Mysterious had used several arguments drawn from Locke's Essay Stillingfleet therefore in 1697, put forth his Defence of the Trinity, in which both Toland and Locke were censured The Defence was followed by three letters from Locke and two from Stillingfleet, all pub 1697–99 We have anticipated the natural course of our history a little, but thought it better to refer to these two controversies at the same time Lee, Brown, and the author of Mr Locke's Religion out of his own Writings, (1709, 8vo,) also censured some of his theological views, and we shall see presently that opposition from modern writers has been expressed in terms quite as decided See No. 6, and some quotations appended thereto. But we must not omit to quote a few comments upon Locke's Reasonableness of Christianity as delivered in the Scriptures

"In his Reasonableness of Christianity as delivered in the Scriptures he hath without formally mentioning, Lord Herbert, furnished a proper antidote against his scheme"—Toland's Trad cal Writers, ed Lon, 1867 Ib, q v See also pp 17, 180, 206, 281, 305, 378.

"This treatise was first published in 1695, without Mr Locke's name he concealed his being the author of it from his most intimate friends A learned and ingenious prelate observed, 'If Mr Locke writ it it was the best book he ever laboured at' Le Clerc, in his Bibliothèque Choisie, said that it was 'un des plus excellens ouvrages qui ait été fait depuis long tems sur cette matière et dans cette vue' And Limborch preferred it to all the systems of divinity he had ever read Dr. Edwards wrote against it, and his objections produced from Mr Locke two vindications of it. These merit the reader's attention as much as the work itself, which has long been generally approved"—Bishop Watson Collec of Theolog. Tracts, among which the bishop has introduced this work.

Indeed, the bishop does not hesitate to say for himself, "I must confess that I prefer this to all other systems of theology."

6. Paraphrase and Notes on the Epistles of St. Paul to the Galatians, Corinthians, Romans, Ephesians. To which is prefixed an Essay for the Understanding of St. Paul's Epistles by consulting St. Paul himself, 1705, '07, '09, '33, '42, '63, 4to; 1824, 8vo. In German, by Hoffman, 1763, 2 vols. 4to.

"Locke has done more towards clearing and fixing the sense of St. Paul's epistles than any or all of the commentators before him"—Dr Parr.

"It contains much important truth and some very considerable errors. Locke read St. Paul with great attention, and yet missed his meaning on some leading subjects. His ideas of the person of Christ, of the doctrine of justification by faith, and the character

...ple. He set the example, in English, of a style of criticising the New Testament which was afterwards followed by Pierce and Benson, who, in a series of similar works, completed the epistolary part of the New Covenant."—Orme's Bibl. Bib.

See Benson, George, D.D., p. 106 of this Dictionary, where we have quoted Dr. Doddridge's opinion of the commentaries of Locke, Pierce, and Benson.

"In my book which the author has read does the pride of human reason, opposing the express testimonies of God and striving to wrest them from their obvious meaning, appear so prominent as in most parts of Mr. Locke's Exposition of St. Paul's Epistles."—Thomas Scott, the Commentator.

"Locke himself is far from being a scriptural writer. . . . He concurred with the Arminians, and was intimate with their leaders in Holland. . . . Whatever desire of peace and union among Christians may have actuated him, we cannot but consider that his influence has been decidedly prejudicial to the pure gospel of Christ. . . . We cannot acquit him of a tendency to Socinian principles. His works must therefore be read with caution."—Rickersteth's C. S., ed. Lon., 1844, 289.

"Were I to recommend learned ingenuity and critical conjecture, often at the expense of truth, (and probably unsanctioned by the discipline of personal deep experience,) the Commentaries of Dr. (John) Taylor and Mr. Locke might be mentioned. — Williams's C. P., 6th ed., Lon., 1845, 202-205. See also pp. 301-305.

The manner in which Mr. Locke discusses the doctrine of predestination was, indeed, not calculated to please the critics whose strictures we have just quoted; but, on the other hand, his treatment of this topic seems to have greatly conciliated a once-famous controversialist, who claimed little in common with the commentator.

"This doctrine is very much softened, and the assumed proceedings of God towards men are brought almost within the bounds of credibility by Mr. Locke's exposition of the ninth chapter of the Epistle to the Romans."—Lord Bolingbroke, Works, vol. iii. 476.

But his lordship cannot refrain, even in the midst of his civility, from manifesting his rooted dislike to Christianity, by the sneer that it was a great inconsistency in Mr. Locke to write a Commentary on St. Paul's Epistles, and a Discourse on the Reasonableness of Christianity, after he had written an Essay on the Human Understanding. (Bolingbroke's Works, vol. iii. 156, 294.) His lordship here does not seem to perceive how much this silly comment is calculated to injure his own desperate cause,—that of credulous and unreasoning infidelity.

It is an interesting fact that Locke submitted his Paraphrases of, and Commentaries on, the Epistles to the Corinthians to the judgment of his illustrious friend Sir Isaac Newton, who read that on the first Epistle twice over, and that on the second Epistle once. The result of this examination he communicates to Mr. Locke, under date of May 15, 1703:

"I think your paraphrase and commentary on these two epistles is done with very great care and judgment."

See this letter in Sir David Brewster's Memoirs of Sir Isaac Newton, Edin., 1854, vol. ii. 320-322.

We are now prepared to enter upon a brief consideration—purposely reserved for our last subject—of the characteristics and merits of the author's greatest work.—7.) Essay on the Human Understanding.—The inception of which dates, as we have seen on a preceding page, about 1670, although the work was not given to the world until 1690, (fol.) An abridgment of it, however, made by Locke, and trans. into French by Le Clerc, was pub. by the latter in his Bibliothèque Universelle in Jan. 1688. So popular was the Essay, that a second ed. was pub. in 1694; the 4th in 1700; the 5th in 1701; the 6th in 1705; the 7th in 1706: all in fol. Since then there have been many eds., at home and abroad, both in English and in other languages. A new ed. of the Conduct of the Understanding was pub., Lon., 1839, r. 8vo.

Its influence in France and Germany was perhaps even greater than at home, where it was opposed by some members of the University of Oxford and other liberal-minded philanthropists, who thought that the people were already becoming too wise for their teachers, and stood more in need of soporifics than intellectual stimulants. All that can be expected of us in this place is the citation of a few opinions of eminent authorities upon this famous production. To attempt, within the compass of the brief space to which we are necessarily restricted, either to give a faithful synopsis of the work itself, or to reconcile the opposing interpretations of its doctrines which have been offered from time to time by the disciples of, or the protestants against, the school founded by this illustrious philosopher, would be worse than useless, because unjust:

"The endless disputations of the learned led him to suspect that they had their origin in an improper use of words and want of precision in our ideas, which he proposed to rectify by ascertaining the grounds and extent of human knowledge, through investigation of the properties of the human understanding. This was the origin of his renowned work, by which he justly acquired the highest distinction for the modesty and tolerance of his way of thinking and the clearness and rectitude of his understanding, evinced in the course of a correspondence with the most accomplished men of his day. . . . Locke's great object and merit was the investigation of the origin, reality, limits, and uses of knowledge. He contested the hypothesis of innate ideas, throwing great light on one side of the question, and endeavoured to prove, by an induction which was necessarily incomplete, that all our notions are acquired by experience. The two ultimate sources of all our knowledge are the senses and reflection, (or the perception of the operations of our minds,) which has caused his system to be called one of sensualism,—since he gives even to reflection the appellation of an internal sense."—Tennemann's Manual of the Hist. of Philos., Johnson's Transl., Oxf., 1832, 320, 327.

"That Locke possessed a noble and lofty mind, superior to prejudice, and capable, by an native energy, of exploring truth even in the regions of the intellectual world before unknown, that his judgment was accurate and profound, that his imagination was vigorous, and that he was well furnished with ornaments of elegant learning, were there no other proofs, might be without hesitation concluded from his great and immortal work, The Essay on the Human Understanding, in which, discarding all systematic theories, he has from actual experience and observation delineated the features and described the operations of the human mind with a degree of precision and minuteness not to be found in Plato, Aristotle, or Des Cartes. After clearing the way by setting aside the whole doctrine of innate ideas and principles both speculative and practical, the author traces all ideas to two sources,—sensation and reflection, treats at large of the nature of ideas, simple and complex, of the operation of the human understanding in, forming, distinguishing, compounding, and associating them, of the manner in which words are applied as representations of ideas, of the difficulties and obstructions in the search after truth which arise, from the imperfection of these signs, and of the nature, reality, kinds, degrees, causes, hindrances, and necessary limits of human knowledge. . . . The work is of inestimable value as a history of the understanding . . . and compiled from former books, but written from materials collected by a long and attentive observation of what passes in the human mind. A small treatise, On the Conduct of the Understanding, written by the same author, is a valuable supplement to his main work."—Enfield's Hist. of Philos., drawn up from Brucker's Hist. of Crit. Philos., Lon., 1840, 621, 622.

This critic, it will be observed, does not join in the charge that Locke borrowed largely from Descartes and Hobbes; and Sir James Mackintosh doubts

"whether Locke be much indebted to Hobbes for his speculations. He sets with all its faults, is that of a man who thinks for himself, and an original system not usually the vehicle of borrowed opinions."—Sir James Mackintosh's Works, Lon., 1854, 342, 343.

Mr. Lewes takes very strong ground on the same side:

"That Locke never read Hobbes may seem incredible, but is, we are convinced, the truth. It is one among many examples of how few were the books he had read. He never alludes to Hobbes in any way that can be interpreted into having read him. Twice only, we believe, does he allude to him,—and then so distantly and with such impropriety as to be almost convincing with respect to his ignorance."—Biog. Hist. of Philos., Pt. 2, Third Epoch, 2d ed., 1857, 7 v.

Cousin and Leibnitz speak of Locke's Essay in very different terms:

"Cartesianæ meritò celebrationis, Lockii de Intellectu Humano eximium opus ea unicuique cui dignissimum legenti utilissimum esse jure commendabitur."—Cousin, Trad. Log. Prælud.

"In Lockio sunt quædam particularia non male exposita, sed in summa longe abest ut a primo nec naturam mentis norat intellexit."—Leibnitz, Op. tom. v. p. 235, ed. Dutens.

"M. Locke avoit de la subtilité et de l'ordre, et quelque esprit de méthode; mais aspect de ce qu'il savoit relever."—Ibid., pp. 11, 12. And see Reflexions sur Locke de M. Locke, in the Recueil of Des Maizeaux, vol. ii.

But in his Nouveaux Essais sur l'Entendement Humain, Leibnitz treats Locke with far greater respect. See Lewes's Biog. Hist. of Philos.: Leibnitz, 2d ed., 1857.

See Le Clerc's Eloge on Locke in the Bibliothèque Choisie, année 1705, tom. vi. See also vol. xii., année 1707; Stewart's Prelim. Dissert. Encyc. Brit., 7th ed., vol. i. 106, n. We can barely refer here to Cousin's review of Locke's Essay.

"Locke is also a child of Descartes: he is imbued with his spirit and his method: he rejects every other authority than that of reason, and I was out from the analysis of consciousness; but, instead of using all the elements which it comprehends, without rejecting entirely the interior element, liberty and intelligence, he considers more particularly the external element: he is above all struck with sensation. The philosophy of Locke is a branch of Cartesianism, but it is a struggling one, like Epicurism."—Cousin's Course of the Hist of Mod. Philos. Wright's Trans., N. York, 1856, i. 226-227: see also p. 25, and vol. ii. 48, 169, et seq.

Of this review Mr. Hallam complains bitterly, and notices some of its alleged errors,—remarking, however,

"It is not possible in a note to remark on the many passages wherein M. Cousin has dealt so fair measure to our illustrious metaphysician. . . . I regret that it has taken so little pains to distinguish real from verbal differences of opinion, but has, on the contrary, had nothing so much at heart as to depreciate the glory of one whom Europe has long re-ckoned among the founders of metaphysical science."—Lit. Hist. of Europe, 4th ed., 1854, iii. 336, n.

"The eminence of his [Cousin's] name and the popular style of his lectures have given great importance to his criticisms; but, if we are to speak out our opinion fairly, we must characterize this criticism as very unfair and extremely shallow."—Lewes's Biog. Hist. of Philos.: Locke: 2d ed., 1857.

See also, on the subject of Cousin's misrepresentations of Locke's philosophy, article on History of Philosophy (by Samuel Tyler) in South. Quar. Rev., Nov. 1856. The French philosophers in general seem sadly to have mistaken Locke's doctrine respecting the origin of ideas, the power of moral perception, and the immutability of moral distinctions. These misrepresentations have been so largely exposed by Dugald Stewart in his Philosophical Essays, and in his Prelim. Dissert. to the Encye. Brit., that we need only refer the reader to these works.

"I would not have enlarged so fully," remarks this able critic, "on Locke's account of the origin of our ideas, had not a mistaken view of his argument on this head served as a groundwork for the whole Metaphysical Philosophy of the French Encyclopedia.' — Encye. Brit., 7th ed., vol. i. 116, n.

As regards the merits of the Essay itself, Stewart does not attempt to disguise the dangerous tendency of some of its positions, (we have noticed some of the effects of this tendency in our life of DAVID HUME, p. 915 of this Dictionary,) but he considers that "The general effect of the whole work may be regarded as the best of antidotes against the errors involved in some of its particular conclusions."—Lud., p. 108

"As the antagonists chiefly contemplated by Mr. Locke were the followers of Descartes, perhaps the only proposition for which he must necessarily be held to contend was, that the mind has no ideas which do not arise from impressions on the senses or from reflections on our own thoughts and feelings. But it is certain that he sometimes appears to contend for much more than this proposition; that he has generally been understood in a larger sense; and that, thus interpreted, his doctrine is not irreconcilable to those philosophical systems with which it has been supposed to be most at variance."—SIR JAMES MACKINTOSH: Works, Lon., 1854, i. 331-332.

Dr. Albert Schwegler, in his review of the Lockian philosophy, remarks:

"His empiricism is clear as the day. The mind, according to it, is in itself bare, and only a mirror of the outer world,—a dark space which passively receives the images of external objects: its whole content is made by the impressions furnished it by material things. Nihil est in intellectu quod non fuerit in sensu is the watchword of this stand point. . . . It is true that Locke was not always logically consistent, and in many points did not thoroughly carry out his empiricism; but we can clearly see that the road which will be taken in the further development of this direction will result in a thorough denial of the ideal factor."—Hist. of Philos. in Epit.; 4twelve s Trans. N. York, 1856, 197, 198.

We presume that Schwegler had been reading Leibnitz just before inditing this passage; but the latter replies to "Nihil est in intellectu quod non fuerit in sensu" by "Nempe nihil est in intellectu quod non fuerit in sensu, nisi ipse intellectus."—Opera, tom. pp. 358, 359. See Dugal Stewart's comment on this criticism, 1st Prelim. Dissert. in Encye. Brit.

Another eminent German philosopher remarks:

"Locke himself, indeed, was a good Christian; but this is only one instance more that he who first opens a new line of thought very seldom pursues it so far as to perceive even its most inevitable consequences. If we adopt his principles, we must inevitably renounce all other thoughts and limit ourselves to the feeling, the experience, and the enjoyment of the senses; and those who in later times have openly professed these notions, although they called themselves independent philosophers, were in truth only the disciples of Locke."—FREDERICK VON SCHLEGEL: Lects. on the Hist. of Lit., English Trans., Phila., 1856, 513.

These last lines will perhaps remind some of our readers of a remark of Dugald Stewart's:

"It is with much regret I add [to the denial that Locke was a Hobbi[illegible] the [illegible]ish who call themselves Locksts, and who, I have no doubt, believe themselves to be so in reality, are at bottom at least in their metaphysical opinions) Gassendists, or Hobbists."—Prelim. Dissert. Encye. Brit., 7th ed., vol. i. 114, n.

See Gassendi's Syntagma Philosophicum for those views of Reflection which Locke is supposed to have borrowed from this philosopher.

"Locke," remarks Mr. Lewes, "distinctly enough foresaw the idealistic and skeptical arguments which might be drawn from his principles. He did not draw them, because he thought them frivolous."—Biog. Hist. of Philos.: Locke: 2d ed., 1857.

Mr. Mill remarks:

"Few among the great names in philosophy have met with a harder measure of justice from the present generation than Locke, the unquestioned founder of the analytical philosophy of mind."—System of Logic, vol. i. p. 150.

A gentleman who has recently given to the world An Historical and Critical View of the Speculative Philosophy of Europe in the Nineteenth Century has been censured in very decided terms for an alleged misrepresentation of Locke's philosophy:

"It really mortifies us that these stale criticisms, which make Locke a mere sensationalist, should be written anew in the history of philosophy by a countryman of Locke's at this late day. Mr. Morell has, as it were, permitted Cousin to hold his hand while he writes the history of philosophy."—Hist. of Philosophy, by Samuel Tyler: South. Quar. Rev., Nov. 1856.

But the reader must examine the justice of the charge for himself: we seldom take either side of a literary controversy, for the excellent reason that it is our duty to present a fair exposition of both, and inflexible justice and eager partisanship are not supposed to travel always in company. As a striking evidence of the remarkable state of judicial impartiality to which we have tutored ourselves, we shall even quote Horne Tooke's astonishing criticism on Locke's great work without a syllable of righteous indignation. "The Essay," says this erudite philologist, is merely "a grammatical treatise, or a treatise on words, or on language. It was a lucky mistake which Mr. Locke made when he called his book an Essay on the Human Understanding. For some part of the inestimable benefit of that book has, merely on account of its title, reached to thousands more than I fear it would have done had he called it a Grammatical Essay. The human mind, or the human understanding, appears to be a grand and noble theme; and all men, even the most insufficient, conceive that to be a proper object for their contemplation, while inquiries into the nature of language are supposed to be beneath the concern of their exalted understanding."—Diversions of Purley.

We are gratified that Mr. Tooke acknowledges the "inestimable benefit" of the Essay to "thousands." Perhaps no critic ever more heartily rated the peculiarities of Locke's philosophy than his former pupil, the Earl of Shaftesbury, the famous author of the Characteristics. Yet even he does not scruple to declare that the Essay is "a book that may as well qualify men for business and the world as for the sciences and a university. No one has done more towards the recalling of philosophy from barbarity into use and practice of the world, and into the company of the better and politer sort, who might well be ashamed of it in its other dress. No one has opened a better and clearer way to reasoning."—First Letter to a Student at the University, Wks. 1707.

Dr. Reid, also, does not hesitate to differ from his intellectual preceptor; yet he makes a very handsome acknowledgment of his deep obligations to his lessons:

"I mention these things that when I have occasion to differ from him I may not be thought insensible of the merit of an author whom I highly respect, and to whom I owe my first lights in those studies as well as my attachment to them."

Again:

"Of all Mr Locke's works, his Essay on Human Understanding is that which has contributed most to his fame, and the reputation which it had from the beginning, and which it has gradually acquired abroad is a sufficient testimony of its merit."

The influence of Locke's Essay upon the mind of Jonathan Edwards is very perceptible: this influence commenced in the early years of the author of the Treatise on the Will.

"In the second year of his collegiate course," remarks his biographer, "he read Locke on the Human Understanding with much delight. His uncommon genius, by which he was naturally formed for close thought and deep penetration, now began to discover and exert itself. From his own account, he was inexpressibly entertained and pleased with that book when he read it at college,—more so than the most greedy miser when gathering up handfuls of silver and gold from some newly-discovered treasure."—Life of President Edwards; Edwards's Works, N. York, 1856, i. 2.

It is no difficult matter to multiply our quotations upon this grateful theme:

"The obligations we owe to him for the Essay on the Human Understanding are never to be forgotten. It is truly the first real chart of the coasts,—wherein some may be laid down incorrectly, but the general relations of all are perceived. And we, who find some things to censure in Locke, have perhaps learned how to censure them from himself: we have thrown off so many false notions and films of prejudice by his help that we are become capable of judging our master."—Hallam's Lit. Hist. of Europe, 4th ed., Jan. 1854 iii. 385-386.

Again:

"We come at length to the work that has eclipsed every other, and given to such inquiries whatever popularity they ever possessed,—the Essay of Locke on the Human Understanding."—Ibid., p. 363.

To judge from the tone of some other modern writers, we might suppose that Locke was, about the beginning of the present century, almost entirely neglected in England:

"From 1792 to 1800 I seldom heard Locke mentioned in England: his system, it was said, had become obsolete, and he was regarded as weak in ideology."—Chateaubriand's Sketches of Eng. Lit., 2d ed., Lon., 1837, ii. 268.

A few years later than this—that is, in 1810—Lord Jeffrey writes:

"The studies to which Mr. Stewart has devoted himself have lately fallen out of favour with the English public; and the nation which once placed the name of Locke immediately under those of Shakspeare and of Newton, and has since repaid the metaphysical labours of Berkeley and of Hume with such just celebrity, seems to be almost without zeal or curiosity as to the progress of the Philosophy of Mind."—Review of Dugald Stewart's Philosophical Essays, in Edin. Rev., Nov. 1810; and in Jeffrey's Works, Edin., 1853, 688.

We marvel at such jeremiads from so acute a critic as Jeffrey; or, rather, we should marvel, did we not remember that reviewers of the didactic school must have some text to expound from, whether it be canonical or otherwise. Who doubts that the reputation of Locke really stood much higher in the year in which Jeffrey wrote than it had done at any preceding date? That Locke's name was less in men's mouths than when his principles were undergoing a careful scrutiny from metaphysical disciples in all parts of Europe should be considered a matter of course. The enterprise and energy of Columbus were lauded in every household in Spain immediately after his return from his newly-discovered continent: but a few months later the name of the discoverer was but rarely heard from those who entered into his labours, peopled the wilderness, and tilled the soil which he had first made known to their need or to their cupidity. Locke's name was perhaps but seldom heard; but the influence of his doctrines had gone forth throughout the earth, and the teachings of his wisdom to the end of the world. No pen has better expressed the obligation of mankind to this illustrious teacher than that of Sir James Mackintosh, himself no ignoble master in the same school of philosophy:

"Few books have contributed more than Mr. Locke's Essay to rectify prejudice, to undermine established errors, to diffuse a just mode of thinking, to excite a fearless spirit of inquiry, and yet to contain it within the boundaries which Nature has prescribed to the human understanding. . . . His writings have diffused throughout the civilized world the love of civil liberty and the spirit of toleration and charity in religious differences, with the disposition to reject whatever is obscure, fantastic, or hypothetical in speculation,—to reduce verbal disputes to their proper value,—to abandon problems which admit of no solution,—to distrust whatever cannot be clearly expressed,—to render theory the simple expression of facts,—and to prefer those studies which most directly contribute to human happiness. If Bacon first discovered the rules by which knowledge is improved, Locke has most contributed to make mankind at large observe them. . . . If Locke made few discoveries, Socrates made none: yet he did more for the improvement of the understanding, and not less for the progress of knowledge, than the authors of the most brilliant discoveries. Mr. Locke will ever be regarded as one of the greatest ornaments of the English nation; and the most distant posterity will speak of him in the language addressed to him by the poet

'O Decus Anglicum certe! O Lux altera gentis!'"

(Gray: De Principiis Cogitandi.)—Edin. Rev., xvii. 180, xxx. 229; and in Mackintosh's Works, Lond., 1854, i. 15, 344.

Professor Smyth, when illustrating the connexion that subsists between the genius and the freedom of the human mind, remarks:

"In our own country, in like manner, the immortal Locke, James II., was a student persecuted and silenced: the world no benefit from the labours of his thought. But in a few years and the renewal of a free form of government cherished and admired, saw him give to England his Government, his Reasonableness of Christianity, his [illegible] the Human Mind, perhaps, than any individual [illegible] interests of his fellow creatures: security from the mind, servil[illegible] from the [illegible] and dogmatic [illegible] tion the understanding."—Lecture on the Use of the French Revolution, Lect. II., ed. Lon., 1855, vol. [illegible].

Dr. Watt beautifully descend[illegible] Locke's [illegible] ple as the sea, calm as the night, bright as the LOCKE'S STYLE OF COMPOSITION.

Locke himself complains of his [illegible] of writing," and "writing by incoherent parcels," in consequence of those vexatious interruptions which so often sorely afflict men of letters. See Disraeli, on the Literary Character, ed. Lon., 1846, 429, and see also pp. 140, 445.

An eminent philosopher of the present day, who has within the last few months been called from the world, thus comments on Locke's philosophical style:

"In his language Locke is of all philosophers the most figurative, ambiguous, vacillating, various and even contradictory—as has been noticed by Reid and Stewart, and by Brown himself indeed, we believe, by every author who has ever ventured to comment on this philosopher. The grounds of such a writer are not, therefore, to be assumed from isolated and casual expressions, which themselves require to be interpreted as the general analogy of his system."—SIR WILLIAM HAMILTON: Reid and Brown, Edin. Rev., lii. 189.

But Sir William does Locke less than justice: for it is to be remembered that many "commentators on this philosopher," and among them both "Reid and Stewart," also commend Locke's style in high terms.

"He gave the first example in the English language of writing on such abstract subjects with a remarkable degree of simplicity and perspicuity. His observations on the powers of the Human Understanding, and on the use and abuse of words, show in him an uncommon degree of penetration and judgment."—DR. REID.

"His phraseology, though in general careless and unpolished, has always the merit of that characteristical unity and vastness of style which demonstrate that, while he was writing, he conceived himself to be drawing only from his own resources. With respect to his style, it may be further observed that it resembles that of a well-educated and well-informed man of the world, rather than of a recluse student who had made an object of the art of composition: . . . it may be presumed to have contributed its clearness and ease to his great object of turning the thoughts of his contemporaries to logical and metaphysical inquiries."—DONALD STEWART: First Prelim. Dissert. to Encyc. Brit., 7th ed., vol. i. 104.

We give some more opinions upon Locke's style; and we think that the wide difference of eminent critics upon this point will somewhat amuse the reader:

"In regard to style, it is generally agreed that the prose of Locke is the best of his times; and it requires no great knowledge of the English to perceive in it the manners of a man who has lived in the best society, and who expresses his thoughts without pedantry, in the most clear, most simple, and most familiar terms. . . . I need not tell you that the eminent characteristic of this style is clearness."—Cousin's Course of the Hist. of Mod. Philos., Wight's Trans., N. York, 1854, ii. 171.

"His writings are characterized by clearness, precision, openness, and determinateness."—Dr. Schmucker's Hist. of Philos., Seelye's Trans., N. York, 1856, 198.

"In English, Mr. Locke's celebrated Treatise on Human Understanding may be pointed out as a model of the greatest clearness and distinctness of philosophical style, with very little approach to ornament; . . . perspicuous and pure, but almost without any ornament whatever."—Mayo's Lects. on Rhetoric, Philo., 1854, 263, 411.

"The diction he has adopted is, in general, such as does honour to his judgment. Relinquishing ornament and studied redundance, he is merely solicitous to convey his ideas with perspicuity and precision. No affectation, no conceits, no daring metaphors or inverted periods disfigure his pages; all is clear, easy, and natural, exhibiting a plain and simple style accommodated to the purposes of philosophy."—DR. BLACK.

"The great Locke, in a plain and severe style, well adapted to the philosophical precision of his researches, unravelled the metaphysics of the most interesting branch of philosophy by tracing ideas to their source and developing the faculties of the mind."—Kett's Elements.

"Locke and [Adam] Smith chose an easy, clear, and free, but somewhat loose and verbose, style—more concise in Locke, more elegant in Smith,—in both exempt from pedantry, but not void of ambiguity and repetition."—SIR JAMES MACKINTOSH: Works, Lon., 1854, i. 360.

"There is no excuse for not understanding Locke. If his language be occasionally loose and wavering, his meaning is always to be gathered from the context. He had not the lucidity of Descartes or Hobbes; but he was most anxious to make himself intelligible, and to this end he varied his expressions and stated his meaning in a variety of forms. He must not be taken literally. No single passage is to be relied on, unless it be borne out by the whole tenor of his speculations. Any person merely 'dipping into' the Essay will find passages which seem very contradictory; any person carefully reading it through will find all clear and coherent."—Lewes's Biog. Hist. of Philos., Lecln, 2d ed., 1857.

"The style of Locke is wanting in philosophical precision: it is a good model of the English language, but too idiomatic and colloquial, too inelegant and figurative, for the abstruse subjects with which he has to deal. We miss in every page the translucent simplicity of his great French predecessors. This seems to have been owing, in a considerable degree, to an excessive desire of popularizing the subject and shunning the technical pedantry which has repelled the world from intellectual philosophy. Locke is certainly a good writer, relatively to the greater part of his contemporaries. His plain and manly sentences often give us pleasure by the wording alone. But he has some defects. In his Essay on the Human Understanding he is often too figurative for the subject. In all his writings, and especially in the Treatise on Education, he is occasionally negligent and, though not vulgar, at least according to the idiom of the age, obviously in the structure of his sentences as well as the choice of his words: he is not, in mere style, very forcible, and certainly not very elegant."—Hallam's Lit. Hist. of Europe, 2d ed. Lon., 1854, iii. 399, 459.

Moore, referring to Locke's answer to Newton's famous letter to the former, remarks:

"Verbosness is the great fault as it is of most of Locke's writings, except the last, remarkably in a sort of a report of a debate at which he was present, inserted in his works where he has given one of the concisest and clearest specimens of reporting that perhaps exists."—Diary of Thomas Moore, in his Memoirs, &c., Lon., 1853, ii. 154.

"Of the character of Locke as a man, and as an honest seeker for truth, we have already had occasion to speak; and to theme is so pleasing that we are glad to refer to it again.

"All his contemporaries, and, what is better, all the known actions of his life testify that no man was more single and constant in his attachment to truth, virtue, and the cause of human liberty. He loved and served this noble cause: he even had the honour of suffering for it, but without ever departing from the most perfect meekness and charity."—Cousin's Course of the Hist of Mod. Philos., Wight's Trans., N. York, 1854, ii. 15.

No quality is more remarkably distinguishes Locke than his love of truth. He [illegible] no set or party has no oblique design such as we so frequently perceive, of warping some tenet which he espouses, to suit movements to the opinions of others, and what very few lay aside—to his own."—Hallam's Lit. Hist. of Europe, 4th ed., Lon., 1854, iii. 58.

"We cannot part from him without bearing testimony to his singular independence of mind, his acuteness and strength of intellect, his rectitude of character, his honest and unflagging search after truth, and his zeal for the diffusion of a manly, intelligent piety."—Morell's Hist and Crit. View of the Spec. Philos. of Europe, N. York 1848 95.

In connexion with Mr. Morell's last-quoted paragraph, the reader will be pleased to read the following lines, extracted from Locke's paper, entitled Pacific Christians, containing eleven articles:

"If any one find any doctrines, parts of Scripture, difficult to be understood, we recommend him—1st. The Study of the Scriptures in humility and singleness of heart. 2d. Prayer to the Father of lights to enlighten him. 3d. Obedience to what is already revealed to him, remembering that the practice of what we do know is the surest way to more knowledge.—our infallible guide having told us, If any man will do the will of him that sent me he shall know of the doctrine.—John vii. 17. 4th. We have him to the advice and assistance of those whom he thinks best able to instruct him,—no men, or society of men, having any authority to impose their opinions or interpretations on any other, the meanest Christian; since, in matters of religion, every man must know and believe and give an account for himself."

See Lord King's Life of Locke, ed. 1831, ii. 63–67.

"Shakspeare, Milton, Locke, and Newton are four names beyond competition superior to any that the Continent can put against them."—Sir James Mackintosh.

"I would observe of the Works of Locke, that his reasoning is everywhere profound and his language masculine. Also highly commended by the Athenæum, Examiner, &c. These translations were originally pub. in Blackwood's Magazine, and some of them appeared in an ed. of Motteux's trans. of Don Quixote, edited, with Notes, by Lockhart, in 1822, 5 vols. 8vo.

Of Lockhart's Spanish Ballads we have many complimentary notices before us.

"These Spanish ballads are known to our public, but generally with inconceivable advantage, to the very fine and animated translations of Mr. Lockhart."—Hallam's Lit. Hist. of Europe, 4th ed., Lon., 1854, ii. 112.

"These translations derive, as I have said, not a little of their excellence from Mr Lockhart's being himself a poet of fine genius, clear in his conceptions and masculine in execution . . What was tame he inspired; what was lofty gained additional grandeur; and even the tender—as in the lay of Count Alarcos—grew still more pathetic beneath his touch. —Mem., Sketches of the Poet, Lit. of the Past Half-Century, 1851, 298.

Certain portions of this work elicited two pamphlets from the executors of James Ballantyne, the first of which was replied to by Lockhart in the Ballantyne Humbug Handled.

"Executed with so much skill, and in so admirable a manner, that, next to Boswell's Life of Johnson, it will probably always be considered as the most interesting work of biography in the English language."—SIR ARCHIBALD ALISON: Hist of Europe, 1815–52, chap. v.

"The charm of the work is mainly owing to its being so imbued with the spirit of the subject that it may almost be regarded as an autobiography."—Ibid.: Essays, 1850, iii. 388.

"Fortunate as Sir Walter Scott was in his life, it was not the least of his good fortunes that he left the task of recording it to one so competent as Mr. Lockhart, who to a familiarity with the persons and habits of his illustrious subject unites such entire sympathy with his pursuits and such fine tact and discrimination in arranging the materials for publication. —WM. "The most impressive and instructive life, and one that awakens the tenderest sympathies."—CORNELIUS KEMP.

"One of the most delightful books in the language,—in all parts full of interest, which becomes of a melancholy cast towards the close."—Miss STILLMAN HILLARD.

It is not a little remarkable that no collection has yet been published of Lockhart's papers in the London Quarterly. For those contributions he received payment at the usual rate, in addition to his salary as editor, of £1500 per annum. This source of income, in addition to his receipts (at least £600 a year) as Auditor of the Duchy of Cornwall, and property inherited from his family, placed Lockhart in very comfortable circumstances. As editor of the Quarterly, he had the advantage of succeeding a man who could count his enemies by thousands and reckon his friends on his fingers. (See GIFFORD, WILLIAM, p. 667 of this Dictionary.)

Lockhart's manners, indeed, were quite as unpopular as Gifford's criticisms, but the chilling influence of an austere deportment is not to be compared in its effects with the hot blood engendered by a virulent pen.

"A change was soon visible in the character of the Review: it showed a wider and a deeper sympathy in the fortunes of genius; the insults which Shelley had suffered were, in some measure, atoned for; praise was extended to the classic fancy of Keats; and, in short, good-will to all who could claim a share in feeling and imagination was the order of the day."—ALLAN CUNNINGHAM: Biog. and Crit. Hist., &c.

"Its present accomplished editor, Lockhart, who at a short interval, Sir John T. Coleridge was editor for one year, succeeded Gifford. . . . He possesses in a high degree all those qualities which . . . [illegible] . . . his duties. He is not political in his disposition, at least so far as engaging in the great strife of public questions is concerned; he is armed the light not the heavy armed, infantry, and prefers exchanging thrusts with a court rapier to wielding the massy club of Hercules. [See Alison's first note to this paragraph.] . . . In the lighter branches of literature he has deservedly attained the very highest eminence. As a novelist, a critic, and a biographer he has taken a lasting place in English literature."—SIR ARCHIBALD ALISON: Hist of Europe, 1815–52, chap. v.

"NORTH. 'I may be somewhat too partial to the young gentleman, James, who is now editor and, indeed, consider him as a child of my own.'—Noctes Ambros., Nov. 1826.

North gives his opinion in a later paper:

"NORTH. 'The Quarterly Review is a great national work, and may it live forever! Notwithstanding his not unfrequent oversights, not a man alive could edit it in such a style as Mr. Lockhart does.'—Noctes Ambros., March 1831, q. v.

"I have carefully preserved," proceeds North, "among other relics of departed worth, the beautiful manuscript of the first article he ever sent me."

3. Life of Sir Julius Cæsar, with Memoirs of his Family and Descendants, with 18 portraits, 1810, 4to; 1827, 4to. Anon. 4. Portraits of Illustrious Personages of Great Britain: vols. i., ii., iii., 1821, 3 vols. fol.; vol. iv., 1834, fol., £90; large paper, r. fol., India proof, 44 Nos., at £5 5s. each, £210 complete. Vol. iv. is not uniform in size with vols. i., ii., and iii. There are 240 portraits in all eds., but in the first just noticed the engravings are on copper: in the other eds. they are on steel. The coppers were destroyed immediately after the publication of the first ed. The finest copy of this work ever offered for sale was that of Mr. Harding, the publisher, (1st ed.) which contained many duplicate plates. Some of the unlettered proofs have brought five to ten guineas each. The cost of getting up Lodge's Portraits, painting, engraving, printing, &c. exceeded £40,000. We notice the other eds.: 2. 1823–30, 12 vols. sm. 4to, £31 10s. 3. 1825, 12 vols. 4to, large paper, proofs, £50; proofs, r. 4to, £60. 4. 1835, 12 vols. r. 8vo, £30. 5. 1840, 10 vols. r. 4to, £28. 6. 1840, 10 vols. 4to, £17. 7. 1840, 10 vols. r. 8vo, £11 11s. 8. 1845–46, 8 vols. fp. 8vo, £2 12s. 6d. 9. 1849–50, 8 vols. fp. 8vo, £2. 10. 1852, 8 vols. 8vo, £2.

"A collection which at once satisfies the imagination and the understanding,—shewing us, by the pencil, how the most distinguished of our ancestors looked, moved, and dressed,—and informs us, by the pen, how they thought, acted, lived, and died."—Sir Walter Scott.

"Such a union of various talents—such a Gallery of Illustrious Deeds—was scarcely ever before presented to the eyes of the public in colours almost as vivid and sparkling as if the original occupied the canvas when their copies were taken. . . . These short pieces of biography are indeed admirable,—very models of taste, and as characteristic as the portraits themselves."—Dibdin's Lib. Comp., (q. v.,) 1825, 515.

Also praised by La Belle Assemblée, Literary Gazette, Literary Museum, &c. The collection entitled Physiognomical Portraits, 100 plates, large paper, India proof, pub. in 1824, 10 Parts, at £21, should accompany Lodge's Portraits. Among the former is the celebrated head of Michael Angelo by Cosmo Armstrong, which Raphael Morghen acknowledged his inability to imitate.

Add to these works the following:

Freheri Theatrum Virorum Eruditione clarorum, omnis ævi omniumque Nationum, 2 vols. thick folio, with 1317 small portraits, Norib. 1688.

"Whoever is engaged in the investigation of the history of the revival of learning must experience great advantage from the possession of this biographical collection. The sketches of characters distinguished for their literary attainments are concise, connected, and abruptness; but the catalogues subjoined, descriptive of the different authors, are highly useful and important. It is curious also on another account: the work contains no less than 1232 portraits, of which a great many are Englishmen. These volumes have not hitherto produced any very large sum in the market, (usually about £7 7s.,) but it is impossible that their value should not progressively increase, as well from the difficulty of procuring them on the Continent as from their own intrinsic importance."—Classical Journal, No. 6.

It is said that when Loftus was only twenty he was able to translate as many languages into English as he had numbered years.

The author gives us an account of two visits to the countries named,—the first in 1849–52, the second at the end of 1856. This work should stand on the library-shelf next to Layard's vols. on Nineveh, &c. To the Biblical student Loftus's work offers especial attractions.

Logan, George, M.D., 1753–1821, grandson of James Logan, (see next article,) and a native of Pennsylvania, was a Senator of the United States 1801–07, and filled other important political posts. He pub. Experiments on Gypsum, and on the Rotation of Crops, 1797.

Logan, James, 1674–1751, a native of Lurgan, Ireland, grandfather of the preceding, and a member of the Society of Friends, accompanied William Penn to Pennsylvania in 1699, and filled successively the offices of Secretary of the Province and Clerk of the Council, Commissioner of Property, Chief-Justice, and (1736–38) President of the Council. The latter part of his life was passed at Stanton, his country-seat, near Germantown, in the enjoyment of his valuable library and correspondence with the learned of foreign countries. A review of this translation, by Rev. Dr. Joseph Buckminster, will be found in The Monthly Anthology, vol. v., 281, 340, 391. Logan also made A Translation of Cato's Distichs into English Verse, printed at Philadelphia. He also left some translations from the Greek, and some other works, in MS. Logan's charges as chief justice were reprinted abroad, 1726, 4to, &c.

"Of singular excellence. He appears in them not only as a watchful guardian of the domestic weal and as a sagacious director, but as a profound sagacist and learned writer. Such subtile disquisition, and lofty speculation, such variety of knowledge and richness of diction, are seldom found in compositions of the kind."—Walsh's Appeal, 25, 477.

The London Quarterly exposed itself to merited ridicule and contempt by referring to this distinguished scholar as "One born of the name of Logan, as obscure as Godfrey himself," but Blackwood displays more knowledge of the subject when it speaks of him as "a great scholar for the age—a scholar with many languages,—a good mathematician. . . We look upon him as altogether an extraordinary man."—Jan. 1825, 1xix. American Writers, No. IV.

Logan, Sir William Edmund, b. at Montreal, L. Canada, April 23, 1798, was educated in Montreal and Edinburgh. His admirable researches during many years in the coal field of South Wales served to place him in the first rank of geological observers. In 1842, he was appointed to take charge of a geological survey of Canada, which is yet in progress under his direction. His published works will be found in his Annual Reports of the Progress of the Canadian Survey, and in the proceedings of the British Association and the Geological Society, embracing various important memoirs on the geology of Canada and the coal-districts of New Brunswick and Pennsylvania, besides his researches in Wales. He is also a large contributor to the Geological Survey of Great Britain.

Dibdin quotes from signature ¤4 recto an excellent passage, which, we think, will remind the reader of Sir Thomas Browne; but, from the remarks at top of signature c4 recto, it is evident that he is not the author of this admirable Introduction. Lemoine (see his Hist. of Printing, p. 75) ascribes it to Thomas Guy, foundor of Guy's Hospital. Dibdin notices the book at length in his ed. of More's Utopia, vol. ii. 260, 284, and gives some specimens of the Introductiou. See also Lon. Long, George, b. at Poulton, Lancashire, 1800, graduated with great distinction at Trinity College, Cambridge, of which he became Fellow; Prof. of Ancient Languages in the University of Virginia, 1824–26, Prof. of the Greek Language, Literature and Antiquities in the London University, (now University College,) 1826–31, called to the Bar, Inner Temple, 1837, Prof. of Latin at University College, 1842–46; Lecturer on Jurisprudence and the Civil Law before the Society of the Middle Temple, 1846; Classical Lecturer at Brighton College, 1849–57, (the present date.) This eminent scholar edited, for the Society for the Diffusion of Useful Knowledge, the Journal of Education, 1831–35, The Penny Cyclopædia, 1832–46, 29 vols.; The Biographical Dictionary, 1842–44, 7 half vols. to end of Letter A, all pub., He has also pub., in conjunction with Wm. Hughes, an Atlas of Classical Geography, 1855, r. 8vo, and a Grammar School Atlas of Classical Geography, 1855, 8vo; and, in conjunction with G. R. Porter, a Geography of Great Britain, with Supp. by R. Clarke, 1850, 8vo. To Mr. Long we are also indebted for The Civil Wars of Rome: Select Lives from Plutarch, newly trans., with Notes, 1844–48, 5 vols. 12mo, (also in 5 vols. 18mo;) Two Discourses in the Middle Temple Hall, on Roman Law, 1846, 8vo, and France and its Revolutions, 1848, imp. 8vo. He was the compiler of The Standard Cyclopædia of Political, Constitutional, and Forensic Knowledge, 1848, 4 vols. p. 8vo,—first pub. in another shape, under the title of The Political Dictionary,—and is now engaged, in conjunction with the Rev. Arthur John Maclaine, (of Trin. Coll., Camb., and Principal of Brighton College,) in the editorship of the Bibliotheca Classica, a series of Greek and Latin authors, commenced in 1856. In this library have been pub., in addition to other works, The Orations of Cicero, with a Commentary by Professor Long, vols. i.–iv. Mr. Long has also edited works of Cicero and Cæsar, (two vols. of the Grammar-School Classics pub. by George Bell, London,) and contributed a Life of the author to Wittich's Visit to the Western Coast of Normandy, 1847, 18mo. Those who wish to enjoy a specimen of Mr. Long's erudition and taste as a classical scholar must not fail to procure his translations from Plutarch, (Civil Wars of Rome, &c., supra;)—

"The manner in which the translation is executed demands the highest praise. . . . The style will be found much more pointed and vigorous than that of the Langhornes. But what gives the book its chief value are Mr. Long's notes, which are equally learned and judicious."—Classical Museum, No iv.

Longfellow, Henry Wadsworth, one of the most popular of modern poets, born in Portland, Maine, Feb. 27, 1807, is a son of the late Hon. Stephen Longfellow, and a descendant of William Longfellow, of Newbury, Massachusetts. This gentleman—the first of the name who came to America—was born in Hampshire, England, in 1651, emigrated to Newbury, Massachusetts, where, in 1676, he married Anne Sewall, and was drowned at Anticosti, a large desert island of Canada East, in the estuary of the St Lawrence, in 1690. (See Joshua Coffin's Sketch of the History of Newbury, Newburyport, and West Newbury, from 1635 to 1845. Bost., S. Drake, 1845, 8vo, plates.) On the mother's side he is a descendant of John Alden, who came over in the Mayflower, and who was the first man that landed at Plymouth. He entered Bowdoin College in 1821, and graduated in 1825, after which he devoted himself for a short time to the study of the law. Having received the appointment of Professor of Modern Languages in his alma mater, he went abroad in 1826, for the purpose of enlarging his opportunities of studious application, and spent three years and a half in France, Spain, Italy, Germany, Holland, and England. In 1829 he assumed the duties of his office, and two years later became a married man. In 1835, by the resignation of George Ticknor, (the distinguished author of the History of Spanish Literature,) a vacancy occurred in the faculty of Harvard College, and Mr. Longfellow was elected Professor of Belles-Lettres. A second trip to Europe was the consequence of this new appointment, and the pilgrim-scholar again enjoyed the opportunity of gratifying his thirst for the choicest productions of Continental literature among the scenes—and, in some cases, amidst the associations—to which they owed their birth. The summer of 1835 was passed in Denmark and Sweden, the autumn and winter in Holland and Germany, and the ensuing spring and summer in the Tyrol and Switzerland. Whilst residing in Rotterdam, a melancholy event occurred in Mr. Longfellow's family history, which has invested that ancient city with an undying interest in his memory. The companion of his wanderings was suddenly summoned to other and eternal scenes, and he returned home a widower. In 1842 he again visited France, Germany, and England, passing the summer at Boppard on the Rhine. In 1843 he was again married. After holding his professorship in Harvard College for about twenty years, Mr. Longfellow retired in 1854 to the undisturbed enjoyment of literary leisure; and, as he has since that period given to the world the most famous of his poetical compositions, (Hiawatha, published in 1855,) we are encouraged to hope that what Harvard University has lost by his temporary withdrawal the world at large will gain by his retirement,—the autumn fruitage of a mind eminent for the fragrance and luxuriance of its early blossoms, and whose golden summer has not "unbeseem'd the promise of its spring." Mr. Longfellow has resided since 1837 in the "Craigie House," Cambridge, the head-quarters of General Washington after the battle of Bunker Hill, and since distinguished as the temporary residence of Edward Everett, Jared Sparks, and several others of the scholars whose profound and varied acquisitions have made the city of Boston "a name and a praise" alike in the cloisters of Oxford and in the rude hut of the backwoodsman of the Western wilds. The history of "Craigie House" has been so admirably written by Mr. George William Curtis, in his biographical sketch of Longfellow in the Homes of American Authors, that we trust all admirers of the author of the Golden Legend (and their name is Legion) will not rest until they have made themselves familiar with this charming narration.

Mr. Longfellow first sought the road to public honours by pursuing the beaten path, time out of mind the high-way of trembling and unconfirmed authorship,—contribution to the literary periodicals, which on every side tempt unfledged genius to make the first essay of its pinions on the uncertain atmosphere of popular appreciation. We have spoken of the "early blossoms" of Longfellow's genius,—the promise of its "spring;" and no one will quarrel with the phrase who remembers that the seven Earlier Poems, included between pages 20 and 23 of the first vol. of the last collective ed. of the author's Poetical Works, (Boston, 1857,) were all written before the poet was nineteen years of age. The titles of these are as follows: I. An April Day. II. Autumn. III. Woods in Winter. IV. Hymn of the Moravian Nuns at Bethlehem. V. Sunrise on the Hills. VI. The Spirit of Poetry. VII. Burial of the Minnisink. Many of his juvenile poems were originally published in the United Literary Gazette, a Boston Magazine, and at a later day, when success had increased his confidence in his own powers, he contributed a number of admirable papers to the North American Review,—that priceless repository of so many of the best thoughts of the best minds of the most highly-educated portion of the American Republic. Among these papers of our young author may be noticed the Essay on Sir Philip Sidney's Defence of Poesy; and one on the Moral and Devotional Poetry of Spain, which first introduced to the public the reviewer's translation of Don Jorge Manrique's sublime Ode on the death of his father. Having thus seen Mr. Longfellow fairly committed to a literary career, and abundantly encouraged by critical judgment and popular favour to pursue that career with the brightest hopes of merited distinction, it is now proper that we should proceed to present a list of the volumes of prose and poetry which he has from time to time given to the world, accompanied with quotations from the opinions of eminent authorities respecting the merits of these publications.

1. Coplas de Don Jorge Manrique. Translated from the Spanish, with an Introductory Essay on the Moral and Devotional Poetry of Spain. Bost., 1833, 12mo.

"Professor Longfellow's version is well calculated to give the English reader a correct notion of the Castilian bard, and, of course, a very exaggerated one of the literary culture of the age."—Prescott's Hist. of the Reign of Ferd. and Isabella, 11th ed., Bost., 1856, ii. 231, n.; and see the text.

"The beautiful version of Mr. Longfellow."—Ticknor's Hist. of Spanish Lit., 2d ed., 1856, N. York, i. 19, n. And see p. 32, n.; 408, n.

"Mr. Longfellow's version is much superior to Dr. Bowring's both in elegance and fidelity."—N. Amer. Rev., i. 269.

We commend the following to the attention of the reader:

Las Coplas de Don Jorge Manrique. Con una glosa muy devota y Christiana de un religioso de la Cartuxa. Va juntamente un caso memorable de la conversion de una Dama. 2. Outre-Mer: A Pilgrimage beyond the Sea, N. York, 1835, 2 vols. Sale to April, 1857, 7,500 copies.

"Snelling writes well in his way. He cannot help being so. He appears to us a man of a truculent genius desperately ill disciplined. What a contrast to Longfellow! This writer—not unknown here as the author of Outre-Mer—comes nearer to a literary character than most of his associates. [In the Boston Book.] A professor of modern tongues in Harvard University, it is said; not of unknown tongues, we presume, though we were just about to call him an Irvingite. We speak in the literary acceptation, not philological. We cannot say that he imitates the author of the Sketch-Book: he has a spirit of his own. But it seems to us that his mind is much of the same description. He is sprightly, and witty, and graphic: he has seen much of the world, and used his opportunities well. There is an elegant ease in his style.—finished, but not finical; just the thing.—as we say of a private gentleman whose manners and dress excite no other remark, while they satisfy all who observe them. And, withal, he has the genial bonhommie of Irving. He sees the pleasant side of things. He likes that his reader should be innocently pleased, and is content if he be so. If Longfellow, in a word, had come before Irving, his fame would be that of a founder of a school (so far as America is concerned) rather than of one of the scholars. As it is, he may be popular, but not famous; and he will hardly have credit even for what he is worth."—Lon. Athenæum, 1838, 399; Review of the Boston Book, edited by B. B. Thatcher, Bost., 1837, 12mo.

"His rich and poetical and yet graphic description, and the true feeling with which he looks on nature and on social life, are the qualities which most attract us in his writings, because they are not precisely those in which travellers are most apt to abound."—G. W. B. Passoy: N. Amer. Rev., xxxix. 459–467; Review of Nos. 1 and 11, pub. in Boston, 1833–34.

3. Hyperion: a Romance, N. York, 1839, 2 vols. 12mo. Sale to April, 1857, 14,550 copies.

"We shall never forget the circumstance of its first perusal. We took it, as our pocket companion, with us on our first walk down the Tweed, by Peebles, Innerleithen, Clovenford, Ashestiel, and Abbotsford. It was fine at any special bend of the stream, or any beautiful spot along its brink, taking it out and finding in it a confidector to our own surcharged emotions. In our solitude we felt, We are not alone, for these pages can sympathize with us! The course of Hyperion, indeed, is that of a river, winding at its own sweet will, now laughing and singing to itself in its sparkling progress and now slumbering in still, deep pools; here laving corn-fields and vineyards, and there lost in wooded and sounding glens. Interest it has much,—incident, little: its charm is partly in the 'Excelsior' progress of the hero's mind, partly in the sketches of the great German authors, and principally in the sparkling imagery and waving, billowy language of the book. Longfellow in this work is Jean Paul Richter without his grotesque extravagancies, or riotous humour, or turbulent force."—Gilfillan's Second Gallery of Literary Portraits, 2d ed., Edin., 1852, 264–264.

"It is a book for minds attuned to sentiments of tenderness,—minds of an imaginative turn, and willing and ready to interest themselves in reveries as gorgeous as morning dreams, and in the delicate perceptions of art and poetry,—minds tried by suffering, and sensitively alive to the influence of the beautiful. . . . In tender and profound feeling, and in brilliancy of imagery, the work will bear a comparison with the best productions of romantic fiction which English literature can boast."—C. C. Felton: N. Amer. Rev., i. 145–161.

4. Voices of the Night, Cambridge, Mass., 1839, 16mo. Sale to April, 1857, 43,000 copies. The title Voices of the Night is applied to eight poems, most of which were originally pub. in The New York Knickerbocker, viz.: I. Hymn to the Night. II. A Psalm of Life. III. The Reaper and the Flowers. IV. The Light of Stars. V. Footsteps of Angels. VI. Flowers. VII. The Beleaguered City. VIII. Midnight Mass for the Dying Year. But this vol. contains, in addition to the Voices of the Night, a number of the author's early poems and some translations from modern languages. From a notice of this vol. in the North American Review for Jan. 1840 (l. 206–269) we quote the following lines:

"The poetry of Mr. Longfellow is marked by a very vivid imagination, great susceptibility to the impressions of natural scenery, and a ready perception of the analogies between natural objects and the feelings of the human heart. But, besides this, he possesses an extraordinary command over the powers of language, and turns it to any form at will,—

'Untwisting all the chains that tie
The hidden soul of harmony.'"

5. Ballads, and other Poems, Camb., Mass., 1841, 16mo. Sale to April, 1857, 40,000 copies.

"Mr. Longfellow's poetry has become so generally known, and wherever known, is so universally admired, as to need no aid from the journals of literature. It is probably read and remembered in places 'beyond the solar road' over which the literary journals travel. It is, therefore, with no expectation of adding to his wide-spread renown, or of increasing the number of his admirers, that we call our readers' attention to this second volume from the pen of Professor Longfellow's pen."—C. C. Felton: N. Amer. Rev., iv. 15–16.

Mr. Poe, in a review of this volume in his Literati, finds fault with Mr. Longfellow for what most critics have deemed worthy of high commendation:

"He regards the inculcation of a moral as essential. . . . In common with all who claim the sacred title of poet, he should limit his endeavours to the creation of novel moods of beauty, in form, in colour, in sound, in sentiment; for over all this wide range how the poetry of words dominion. To what the world terms prose may be safely and properly left all else. The artist who doubts of this thesis may always resolve his doubt by the single question, 'Might not this matter be as well or better handled in prose?' If it may, then it is no subject for the Muse. In the general acceptation of the term Beauty we are content to rest,—leaving ourself only to suggest that, in our peculiar views, it must be understood as inclusive of the sublime. Of the pieces which constitute the present volume there are not more than one or two thoroughly fulfilling the ideas we have proposed: although the volume, as a whole, is by no means so chargeable with didacticism as Mr Longfellow's previous book, [Voices of the Night.] We would mention, as poems nearly true, The Village Blacksmith, The Wreck of the Hesperus, and especially The Skeleton in Armour."

It is impossible to avoid the reflection that, if the "inculcation of a moral" be sufficient to invalidate any claim to the title of a poet, the world has been greatly mistaken in their estimate of Shakspeare, Milton, Dante, Tasso,—and, indeed, almost all of the greatest of those whom we have heretofore ignorantly reverenced as true poets.

6. Poems on Slavery, Camb., Mass., 1842, 12mo. 7. The Spanish Student; a Play, 1843, 12mo. Sale to April, 1857, 38,000 copies.

"The diction is easy and animated and the story comes out distinctly enough. There are tedious, useless scenes and instances of vain repetition, which render the action languid; but this, in the closet, interfers a little with the interest of." — Lon. Athen., 1844.

"The Spanish Student is a spirited composition well conceived, and abounding in pretty passages. The first part of the first scene embo[illegible] at once; and the frequent erudite allusion to Spanish songs, fables, and authors which are made throughout its pages furnish abundant evidence of the author's great familiarity with Spanish literature. The plot is interesting, and many of the incidents show much ingenuity, but it is not adapted to the stage being deficient in many of the essential requisites to make it palatable as an acting drama."—Irish Quar. Rev., June, 1847, 262.

"Upon the whole, we regret that Professor Longfellow has written this work, and feel especially vexed that he has committed himself by its republication. Only when we read a dull poem can it be said to have merit of any kind. For in fact it is only when we separate the poem from the drama that the passages we [illegible] indeed as beautiful can be understood. We [illegible] deed, the [illegible] tradition in terms. At all events, [illegible] son of true, crude, jewel such Mr. L. unquestionably is, has no [illegible] with these belated and paradoxical compositions. Let a poet be a poet, only let a play be a play and nothing more. As [illegible] 'The Spanish Student,' as Dievis is unoriginal: its incidents are [illegible] its plot is no plot; characters have no character: in short, it is little better than play upon words to style it 'A Play at all.' — Tait's Edinburgh.

As the critic had just quoted from Mr Longfellow's Preface, which informs the reader of the sources of the subject of the production which follows, it was quite [illegible] sure that the [illegible] Certainly it is unoriginal: the theme of The Golden Legend is unoriginal, also; and so is that of Reynard the Fox. Such comments add little to our stock of knowledge. As regards instances of alleged imitations, &c. of other authors, which Mr. Poe produces from portions of Mr. Longfellow's works, it does not, of course, become us to offer any opinion; but, upon the subject of literary coincidences in general, we may be allowed to remark that to require a scholar who has mastered the choicest productions of half a dozen or more languages to discharge his mind of all foreign acquisitions and place them in a corner of his library, whilst he proceeds to compose from a mind in puris naturalibus, is about as wise as the expectation that the lake of the valley should be able, at the word of command, to reconvert itself into the insignificant mountain-stream to which it owes its origin.

"In The Spanish Student, the affluence of his imagination in images of grace, grandeur, and beauty is [illegible] abundantly manifested. The objection to it as a play is [illegible] lack of skill or power in the dramatic exhibition of character, but read merely as a poem cast in the form of a dialogue it is one of the most beautiful in American literature. None of his other poems so well illustrates all his poetical qualities,—his imagination, his fancy, his sentiment, and his manner. It seems to comprehend the whole extent of his genius."—Whipple's Essays and Reviews, Bost., 1851, i. 66.

8. The Belfry of Bruges, and other Poems, Camb., Mass., 1846, 16mo. Sale to April, 1857, 36,000 copies. 9. Evangeline: a Tale of Acadie, Bost., 1847, 12mo. Sale to April, 1857, 37,000 copies.

"Next to Excelsior and the Psalm of Life we are disposed to rank Evangeline. Indeed, as a work of art, it is superior to both, and to all that Longfellow has written in verse. . . . Nothing can be more truly conceived or more tenderly expressed than the picture of that primitive Nova Scotia and its warm-hearted, hospitable, happy, and pious inhabitants. We feel the air of the Forest-world around us. The light of the Golden Age—itself joy, and poetry—is shining above. There are creatings of summer so surpassingly beautiful, so complete in their own charms, that the entrance of the mere is felt almost as a painful and superfluous addition: it is like a candle dispelling the welcome darkness of a twilight room. So we feel at first as if Evangeline, when introduced, were an excess of loveliness,—an intrusive ecligure of the surrounding beauties. But even as the moon by-and-by vindicates her intrusion and creates her own holier day, so with the delicate and lovely heroine of this simple story: she becomes the centre of the entire scene."—Gilfillan's Second Gallery of Literary Portraits, 2d ed., Lon., 1852, 208-201.

Mr. Gilfillan says many handsome things of Mr. Longfellow's minor poems, &c., which commendations the reader should not fail to peruse.

"With the scenes of Evangeline a simpler rhythm would have been more in harmony — were even the antique measure here selected completely bent to its modern occupation. This however, is not the case. . . . The pilgrimage of the maiden in search of her betrothed is told with great feeling and pathos. But the real charm of the tale lies in its manifold pictures of scenery, one or two of which we will give."—Lon. Athen., 1848, 673.

"Evangeline, as almost all of our readers are aware, is one of the most pathetic and beautiful pastoral narratives which has ever enriched our language. The pastoral scenes are like the daguerreotype. There is an originality about the story of the lovers, and an appropriate solemnity of language throughout the whole piece, which, added to the beautiful descriptions which the scattered among its pages, and the opposite comparisons which stud them, render it a truly fascinating if not enchanting poem. The most remarkable tale of passionate and constant love since 'pale its ineffectual fires' at the period of the devotion of Evangeline and the heroic constancy of her lover. Sir Edwin Landseer may well envy the enduring pastoral sketch:

"'Upon the pyramid-tree were leaves overhung by a pendulous 'Ar'

Quoted to the end of the line concluding with "sang of invitation." — Irish Quar. Rev., June, 1848, 261.

"This is an American poem full of locutions of real indigenous growth; and we hail its appearance with the greater satisfaction inasmuch as it is the first genuine Creolian Gem which has issued from the soil of America."—Graham's Mag., xxxii. 256; copied in Best Living Age, xix. 145-147.

"His longest poem, Evangeline, . . . was not long since warmly commended in these pages. No one with any pretensions to poetic feeling can read its delicate portraiture of rustic scenery, and of a mode of life long since eloquent without the most intense delight."—The Metropolitan, copied in Best Living Age, xix. 481-485.

[illegible] simple earnestness very graceful, and, amid the [illegible] lifelessness, is animated by a tranquil and lofty spirit. The interest in Evangeline, throughout her devious life-pathway of search, is kept up without intermission; and what is painful in the theme is relieved by beautiful sketches of the scenery of the Southwestern waters and the busy lives of their inhabitants. . . . The happy and varied imagery of the poem is throughout interwrought with that higher spirit which can impart a sad pleasure even to the deepest tragedy."—Lon. Examiner; copied in Best Liv. Age, xxiii. 385-390.

Mr. C. C. Felton, one of the most eminent of American classical scholars, after giving us a brief sketch of the history of Acadie, remarks:

"This subject is truly national in its character. Mr Longfellow has made the basis of the poem of Evangeline. He has selected the circumstances in the story which are susceptible of poetical treatment, and so combined them as to create from authentic historical materials a tale of rare beauty, tenderness, and moral power. . . . In Evangeline, Mr Longfellow has managed the hexameter with wonderful skill. The homely features of Acadian life are painted with Homeric simplicity, while the luxuriance of a Southern climate is magnificently described with equal fidelity and individuality of touch. The subject is eminently fitted for this treatment, and Mr Longfellow's extraordinary command over rhythmical resources of language has enabled him to handle it certainly with as perfect a mastery over the dactylic hexameter as any one has ever acquired in our language."—N. Amer. Rev., xvi. 243-244.

"His Evangeline is a beautiful picture of rural life and love, which from the charm of its pictures and the gentle harmony of its sentiment became popular although written in hexameters."—Henry T. Tuckerman, Sketch of Amer. Lit.

"Unfortunately for the thing, his Evangeline is the most perfect specimen extant of . . . rhythm and melody of the English hexameter."—President Cyrus Kingsley's Address at Kent and King's Colleges of a Course of Liberal Reading, N. York, '58.

The subject of English hexameters has already come under our notice on a preceding page, 1635; and it will be sufficient to refer the reader to our article on Abraham Fraunce and the authorities there cited. The critic in Blackwood (Feb 1856) concludes his notices of Hiawatha with the remark:

"The poet was more successful in the misfortunes of his Evangeline, to which even these lengthened, dactylic, inquiring hexameters lent a charm of appropriate sympathy; but it is a peculiarity of this sweet stanza that his best strains are always wistful, longing, true voices of the night."

See other notices of Evangeline, in Amer. Whig Rev., vii. 155, (by G. W. Peck;) New Englander, vi. 548, (by G. H. Hollister;) Univ. Quar. Rev., v. 104, (by T. S. King;) Brownson's Quar. Rev., 2d ser., iv. 56; South. Lit. Mess., xv. 46; Amer. Lit. Mag., ii. 172; Knick. Mag., xv. 96.

Of course, the admirer of Evangeline will not be satisfied to be without the beautiful picture of Evangeline painted by Thomas Faed and engraved by James Faed: size of plate, without margin, 14 by 17½ inches:

"Sat by some nameless grave, and though that perhaps in its bosom
He was already at rest; and she longed to slumber beside him."

This has received the highest compliment which the painter and engraver could covet:

"I am delighted with the work, both in conception and execution, and have written to Mr. Faed to express my acknowledgment for this mark of his consideration and my appreciation of the very great beauty and feeling of his illustration."—Letter of Mr. Longfellow to the publishers.

10. KAVANAGH; A TALE, Bost., 1849, 16mo. Sale to April, 1857, 10,500 copies.

"Kavanagh is, as far as it goes, an exact daguerreotype of New England life. We say daguerreotype, because we are conscious of a certain absence of motion and colour which detract somewhat from the vivacity, though not from the truth, of the representation. From Mr. Pendexter, with his horse and chaise, to Miss Manchester, painting the front of her house, the figures are faithfully and precise. The story, too, is remarkably sweet and touching.

"All who love purity of tone, tenderness, and picturesque simplicity have incurred a new obligation to the author of Kavanagh."—J. RUSSELL LOWELL. N. Amer. Rev., lxix. 195–216.

In this paper will be found some very sensible comments upon the oft repeated and seldom comprehended phrase, "a national literature." See also Mr. Lowell's remarks on the same subject in his review of The Tinon, N. Amer. Rev., lxiv. 466, et seq. Mr. Longfellow himself, it will be remembered, has also written eloquently upon this theme; and, we may say, since the publication of Hiawatha he has written eloquently upon the other side of the question also. We should refer the reader to Mr. Longfellow's comments on "A National Literature" in the Preface to his Poets and Poetry of Europe.

"Kavanagh is essentially Richterish, yet with a difference. The sharpness of touch, the incessant revelations of stoical character, which break through the fantastic waywardness of Richter, are not here. On the other hand, it has nothing of the conscious effort which sometimes characterizes Richter's wit, nothing of the indulgence in sheer dirt which he mingles so harshly with passages of dreaming, ethereal purity."—Lon. Examiner; (copied in Bost. Liv. Age, xxiii. 389–390.)

11. THE SEASIDE AND THE FIRESIDE, Bost., 1849, 16mo. Sale to April, 1857, 30,000 copies.

The Seaside collection contains seven poems; the Fireside collection is composed of thirteen poems. See a review of this volume in Brownson's Quar. Rev., 2d ser., iv. 268. Since the publication of this vol. the author has pub a number of minor poems in Putnam's (New York) Magazine.

12. THE GOLDEN LEGEND, Bost., 1851, 12mo. Sale to April, 1857, 17,000 copies.

"In this poem he has obeyed the highest humanity of the poet's calling, by revealing,—which alone the poet can,—not coldly, but in the glowing and affluent reality of life, this truth: that the same human heart has throbbed in all ages and under all circumstances, and that the devotion of love is forever and ever and from the beginning the true salvation of man. To this great and fundamental value of the poem is added all the dramatic precision of the most accomplished artist. The art is so subtilely concealed that it is not suspected."—GEORGE WILLIAM CURTIS. Sketch of Longfellow, in Homes of Amer. Poets, 284

"We have no hesitation in expressing our opinion that there is nearly as much fine poetry in Mr. Longfellow's Golden Legend as in the celebrated drama of Goethe. . . . Elsie, the farmer's daughter,—scarcely more than a child in years, but a woman in tenderness and devotion,—is as beautiful a conception as ever was formed in the mind of the poet. . . . We have already, at the commencement of this paper, expressed our decided objection to the machinery employed by Mr. Longfellow. It is the reverse of original, being threadbare hackneyed, and it is absurdly disproportionate to the object for which it is introduced. . . . Occasionally, whilst retaining rhyme and the semblance of metre, Mr. Longfellow is betrayed into great extravagance."—Blackw. Mag., Feb. 1852.

"Longfellow, in the Golden Legend, has entered more closely into the temper of the Monk, for good and for evil, than ever yet theological writer or historian, though they may have given their life's labour to the analysis."—Ruskin's Mod. Painters, vol iv. p. 377.

15. THE POETS AND POETRY OF EUROPE; with Biographical Notices and Translations from the earliest period to the present time, Phila., 1845, 8vo, pp. 779; 1848, r. 8vo; 1855, r. 8vo. This valuable volume contains selections from about three hundred and sixty authors, translated from ten languages,—the Anglo-Saxon, Icelandic, Danish, Swedish, Dutch, German, French, Italian, Spanish, and Portuguese. Mr. Longfellow himself gives us translations from all of these languages but two. Among the other translators are Bowring, Felton, Herbert, Costello, Taylor, Jamieson, Brooks, Adamson, Thorpe, &c.

"In this great crowd of translations by different hands, certainly very few appear equal to Professor Longfellow's in point of fidelity, elegance, and finish. The work is an honourable memorial of his great attainments as a linguist,—in which character, rather than as a poet, his fame will be sustained and advanced by this publication."—PROF. FRANCIS BOWEN: N. Amer. Rev., lxi. 231.

"We think Professor Longfellow has done a good service to literature by preparing this work. It contains a great deal of valuable information respecting the different languages of Europe, as well as of the various writers of poetry. The extracts from the authors are sufficiently numerous and lengthy to give a fair idea of the peculiarities, style, and class of each. . . . Instead of decrying such selections on the ground that they give us only a smattering of the authors and their writings, we hail them as most powerful helps in disseminating information and creating and increasing a taste for mental cultivation."—Prot. Epis. Quar. Rev. and Church Register, N. York, April, 1855, 310–311.

See also Lon. Athen., 1845, 961–962.

We should be pleased to see a second volume of this work, according to the suggestion of the learned editor. As we have had occasion to refer to Mr. Longfellow's translations,—we speak not only of those in the volume just noticed,—we must quote a few lines more upon the subject:

"Longfellow's translations from the German, Swedish, Spanish, French, Dutch, Italian, and Anglo-Saxon poems in a very high degree that elegance of diction and thoroughly classical colouring for which all his other poems are remarkable."—Irish Quar. Rev., June, 1855. 202.

"Professor Longfellow excels in translating from the German and the Swedish." —Lon. Athen., 1844, 5.

The North American reviewer of Longfellow's Voices of the Night (1839, 16mo) remarks that the "Translations from the French, Anglo-Saxon, Danish, and German are all executed with a high degree of skill."—Vol. i. 200.

But Mr. Longfellow's fame as an accomplished linguist is so well established that it is not necessary for us to multiply quotations on this point.

16. THE SONG OF HIAWATHA, Bost., Oct. 1855, 16mo. Sale, in less than four weeks after publication, 10,000 copies; sale to end of March, 1857, 30,000 copies; to April, 1857, 50,000 copies.

"This Indian fable—if I may so call it—is founded on a tradition prevalent among the North American Indians, of a personage of miraculous birth, who was sent among them to clear their rivers, forests, and fishing-grounds and to teach them the arts of peace. He was known among different tribes by the several names of Michabou, Chahs, Manabozo, Tarenyawagan, and Hiawatha. Mr. Schoolcraft gives an account of him in his Algic Researches, vol. i. p. 141, and in his History, Condition, and Prospects of the Indian Tribes of the United States, Part 3, p. 314, may be found the Iroquois form of the tradition, derived from the verbal narrations of an Onondaga chief.

"Into this old tradition I have woven other curious Indian legends, drawn chiefly from the various and valuable writings of Mr. Schoolcraft, to whom the literary world is greatly indebted for his indefatigable zeal in rescuing from oblivion so much of the legendary lore of the Indians.

"The scene of the poem is among the Ojibways, on the southern shore of Lake Superior, in the region between the Pictured Rocks and the Grand Sable."—Note to Hiawatha.

Notwithstanding this full and explicit statement by Mr. Longfellow of the sources from which he had derived the material of his poem, a writer in the National Intelligencer (Washington, D.C.) pub. an article, in a few weeks after the appearance of Hiawatha, charging the author with having borrowed "the entire form, spirit, and many of the most striking incidents" of Kalevala, the great national epic of the Finns. This attack was answered in two letters in The New York Observer, (Jan. 24, 1856, et ante,) under the signature of Theodorus. The reviewer remarks, "Such a charge is not only untenable, but absurd," and proceeds to expose the alleged absurdity of which he complains. William Howitt, in a letter to the London Athenæum, Nov. 17, 1855,—elicited by a review of Hiawatha in a preceding number (Nov. 10, 1855,) of that excellent journal,—eulogizes Hiawatha in the highest terms, and commends the author for having chosen the metre of the Kalevala and the Kantelotar, but says not a word of plagiarism or even of imitation. Howitt's letter elicited another, (Athen., Nov. 24, 1855,) from Mr. D. F. McCarthy, (translator of Dramas of Calderon from the Spanish,) who adduces examples to prove that the metre of Hiawatha is not confined to Finlandic or Sclavonic poets; and he does not think it a matter of course, therefore, that even the metre was suggested to Mr. Longfellow by any of those bards. In the same periodical for Dec. 1, 1855, Mr. W. S. takes the field, and opens the question still further, remarking that "Rhymeless trochaic dimeter is commonly used throughout Europe. . . . Mr. Longfellow, in his excellent and unobtrusive way, with as little reason be said to imitate the metre of the 'Kalevala' or Philalethes, in his rhymeless iambic trimeter catalectic version of the Divina Comedia, can be asserted to represent the music of Dante."

As usual in cases of this character, two of the critics engaged in the controversy soon fell into a misunderstanding on their own account: Mr. Howitt felt himself aggrieved by some comments of W. S.'s upon his first communication, and in the Athenæum for Dec. 8, 1855, he takes the offender to task for his alleged want of courtesy. Mr. W. S., nowise abashed, returns to the charge in the Athenæum for Dec. 15, and in the same paper appears a letter from W. Brockie, who, coolly enough, commences his dissertation with—

"The question as to whether or not Longfellow's Hiawatha is in the national metre of Finland seems not unlikely to raise a controversy in your columns. W. S. says it is not: I am inclined to think it is."

It would appear to our superficial judgment that the "controversy" had been already pretty well "raised." But the end is not yet. In the Athenæum for Dec. 29, Mr. Ferdinand Freiligrath gives us a summary of the arguments advanced by the four contestants, and decides that "Hiawatha"

"is written in a modified Finnish metre,—modified by the exquisite feeling of the American poet, according to the genius of the English language and to the wants of modern taste. I feel perfectly convinced that, when Mr. Longfellow wrote Hiawatha, the sweet monotony of the trochees of Finland, and not the mellow and melodious full of those of Spain, vibrated in his soul."

From Mr. Freiligrath's intimate acquaintance with Von Schröter's Finnische Runen (Finnisch und Deutsch, Stuttgart und Tübingen, 1834) and the Kalevala, surely he would have been the one to detect any close imitations on the part of the American poet; but nothing of this kind is intimated. The London Leader also took a part in the Hiawatha controversy, and Dr. Latham, in a letter to that paper, considers that Mr. Longfellow received many suggestions (as stated by the writer in the National Intelligencer) from Kalevala; but the editor of the Leader takes an entirely different view of the subject, defends the author of Hiawatha manfully, and dismisses the whole matter with the comment:

"In Longfellow's case the obligation to Kalevala is assumed. It is very possibly no direct obligation at all: but granting the obligation, we entirely absolve the poet for not having mentioned it."

Now, it is evident that Dr. Schoolcraft himself is the best judge whether the author of Hiawatha has faithfully reproduced in poetry those peculiarities of Indian mythology, customs, and superstitions which Dr. Schoolcraft has given us in prose—on which prose Longfellow avowedly bases his poem. To him, therefore, let us have recourse for the solution of this question. We quote from his dedication of The Myth of Hiawatha and other Oral Legends, Mythologic and Allegoric, of the North American Indians, Phila. and Lon., 1856, 12mo:

"To Professor Henry Wadsworth Longfellow

"SIR:—Permit me to dedicate to you this volume of Indian myths and legends, derived from the story telling circle of the native wigwams. That they indicate the possession by the Algonkin tribes, of mental resources of a very characteristic kind, furnishing, in fact, a new point from which to judge the race and to excite intellectual sympathies—you have most fully shown in your poems of Hiawatha. Not only so, but you have demonstrated, by this pleasing series of pictures of Indian life, sentiment, and invention, that the use of the native lore records one of the true sources of our literary independence. Greece and Rome, England and Italy, have so long furnished (if they have not exhausted) the field of poetic culture, that it is at least refreshing to find, both in theme and metre, something new

"Very truly, yours,

"HENRY R. SCHOOLCRAFT."

This certainly puts forever at rest the charge of the author of Hiawatha having borrowed—as has been alleged—"the form, spirit, and many of the most striking incidents of Kalevala." If these are dissimilar to those so graphically depicted by Dr. Schoolcraft, this gentleman could not endorse, as he has done, the faithfulness of Longfellow's poetical version of the latter: the admixture of foreign colours would necessarily destroy the resemblance of the whole picture. And if the Kalevala's "form, spirit, and incidents" are so exactly similar to the original Hiawatha characteristics, we see no necessity for borrowing the former, and no possibility of detecting their incorporation if they were borrowed. It is a very natural remark, that the author who first makes popular a peculiar style or measure must expect to be charged with plagiarism by the ignoramus who makes the wonderful discovery that such style or measure did not originate with the writer through whose agency it became known to him.

Having thus devoted quite as much space as we can afford to an examination of the paternity of Hiawatha, and recommitted this interesting aborigine to the domicile of the claimant whose name he bears, it is proper that we should inquire what impression he has made upon the many thousands in whose libraries and parlours he has become an intimate during his wanderings in his native country and in strange lands.

"Longfellow's epic," says a critic in Das Ausland, "is undoubtedly the most considerable poem which has appeared for years in the English language. Its success has been unexampled on both sides of the Atlantic. In London the book has been twice reprinted; and, although we ordered it immediately after its publication, we were only able to secure a copy of the fourth edition. It was certainly a happy thought to gather the legends of the tawny aborigines of North America together in a great poem."

But this reviewer by no means accedes to Hiawatha unmixed commendation: he objects to portions of the plot, and to the measure

"The tale itself is beautiful, fanciful, and new, and he has worked it up into a poem of many parts. . . . He has produced, in an imaginary memoir of the hero, Hiawatha, a picture of Indian life as it exists in the forest and by the river, full of light and colour, repose and action. . . . It is beyond all doubt that this Song of Hiawatha will increase Mr. Longfellow's reputation as a singer. The poem, as we have said and proved by extract, is sweet and simple, is full of local and national colour, has a tone and ring of its own: in a word, the story of Hiawatha is the poet's most original production."—Lon. Athenæum, Nov. 10, 1855, 1295; and see p. 1359.

"This Song is a quaint chant, a happy illustration of manners, but it lacks all the important elements which go to the making of a poem. We are interested, pleased, attracted, yet perfectly indifferent: the measure haunts the ear, but not the matter. And we care no more for Hiawatha, and are as little concerned for the land of the Ojibbeways, as if America's best admirer had never made a song."—Hartshorne's Mag., Feb. 1856.

But mark afterwards: after an enthusiastic eulogy on Hiawatha in the Oxford and Cambridge Magazine for Jan. 1856, the critic concludes with—

"Henceforth the Ojibway and the Dacotah are to us realities,—men of like passions with ourselves. In our own dear mother-tongue their sweet singer Nawadaha has spoken to us, and the voice has gone direct from his heart to ours."

"Hiawatha may be taken as an accurate representation of Indian manners and superstitions artistically treated and poetically adorned."—Low Spectator

"Mr Longfellow's reputation will, we think, be raised by the Song of Hiawatha: it is by far, in our judgment, the most original of all his productions."—Low Examiner.

"If Mr Longfellow had enriched the literature of his country with nothing save The Song of Hiawatha, he would deserve the poet's bays for this elaborate and most successful attempt to give to that literature a strong individuality, peculiar to the land where the red man once 'hunted the bison and the beaver,' the home of the Indian whose sire the sun was, and the earth his mother."—Home Journal, N. York.

"We think it is the greatest poem. It is the most absorbing work to its length we have ever read."—National Intelligencer, (Washington, D. C.)

The Liverpool Albion remarks that every succeeding effort of Longfellow is better than the last, and that Hiawatha is to be an immortal poem.

"Longfellow is the most accomplished poet of the day. Hiawatha is unquestionably his oldest work . . . Every scene the Indian hero traverses in his allegorical progress is a breathing landscape, every adventure he meets with a capital story. . . . The episode of Hiawatha's Wooing, which we quoted in our last week's number, is one of the finest in the volume. It is a delicious love-story, and would, without the slightest context, make the fortune of any poet. Of the legends themselves that Mr Longfellow has collected, their possible origin, and interest as relating to other mythologies, we have no time to speak. We must content ourselves with an expression of unqualified approval of the manner in which they have been collected, digested, and set to the most exquisite music."—Lon. Illustrated Times.

As regards this "most exquisite music" there are very different opinions:

"Anybody who has read the five thousand and odd verses of Hiawatha has certainly had enough of this epic metre, which very soon becomes as tiresome to the ear as the tune of a barrel-organ."—Low Weekend

"We have often had occasion," says the London Leader, "to remark on the careful study of our recent literature displayed in its criticisms of English authors by the Revue des Deux Mondes. The last number contains an article on Longfellow's Hiawatha, remarkable for subtle insight into the peculiar character of the poem, and genial criticism of its special merits. The writer, M. Emile Montégut, shows a thorough appreciation of the poetic substance and form of Longfellow's Indian legend scarcely to be expected in a foreigner, and least of all in a Frenchman. He pronounces Hiawatha to be the most finished poem Longfellow has produced. Of the metre he says:

"'The melody of the verse, rapid and monotonous, is like the voice of nature, which never fatigues us though continually repeating the same sound. Two or three notes compose the whole music of the poem, melodious and limited as the song of a bird.' Describing the general character of Hiawatha, he says, 'The feeling for nature that pervades the poem is at once most refined and most familiar. The poet knows how to give, as a modern, vulgar to all the imminute objects of nature: he knows the language of the birds, he understands the murmur of the wind amongst the leaves, he interprets the voices of the running streams, and yet, notwithstanding this poetic subtlety, he never turns aside to subjects disagree-tion, nor attempts to prolong, by reflection, the emotion excited. His poem, made with exquisite art, has thus a double character: it is Ilgneric from the precision, simplicity, and familiarity of its images, and modern from the vivacity of its impressions and from the lyrical spirit that breathes in every page.'"

The London Athenæum, after giving copious extracts, remarks:

"The Song of Hiawatha moves throughout in this beautiful and simple measure. Except in good hands, an instrument so artless would most likely fail. The line would tire on the ear. But Mr. Longfellow has contrived to give variety even to a measure evidently chosen for its sad and tender monotone: . . . despite its sameness of cadence, it scarcely palls on the ear even at the five thousandth verse."—Nov. 10, 1855. 1295.

"Unlappily for the poet, this is the very measure to attract the parodist. Punch has opened the assault, and we will not venture to predict how many ghastly voices may echo his good-humoured mockery before the year is out. The jingle of this measure is irresistible, and, with a good vocabulary of any savage language at one's elbow, one feels a pleasing confidence that the strain might spin on forever, and almost make itself."—Blackw. Mag., Feb. 1856.

There have, indeed, we are sorry to say, been many parodies of Hiawatha. We have no patience with a burlesque imitation of an earnest original. Punning has been called (we say not, truly) the lowest kind of wit; but surely he who first said so forgot parodying. There was, indeed, so much true wit, so much hearty appreciation of the merits of the poet and the poem, in Punch's parody, that we could have excused it, had it not been for the baleful effects of its potent example. We cite an instance from a Boston paper of a much more agreeable evidence of the popularity of Hiawatha:

"The beautiful three-decked ship Minnehaha (named from the heroine of Longfellow's charming poem of Hiawatha) was most successfully launched about noon, on Saturday last, from Donald McKay's yard at East Boston. The occasion was one of unusual interest, and attracted a very large concourse of people, who rent the air with their huzzas as the Minnehaha gracefully glided into the 'laughing waters,' that namesake."

As early as Feb. 1s, 1856, —four months after the first publication of Hiawatha,—a German translation by Adolph Böttger, was pub in Leipsic. In April, 1856, another translation into German, by Ferdinand Freiligrath, was in the hands of the European public. The original poem was issued at Leipsic in January, 1856, at half a thaler, by Alphons Dürr, (for vol. xviii. of his Collection of Standard American Authors.) He notes on his title-page that Hiawatha is supplied in Rome, Vienna, Paris, Hamburg, Amsterdam, Brussels, Basle, Turin, Trieste, Venice, and Verona. We quote some other evidences of the popularity of Hiawatha:

"A PLEA FOR HIAWATHA.—Mr. Bright, in his recent speech at Manchester, commenting upon the effect of the war upon all departments of English effort, spoke of its influence upon the tone of English poetry, and contrasted Tennyson's war-lyrics with Longfellow's Hiawatha thus:—Take the poet laureate as an example—[hear, hear]—a gentleman whom I have never seen or met, I believe, but once accidentally—a gentleman of great refinement of manner and of mind, who has written poetry in our language, [hear, hear;] yet such was the pestilent influence of these scenes of carnage on a mind so accomplished and elevated as that, that he puts forth a poem which his friends are anxious should never be spoken of. I have had the opportunity lately of reading a poem from another country, written by the American poet Longfellow—[applause]—a poem which treats of the legends of the Indian tribes, and, while I have turned from the poem of our poet-laureate, in which I find him descending to slang of almost the grossest character, I turn with delight to the exquisite poem which has come to us from the other side of the Atlantic.' [Hear, hear.]"

Cardinal Wiseman some time since prefaced an enthusiastic eulogy on Longfellow (which we shall presently quote for the benefit of our readers) with the remark:

"He was a true philosopher who said, 'Let me make the songs of a nation, and I care not who makes its laws.'"

His Eminence, however, could hardly have foreseen that Longfellow's poetry would ere long be used by a ruler as an instrument to pacify a people for whom the threatenings of the law had but few terrors. We quote the narration which has elicited these remarks:

"AN APT QUOTATION.—The Leecompton (Kansas) Union of the 2d inst. has a pleasant account of a visit recently paid by Acting Governor Stanton to the citizens of Lawrence. After partaking of the hospitalities kindly extended to him by Governor Robinson, he addressed, by request, a crowd of some five hundred free-State men, who did not hesitate to manifest disapprobation at such portions of the speech as did not accord with their peculiar political views. At the close of Mr. Stanton's speech he pictured in glowing language the Indian tradition of Hiawatha, of the 'Peace-Pipe,' 'shaped and fashioned' by 'Gitche Manito, the Mighty,' and by which he 'called the tribes of men together,' and in his own language addressed them:—

"'I have given you lands to hunt in,
I have given you streams to fish in,
I have given you bear and bison,
I have given you roe and reindeer,
I have given you brant and beaver,
Filled the marshes full of wild fowl,
Filled the river full of fishes:
Why, then, are you not contented?
Why, then, will you hunt each other?

"'I am weary of your quarrels,
Weary of your wars and bloodshed,
Weary of your prayers for vengeance,
Of your wranglings and dissensions:
All your strength is in your union,
All your danger is in discord;
Therefore be at peace henceforward,
And, as brothers, live together.'

"The applicability of the quotation (says the Leecompton Union) was felt by the crowd, and involuntary applause burst forth from those who had murmured but a moment before."

We have not been sparing of the quotation of opinions on Hiawatha; but those who desire to pursue the subject still further can refer to the Irish Quarterly Review, Jan. 1856, and to Putnam's (New York) Magazine, Dec. 1855.

Having now concluded the list of the publications of this favorite author, it is proper that we should say a few words respecting the principal editions of his works. A beautiful illustrated collective ed. of Longfellow's Poetical Works was pub. by Carey & Hart in Philadelphia, 1845, 8vo, with engravings by J. Cheney from original pictures by Huntington. Messrs. Ticknor and Fields, of Boston,—so favourably known for their taste in getting up the best productions of American and English authors,—have been for some years Mr. Longfellow's publishers, and issue his works in single vols., or all together in 6 vols.,—three of poetry and three of prose. They have within the last few months (in 1857) given to the world a beautiful edition of his Complete Works,—viz.: POEMS in 2 vols. 32mo. Contents of vol. i.: 1. Voices of the Night; 2. Earlier Poems; 3. Translations; 4. Ballads, and other Poems; 5. Poems on Slavery; 6. The Spanish Student; 7. The Belfry of Bruges, and other Poems; 8. The Seaside and the Fireside. Contents of vol. ii.: 1. Evangeline; 2. The Golden Legend; 3. Hiawatha. PROSE WORKS, 2 vols. 32mo,—viz.: Contents of vol. i: 1. Outre-Mer, a Pilgrimage beyond the Sea; 2. Drift-Wood, a Collection of Essays. Contents of vol. ii.: 1. Hyperion, a Romance; 2. Kavanagh, a Tale. The circulation of this beautiful edition, which is sold at the trifling price of seventy-five cents per vol., will undoubtedly be very large. We recapitulate the figures which we have affixed to the titles of Longfellow's productions.

Total sale in America of Longfellow's Works to April, 1857			325,550

What the sale has been in Europe we have no means of knowing; but, as Longfellow is the most popular poet in America, undoubtedly he enjoys the same pre-eminence in Great Britain. If this assertion amaze the reader, we shall strengthen it a little, and are very safe in affirming that there is no living poet on either side of the water who makes even a distant approach to Longfellow's popularity. Within the last few years the English eds. of his Works have been issued by the following publishers: 1. Bickers; 2. Bogue; 3. Chapman; 4. Clarke; 5. Dickinson; 6. Gilpin; 7. Houlston; 8. Knight & Son; 9. Gall & Inglis; 10. Nelson; 11. Routledge; 12. Simpkin; 13. Slater; 14. Tegg; 15. Theobald; 16. Whittaker; 17. Kent & Richards; 18. Walker. Among the eds. put forth by these publishers deserving of particular notice are: 1. Poetical Works, "containing 34 pieces not in any other illustrated ed.;" illustrated by John Gilbert. 100 plates, with a portrait after Lawrence, 1855, p. 4to, £1 1s.; pub. by Routledge. 2. Poetical Works, illustrated by Birket Foster, and others; last ed., 1856, 8vo, £1 1s.; pub. by Bogue. 3. Poems, with Essay by Gilfillan, (Liverp.) 1850, eq., 5s. 6d.; gilt, 6s. 6d.; mor. extra, 10s.; pub. by Simpkin. 4. Voices of the Night, illustrated by a Lady, 1850, 4to, 10s. 6d.; pub. by Dickinson. 5. Voices of the Night, illustrated, 1852, 8vo, 15s.; pub. by Bogue. 6. Evangeline, illustrated, 1849, p. 8vo; 3d ed., 1852, p. 8vo; 10s 6d.; pub. by Bogue. 7. Evangeline, illustrated by John Gilbert, engravings by Dalziel Brothers, 1856, med. 8vo, 7s. 6d.; pub. by Routledge. 8. Golden Legend, illustrated with 50 engravings, 1855, cr. 8vo, 12s.; mor., 21s.; pub. by Bogue. 9. Song of Hiawatha, illustrated by John Gilbert. 1856, 2s. 6d.; gilt, 3s.; pub. by Routledge. 10. Prose Works,—viz.: I. Outre-Mer; II. Hyperion; III. Kavanagh; new ed., all in 1 vol. sq., 6s.; pub. by Bogue. 11. Hyperion, with illustrations, 1852, sq., 3s. 6d.; pub. by Bogue. 12. Prose Works, by Gilfillan, 1857, 12mo, 4s.; pub. by Bickers. Nor should we omit to notice the beautiful "Christmas Present," pub. by Boosey & Sons, of Holles Street, (1857, 12mo, £1 3s.,) containing Fourteen of Longfellow's Songs, set to Music by Balfe, as introduced at all the principal Concerts of the Season by Miss Dolby, Miss Huddart, Mr. Sims Reeve, and Herr Reichardt. Contents: 1. Two Locks of Hair, Song; 2. The Village Blacksmith, Song; 3 The Rainy Day, Song; 4. Stars of the Summer Night, Serenade; 5. The Arrow and the Song, Song; 6. The Happiest Land, Song; 7. Good-Night, Beloved, Serenade; 8. Annie of Tharaw, Song; 9. The Reaper and the Flowers, Song; 10. This is the Place, Ballad; 11. The Green Trees, Ballad; 12. The Day is Done, Song; 13. Trust her not, Duett; 14. Excelsior, Duett.

The publication of this volume is another evidence of the unbounded popularity of the author in Great Britain.

"Probably there is no author who writes the English language," remarks the correspondent of Moore's Rural New Yorker "so popular in England, at the present time, as Longfellow. His writings are the subject of much criticism in the journals, and are printed in almost every possible form and style. The number of cheap editions is very numerous, and this is a convincing proof of his great popularity. He is read and admired by all classes; and quotations from his poems are frequently made in the pulpit, in journals, and by public speakers."

Grace Greenwood, (Mrs. Sarah J. Lippincott,) in her Haps and Mishaps of a Tour in Europe,

"During this evening Mr. Dickens spoke to me with much interest and admiration of Mrs. Stowe and Mr. Hawthorne. Wherever I go, my national pride is gratified by hearing eloquent tributes to these authors and to the poet Longfellow."

Mary Russell Mitford was one of the most ardent of our poet's admirers, and devoted a chapter to his praise and poetry in her Recollections of a Literary Life.

"I do not know a more readable copy-book," she remarks, "than Professor Longfellow has won by himself in two countries,—written, with a rapidity added [illegible] to our native poets. The terseness of diction and force of thought delight the old, the grace and melody enchant the young, the unaffected and all-pervading piety satisfies the serious, and a certain slight touch of mysticism carries the imaginative reader nearly off his feet. For my own part, I confess not only to the being captivated by all these qualities, (mysticism excepted,) but to the further fact of yielding to the charm of certain lines. I cannot very well tell why, and walking about the house repeating such fragments as this,—

'I give the first watch of the night
To the red planet Mars'—

as if I were still eighteen. I am not sure that this is not as great a proof of the power of the poet as can be given."—American Poet, Chapter VI.

That exquisite poet and intelligent critic, Mr. Moir, (the "Delta" of Blackwood,) at the conclusion of his Sketches of the Poetical Literature of the Past Half Century, (Edin. and Lon., 1851, 12mo,) remarks:

"I should have also liked to have been able to add more strictures on the brother-poets of America, more especially Henry Longfellow and William Cullen Bryant, for both of whom I have a high admiration,—the one being distinguished for the possession of the very element in which our recent verse is so deficient,—imaginative truth,—and the other having preserved, in many of his pictures, the native aboriginal tone which must be rather a render them invaluable."

"The distinguishing qualities of Longfellow seem to be beauty of imagination, delicacy of taste, wide sympathy, and mild earnestness, expressing themselves sometimes in forms of quaint and fantastic fancy, but always in chaste and simple language. . . One of the most pleasing characteristics of this writer's works is their intense humanity. A man's heart beats in his every line. . . He loves, pities, and feels with, as well as for his fellow human mortal. . . . He is a brother, speaking to men as brothers, and as brothers they are responsive to his voice. . . We close our paper with feelings of gratitude and respect for our transatlantic author."—Gilfillan's Second Gallery of Literary Portraits, 2d ed., Edin., 1852, 254-264.

"In golden harmony, mellifluous diction, and erudite polish, Longfellow can successfully compete with our most fastidious poets; and few can surpass him in richness of fancy, imaginative capacity, and elevation of thought. The admiration which his poetry must necessarily elicit from us will be heightened considerably when we reflect that this elegance and exuberance of diction is the issue of beauty is altogether unattended by any poverty of substance, contracted range of thought, tameness in originality of idea or its embodiment. . . . Philosophy, and that generally of the purest and the most hopeful kind, enhances the value of his poetry; his metaphysical ratiocination are so long, human hearts for their soundness and subtlety than for the buoyant spirit which pervades them; and wisdom holds her throne supreme over all his imaginings."—Irish Quar. Rev., June, 1855, 197-206.

"His poems are of an order to which we have none akin. Germany, more than England, has been the source of his inspiration. Our own writers of short poems—Wordsworth, Coleridge, Shelley—have nothing in common with him. He is still further removed from our lyric writers, from Burns to Moore. He writes, like Cowper, with a purpose, and his verses have a liquid flow to which the former can lay no claim."—Lon. Metropolitan.

"We are thankful that the present age is graced by such a poet as Mr. Longfellow, whose extraordinary accomplishment and research, and devotion to his high calling, can hardly be overrated. His productions must always command our deep attention, for in them we are certain to meet with great beauty of thought, and very elegant diction."—Blackwood's Mag., Feb. 1853.

See also Ruskin's Elements of Drawing, Leigh Hunt's letter to the American editor of his Corrected Poetical Works, prefixed to this collection, pub. by Ticknor and Fields, Boston, 1857.

These are certainly high commendations, and, with those previously quoted from foreign sources, must be the more gratifying to the subject of them from the fact that no national partiality can be suspected. Not, indeed, that our American critics are often guilty of indiscriminate laudation of their own countrymen. We are very naturally and very properly awake to the danger of erring in this matter, and are quite as likely to permit caution to incline us to the other extreme. As regards Mr. Longfellow, however, were our critics ever so extravagant in eulogy, it would be difficult for them to surpass the leaders of literary opinion in Europe. We have already quoted many American criticisms on several of our author's works, and feel tempted to adduce several native opinions respecting his general characteristics as a poet; but here—our article having already insensibly lengthened itself until, like the clown in the churchyard, we are afraid to look back—we must force ourselves to be brief.

"Longfellow has a perfect command of that expression which results from suggesting rather than cultivating fancy; and his manner is adapted to his theme. He rarely, if ever mistakes [illegible] for conceptions. He selects with great delicacy and [illegible] suggests the idea. He colours his style with the skill of a painter, and, in compelling words to picture thought, he not only has the warm flush and bright hues of language at his command, but he arrests its evanescent lines. In the higher department of his art—that of so combining his words and images that they make music to the soul as well as to the ear, and convey not only his feelings and thoughts, but also the vagueness and condition of the soul in which they have their being—he has given exquisite examples in Maidenhood and Ladanum. . . Longfellow's verse occupies a position halfway between the poetry of actual life and the poetry of transcendentalism. Like all neutrals, he is liable to attack from the zealots of both parties, but it seems to us that he has hit the exact point beyond which no poet can at present go without being either neglected or ridiculed. He idealizes real life; he elicits new meaning from many of its rough shows, he clothes subtle and delicate thoughts in familiar imagery, he embodies high moral sentiment in beautiful and consoling forms; he interweaves the golden threads of spiritual living into the texture of common existence; he discerns and addresses some of the finest sympathies of the heart: but he rarely soars into those regions of abstract imagination where the bodily eye cannot follow, but where that of the seer is gifted with a 'prevailing vision.'"—E. P. Whipple's Essays and Reviews, vol. [illegible]; Graham, and N. Amer. Rev., Jan. 1841, vol. lviii. 24, 29.

The reader should peruse the whole of this admirable paper or, rather, the whole of the two volumes,—Whipple's Essays and Reviews, Bost., 1851.

"Nothing can exceed the exquisite beauty of some of his smaller pieces, while there also abound in that sadness of expression and imagery with the Romantic sense is supposed to clothe us but more especial attribute. The melody of his versification is very remarkable, some of his stanzas sound with the richest and sweetest music of which language is capable. It is unnecessary to illustrate this remark by quotations the memories of all readers of poetry will naturally retain them. In the range of American poetry, it would not be easy to find one that is so readily remembered, that has sunk so deeply into the hearts of the people, and that so spontaneously rises to the speaker's tongue in the pulpit and the lecture-room."—Prof. C. C. Felton; N. Amer. Rev., July, 1842, lv. 11.

"Almost all Longfellow's poems are gems set with consummate taste. . . His Skeleton in Armor is the most novel and characteristic of his shorter poems, and its Psalm of Life and Excelsior are the most familiar and celebrated. He is the artistic, as Halleck is the lyrical, and Bryant the picturesque and philosophic of American poets."—H. T. Tuckerman; Book of Amer. Lit., 1852.

The reference to the Psalm of Life and Excelsior may remind some of our readers of Mr. Gilfillan's torrid commendation of those poems:

"No poet has more beautifully expressed the depth of his conviction that life is an earnest reality—a something with eternal issues and dependencies; that this earth is no scene of revelry or market of sale, but an arena of contest. This is the [illegible] of his Psalm of Life; then which we have [illegible] finer, in moral tone, since those odes by which the militia [illegible] cheered their march across the wilderness. . . We have just alluded to Excelsior, one of those happy thoughts which seem to drop down, like fire-flies, from some unknown region, which meet instantly the ideal of all minds, and run on afterwards, and forever, in the sun-rent of the human heart. We can now no more conceive of a world without Excelsior than of a world without the Iliad, the Comus, or the Midsummer Night's Dream. It has expressed in the happiest and briefest way what many minds in the age had been trying in vain to express."—Second Gallery of Literary Portraits, 2d ed., Edin., 258, 259.

But to return to our American critics:

"Of all our poets, Longfellow best deserves the title of artist. He has studied the principles of verbal melody, and rendered himself master of the mysterious affinities which exist between sound and sense, word and thought, feeling and expression. This tact in the use of language is probably the chief cause of his success. There is an aptitude, a gracefulness, and vivid beauty, in many of his stanzas, which at once impress the memory and win the ear and heart"—R. W. Griswold: Poets and Poetry of America, 16th ed., Phila., 1855, 355.

"We shall only say that he is the most popular of American poets, and that this popularity may safely be assumed to contain in itself the elements of permanence, since it has been fairly earned, without any of that subservience to the lower tastes of the public which characterizes the quack of letters. His are laurels honourably gained and gently worn. Without comparing him with others, it is enough if we declare our conviction that he has composed poems which will live as long as the language in which they are written." J. Russell Lowell: N. Amer. Rev., 69, 215.

"The secret of his popularity as a poet is probably that of all similar popularity,—namely, the fact that his poetry expresses a universal sentiment in the simplest and most melodious manner. Each of his most noted poems is the song of a feeling common to every mind in moods into which every mind is liable to fall. Thus, a Psalm of Life, Footsteps of Angels, To the River Charles, Excelsior, The Bridge, The Gleam of Sunshine, The Day is Done, The Old Clock on the Stairs, The Arrow and the Song, The Fire of Drift-wood, Twilight, The Open Window, are all most adequate and inexpressibly delicate renderings of quite universal emotions. There is a humanity in them which is irresistible in the fit measure to which they are wedded. If some elegiac poets have strung rosaries of tears, there is a weakness of woe in their verses which repels; but the quiet, pensive thought,—the twilight of the mind, in which the little facts of life are saddened in view of their relation to the eternal laws, time and change,—this is the meditative and mourning of every manly heart, and this is the alluring and permanent charm of Longfellow's poetry." George William Curtis: Sketch of Longfellow, in Homes of American Authors, N. York, 1853, 282–283.

But we must not conclude without giving the promised quotation respecting Longfellow, from Cardinal Wiseman's Lecture on the Home Education of the Poor. Thus it runs:

"There is no greater lack in English literature than that of a poet of the people,—of one who shall be to the labouring-classes of England what Goethe is to the peasant of Germany. He was a true philosopher who said: 'Let me make the songs of a nation, and I care not who makes its laws.' There is one writer who approaches nearer than any other to this standard; and he has already gained such a hold on our hearts that it is almost unnecessary for me to mention his name. Our hemisphere cannot claim the honour of having brought him forth; but still he belongs to us, for his works have become as household words wherever the English language is spoken. And, whether we are charmed by his imagery, or soothed by his melodious versification, or elevated by the high moral teachings of his pure muse, or follow with sympathising hearts the wanderings of Evangeline, I am sure that all who hear my voice will join with me in the tribute I desire to pay to the genius of Longfellow."

Thus have we seen the poet's praise chanted alike by stern reviewer and gentle lady, by lowly critic and lordly prelate. But, as we cast a glance at the table where our books are piled in "learned confusion" around us, we are silently reminded that our pleasing task is not yet finished. The poet's bays are entitled to another wreath, and we shall not withhold it. It was promised by the wisest of men that he who was "diligent in his business" should "stand before kings;" and—laborious in the great duty of accumulating and distributing knowledge, laborious in the cause of humanity, of freedom, and of truth—the poet, scholar, and philanthropist of Cambridge has not failed of this reward also.

In 1855 the Rev. J. C. Fletcher took a number of specimens of American literature, art, and manufactures to the capital of Brazil, where he was permitted to exhibit them in the National Museum. They were first visited by the Emperor Dom Pedro II., whose knowledge of literature is as remarkable as his attainments in science. In the work entitled Brazil and the Brazilians, (by Rev. Messrs. Kidder and Fletcher,) Mr. F. gives an account of his majesty's visit; and to this narration (furnished us by Mr. Fletcher in advance of the publication of his volume) it is owing that to the many golden opinions of Mr. Longfellow already recorded we are able to add that of the monarch of Brazil:

"He [Dom Pedro II.] approached the table where were the books presented by Parry & McMillan. He opened the Homes of the American Authors, and surprised me by his knowledge of our literature. He made remarks on Irving, Cooper, and Prescott, showing an intimate acquaintance with each. His eye falling upon the name of Longfellow, he asked me, in great haste and eagerness, 'Monsieur Fletcher, avez vous les poèmes de M. Longfellow?' It was the first time that I ever saw in Dom Pedro II. an enthusiasm which in its earnestness and simplicity resembled the warmth of childhood when about to possess itself of some long-cherished object. I replied, 'I believe not, your majesty.' 'Oh,' said he, 'I am exceedingly sorry, for I have sought in every bookstore of Rio de Janeiro for Longfellow, and I cannot find him. I have a number of beautiful morceaux from him, but I wish the whole work. I admire him so much.' Mr. Fletcher afterward presented him with the Poets and Poetry of America, informing the emperor that it contained some choice selections from the American poet whom he so much admired, and whom he called 'my Longfellow.' Afterward, at the palace of S. Christopher, when Mr. F. took leave of the emperor, the latter said to him, 'When you return to your country, have the kindness to say to Mr. Longfellow how much pleasure he has given me, and be pleased to tell him combien je l'estime, combien je l'aime.'"

Longfellow, Stephen, LL.D., 1776-1849, father of the two preceding, a native of Gorham, Massachusetts, graduated at Harvard University in 1798, became an eminent lawyer, was a member of the National Congress, and filled several other public posts with credit to himself and advantage to his constituents. He resided principally at Portland, Maine, and died in that city, which he had long faithfully served. A number of his legal arguments will be found in the Massachusetts and the Maine Reports. He was noted for his copious stores of knowledge, and the agreeable manner in which he imparted the results of his investigations to his hearers. See Judge Story's Life and Letters.

"In all the relations of private and public life, Mr. Longfellow was a model man: kind and affectionate in his family, prompt and efficient in business, courteous uniformly, ready with money or service, whenever properly required, and filling large places in benevolent and religious institutions, his death was deeply mourned, and the people grieved most of all that they should see his face no more.

"A life so adorned could not have been withdrawn from its sphere of usefulness without making a palpable void; and I only express the universal sentiment that was felt at his departure, that an able, upright, and Christian gentleman had gone,—one to whom may be applied language used in regard to an eminent English lawyer, 'that he cast honour upon his honourable profession, and sought dignity, not from the ermine or the mace, but from a straight path and a spotless life.'"—Willis's Address before the Maine Historical Society, March 5, 1857; containing Biographical Notices of the Former Presidents of the Society, 24–28, Portland, 1857, pp. 54.

This valuable work—which the collector of American history must secure—was drawn up from the accounts furnished by Gotthelb Spangenburg and David Zeisburger, forty years missionaries among the N. A. Indians. The Delawares, Lenni Lenape, Iroquois, Shawanese, and Hurons, of Penna. and Western New York, are the principal dramatis personæ in this aboriginal drama.

Lossing, Benson J., son of a farmer, b. Feb. 12, 1813, at Beekman, Dutchess co., New York. From 1835 to 1841 he was the joint editor and proprietor of the Poughkeepsie Telegraph; and from 1836 to 1839 he was sole editor of the Poughkeepsie Casket, a literary paper, illustrated by his own pencil. In 1838 he removed to New York City, since which time his pen, pencil, and graver have been most industriously employed, as may be seen by the following works: 1. Outline History of the Fine Arts, N. York, 1840, 18mo, pp. 330, (being No. 103 of Harper's Family Library.) 2. Seventeen Hundred and Seventy-Six; or, the War for Independence, pp. 510, 8vo. 3. In July, 1848, he started on a series of journeys extending over nine thousand miles to collect material for the (7.) Pictorial Field-Book of the Revolution; or, Illustrations, by Pen and Pencil, of the History, Biography, Scenery, Relics, and Traditions of the War of Independence. Although actually engaged upon the work only about twenty months all together, as the demands of regular business would allow, its publication was not completed till December, 1852, 2 vols. imp. 8vo, pp. 1500, Illustrated by 1100 engravings, chiefly from the pencil of the author. The remainder of the first edition was destroyed by fire in 1853. A new and revised edition was published in 1855, 2 vols. 8vo.

Loudon, Miss Agnes, only daughter of John Claudius Loudon and Jane Webb Loudon, commenced authorship at a very early age, her tale of The Lost Gloves having made its appearance in Chambers's Edinburgh Journal before the writer had numbered eleven years. She has since contributed a number of papers to the English periodicals, and given to the world the two following volumes: 1. Tales for Young People, Lon., 1847; new ed., sq. 2. Tales of School Life, 1849, sq.; 2d ed., 1851, sq.

Loudon, Mrs. Jane Webb, the daughter of Thomas Webb, Esq., of Ritwell House, near Birmingham, England, commenced her literary career in 1827 by the publication of a novel of more than ordinary interest, entitled The Mummy, (1827, 3 vols. 8vo;) but, after her marriage in 1830 to Mr. John Claudius Loudon, she turned her literary talents into the field of research so successfully and assiduously cultivated by her husband. This gentleman had been greatly pleased with the sagacity evinced in some scientific predictions in The Mummy, sought an introduction to the author, and in due time made her Mrs. Loudon. Mrs. Loudon's publications are as follows: 1. The Lady's Flower-Garden of Ornamental Plants, Lon., 1840–44, 5 vols. 4to. 2. Gardening for Ladies, 1840, fp. 8vo; 8th ed., 1851, 12mo.

Mrs. Loudon edited, in 1850, The Lady's Companion at Home and Abroad, which was discontinued after the publication of one vol., in consequence of the failure of her health. She has also edited, since her husband's death, several of his works, among which are the new edits. of The Encyclopedia of Gardening, 1850, 8vo; the new ed. of the Encyc. of Cottage, Farm, and Villa Architecture, 1846, 8vo; and a new ed. of the Vade Gardener, 1846, 8vo. The new edit., 18–, 8vo, of his Encyclopedia of Plants, and the Second Addit. Supplement, 1840 [illegible] 1855, 8vo, were published on 6 Dec. under her direction, assisted by David Wooster, who was a valuable assistant to Mr. Loudon in the preparation of several of his works, and wrote the memoir of his life and writings prefixed to his Self-Instructor in 1845. In addition to the works above enumerated, she has published a number of novels, tales, and children's books, and edited Peter Parley's Tales about Plants, 1839, 16mo. A notice of her Philanthropic Economy will be found in the Westminster Review, xxxvi. 1. In 1846, Mrs. Loudon was complimented by the grant of an annual pension on the Civil List of £100 per annum.

Loudon, John Claudius, 1783–1843, a landscape-gardener, and one of the most useful writers of the age, a native of Cambuslang, Lanarkshire, removed in 1803 to England, where he resided during the rest of his life. In 1813, and again in 1819, he visited the Continent for the purpose of extending the sphere of his professional observations. He was a man of extensive information, untiring energy, and great benevolence of heart. 1. Observations on Laying out Public Squares, 1803. 2. Observations on Plantations, 1804, 8vo. 3. All who have any interest in cemeteries should carefully consult this work. 31. Self-Improvement for Young Gardeners, &c.; with a Portrait, and Memoir of the Author by Mrs. Loudon, 1845, 8vo, 7s. 6d.

"This work was left unfinished, though he dictated a portion of it only a few hours before he died. He was never confined to his bed, and died standing, only a few moments after he had expressed to his wife his fear that he should never live to finish his Self Instruction. She perceived his countenance to change as he spoke, and she had only time to clasp her arms round him to save him from falling, when his head sank on her shoulder, and he expired."—Mrs. Loudon.

Self-Instruction consists of "A collection of plain and practical treatises, linked together by their connection with horticultural and agricultural pursuits. . . . To superior gardeners, foresters, land-stewards, bailiffs, and farmers, it supplies a mass of sound instruction which can nowhere else be found combined in the same space or given in so lucid a style."—Britannia.

To the above list must be added the following periodicals, edited and partly written by Mr. Loudon: 32. The Gardener's Magazine, 8vo. First Series, 1826–34, 10 vols., £9 2s. Second Series, 1835–43, 9 vols., £8 19s.

"The first periodical devoted exclusively to horticulture. That this work met the wants of a large class of readers is evident from four thousand copies of the first number having been sold in four days."—Mrs. Loudon.

"To all our readers who are fond of gardening or country-affairs we recommend this work, as one from which they will derive both entertainment and instruction."—Lon. Lit. Gazette.

"The Gardener's Magazine should be perused by every gardener and by every country gentleman"—Lon. Times, Feb. 7. 1839.

33. The Magazine of Natural History, 1829–36, 9 vols. 8vo, £10. To these works the purchaser should add Charlesworth's Magazine of Natural History, 1837–40, 4 vols. 8vo, £5 5s., where will be found original papers by Lyell, Mantell, Westwood, Yarrell, Hope, &c. Let him also procure the Annals of Natural History, 1838, &c.: see Hooker, Sir William Jackson, K.H., D.C.L., under No. 30. 34. The Architectural Magazine, 1834–39, 5 vols., £6 6s.

"We strongly recommend the Architectural Magazine as pregnant with interest and instruction, both to the architect and the general reader."—Lon. Times, Feb 2, 1839.

Mr. Loudon also contributed papers to the Encyclopædia Britannica, and to Brande's Dictionary of Science. His devotion to his books was so absorbing that in early life he was in the habit for several years of sitting up two whole nights in every week to gain time for study,—drinking strong tea to keep himself awake. Throughout life, indeed, unconquerable energy triumphed over ill-health, pecuniary embarrassment, and repeated discouragement.

"Considering the very delicate state of his health, it is astonishing he should have been able to produce so many elaborate productions."—M'Culloch's Lit. of Polit. Econ., 1845, 219

Lovelace, Richard, 1618–1658, son of Sir William Lovelace, of Woolwich, Kent, embraced the royal cause, and subsequently formed a regiment for the service of the French king, and was wounded at Dunkirk. In 1648 he returned to England, and was imprisoned until after the king's death. Wood tells us that when at Gloucester Hall, Oxford, he was "accounted the most amiable and beautiful person that eye ever beheld;" but he was a victim to the political troubles of the day, "became very poor in body and purse, was the object of charity, went in ragged clothes, and mostly lodged in obscure and dirty places." "All Mr. Lover's wit and humour and purely natural pathos are here brought into full play."—Lon. Month Review.

Mr. Lover is also the author of several dramas and operettas. Among the best known of these are Rory O'Moore, The White Horse of the Peppers, and The Happy Man. Of his songs, The Angels' Whisper, Rory O'More, and Molly Bawn have perhaps the most admirers. In 1844, he appeared before the public in a series of entertainments, which were styled by him Irish Evenings, in which he played his own music, told his own stories, and sung his own songs. The mélange proved attractive to the public and profitable to Mr Lover, both in Great Britain and in the United States. He arrived in America in the spring of 1846, and entertained large and delighted audiences from New York to New Orleans. He resumed his Irish Evenings in 1848, after his return to England.

"For, painter, dramatist, he has won sufficient celebrity to make the fame of three different men, which we trust, like the shamrock of his own native land, may long continue to be THIS INDIVISIBLE ONE."—Dubl. Univ. Mag., xxvi. 211

Lowell, Charles, D.D., a son of Judge John Lowell, and father of James Russell Lowell the poet, born in Boston, August 15, 1782, graduated at Harvard College, 1800, matriculated at the University of Edinburgh, and studied Divinity under Hunter and Moral Philosophy under Dugald Stewart, 1802, was ordained over West Church in Boston, 1806, Jan. 1. Has been a fellow of the Corporation and Board of Overseers of Harvard College, a member of several literary societies in the United States and Europe. Author of about twenty published Discourses, chiefly on public occasions; of a volume of Occasional Sermons, 1858, and a volume of Practical Sermons, 1856; of Meditations for the Afflicted, Sick, and Dying: Devotional Exercises for Communicants,—i.e. of four volumes, and has contributed to periodicals.

Lowell, J. A Review of Hay's Treat. on Expatriation, Bost., 1814, 8vo.

Lowell, James Russell, b Feb. 22, 1819, at Cambridge, Massachusetts, graduated at Harvard College, 1838, is a son of the Rev. Charles Lowell, D.D., pastor of the West Church, Boston, and a descendant of Percival Lowell, who emigrated from Bristol England, settled in Newbury, Massachusetts in 1639, and died there in 1665. On leaving college, the subject of our notice determined to embrace the profession of the law, and after the usual preliminary studies was admitted to the Bar, but the love of letters proved itself to be too deeply rooted in the heart of the young attorney to be summarily banished, and, as the Law is proverbially a "jealous mistress" the engagement, perhaps rather hastily made, was as hastily surrendered, and poetical lucubrations succeeded to prosaic briefs. In 1855, Mr. Lowell succeeded Mr Longfellow the post in the Belles-Lettres Professorship in Harvard College, and entered upon the duties of this responsible position after spending some months in Europe. See LOWELL, MRS. MARIA WHITE. His publications have been as follows:

1. A POEM RECITED AT CAMBRIDGE Camb 1839 2 4 YEAR'S LIFE, Bost, 1841, 1omo, pp viii 182 This is a volume of poems.

Mr Lowell has more of the 'vision' than the 'faculty divine' He has the eye and mind of a poet but wants the plastic touch which turns to shape the forms of things unknown. His conceptions are superior to his power of execution. We were reminded in reading his poetry of the observation of a painter on a kindred sister art—that the picture would have been better painted if the painter had taken more pains. In this volume there is much of the ore of poetry but little of it in a portable and available shape. We have found it much certainly that is worth the trouble. The author has scattered himself and his talents too much. His poems are made up of too many parts. His thoughts are too elaborate and his fancy fruitful in fine images. We are [illegible] with the purity and elevation of feeling. Many of his lines which, dying, he could wish to live. In addition to the form and grace of versification there is a great deal to [illegible] and much pleasure with these fashionable [illegible] which familiarizes us with glimmerings of meaning [illegible] with full revelation of it. 3. POEMS, Camb., Mass 1844 12mo pp 200 Feb 1844, fp. 8vo This Second Series contains 'A Legend of Brittany, Prometheus Miscellaneous Poems, and Sonnets.

"We recognise in his later poems a firmer and bolder tone of thought a better [illegible] and a growth in [illegible] greatly improved. We feel that he is now in possession of his fine powers and an artist in the use of them is coming on. Mr Lowell's poems want compression. In the middle of a stanza the sharp needle pressing out. I miss here a little of thought and expression in the principal fault with which we think the public will be disposed to find with them. [illegible] Mr Lowell's poetical style in general the present volume has given us pleasure, and it is but that it is by any means free from defects. But it does the minds of a clear vigorous and pure [illegible] expression [illegible] the marks of a profound study of the English language in the best authors."—Prof C C. After reading the Conversations, the student of English literature should not fail to peruse Mr Lowell's Essays on the English song Writers, pub in 'The Pioneer, a Literary and Critical Magazine (conducted by Mr. Lowell and Mr. Robert Carter, issued at Boston, January, February, and March. 1843, all that appeared.)

"Among the very best of his writings. . They show a deep appreciation of the poetical merit of these authors and a firmness of critical test quite unusual in the literature of the magazines" —Prof. C. C. FELTON: N Amer. Rev, 1845, 283

5. POEMS, Camb., Mass., 1848, 12mo, pp. 144. Among the poems in this Third Series (it has been incorrectly termed the Second Series) are The Present Crisis, The Summer Storm, Above and Below, Extreme Unction, The Pine Tree, The Birch Tree The Changeling, To the Dandelion, and An Indian Summer Reverie. Lowell's Complete Poetical Works, revised, with addits, were pub at Bost, 1858, 2 vols, 1omo, (4 edits. 1 and 2 edits., with an Introduction by A R Scobie, have appeared in London, 1852, 1omo, 1854, 18mo

'The successive publications of Mr Lowell show a marked progress and encourage us to hope for a rich harvest when the soil shall be quite subdued to the utmost and the fruit has been allowed to reach its full maturity. . . He will see symptoms of us for thinking that he has not yet attained his perfect stature, and that even his latest productions fall quite short of what he is able to accomplish. The swift movements of Mr Lowell's verses and the daring energy of his conceptions show that his genius is not the forced growth of poetry. He is master, indeed, of all the charms of the lyre and strikes them with a bold, decisive hand till they ring out in full but harmonious concert.

'The descriptive power shown in many of these pieces is one of their most striking merits. The poet ever catches even in the most minute traits of nature its true and the most rapidly fleeting [illegible] and puts them in verse with startling distinctness. We [illegible] that Mr Lowell possesses extraordinary powers as a poet and has arrived at the first stage of [illegible] He has [illegible] work no longer falling behind his best and [illegible] Many of the pieces in the volume will appear to high advantage when it no longer belongs to the [illegible] of the day.'—Prof Torrey N Amer Rev [illegible] 472 478, 482.

"They were received with merited favour, from their droll and felicitous portraiture of the Yankee character and dialect, and their successful hits at our national passion for military glory. Political opponents, as well as friends, laughed loud and long at the difficulties Sawin's Letters, describing his experience in the wars, and the mishaps that he encountered before he could make his way home again. We must quote a portion of his first letter from Mexico, though the phraseology may appear abstruse to some of our readers who are not familiar with New England forms of speech. . . . This is very fair fun. The rhymes are as startling and felicitous as any in Hudibras, and the quaint drollery of the illustrations is in admirable keeping with the whole character of the forlorn recruit from Massachusetts. Of the almost numberless imitations of the Yankee dialect this is decidedly the best that we have seen. Sam Slick is a mere pretender in comparison. [See HALIBURTON, JUDGE THOMAS C., p. 790.] . . . We cannot say much for the copious prose commentary, the prefatory and illustrative matter, in which the Biglow rhymes in this edition are embedded. Most of Parson Wilbur's lengthy annotations are as heady as his own sermons, from which, indeed, a large part of them profess to have been borrowed."—PROF. FRANCIS BOWEN: N. Amer. Rev., lxviii. 187, 188, 190.

"Mr. Lowell has shown that he is a wit and humorist, in the publication of his Biglow Papers. He is the only American who has attempted to laugh down the oppressors of the slave,—the propagandists of slavery. Some of the Biglow poems are capital specimens of Yankee wit and humour."—Bartlett's Modern Agitators. N. York, 1856, 310.

"His Biglow Papers abound in sly strokes of mirth that would make a stoic shake his sides with laughter. He is the Hudibras of America; and woe betide the unfortunate wight at whom he pokes his fun! for, while it is spent to him, it is death to the subject of his sarcasm."—Bungay's Off-Hand Takings, Crayon Sketches of the Noticeable Men of our Age. 1854, 336.

"He is the first of our poets who has succeeded in making our harsh and uncouth Yankee dialect subservient to the uses of poetry; this he has done with entire success in that admirable piece of humorous satire, The Biglow Papers. No productions of a similar character in this country were ever half so popular as the pithy verses of Hosea Biglow, in spite of their being so strongly imbued with a trenchant spirit of opposition to the popular political views of the multitude."—Homes of American Authors: James Russell Lowell, 1853, 362, 363.

The critic in Fraser's Magazine for July, 1850, is an enthusiastic admirer both of the Fable for Critics (as we have seen) and of the Biglow Papers:

"Within the last three years there has arisen in the United States a satirist of genuine excellence, who however, besides but moderately appreciated by his countrymen, seems himself in a great measure to have mistaken his real forte."

That is, he would have Mr. Lowell to renounce all sentimental and imaginative poetry, and henceforth confine himself to laughing at the follies and ridiculing the foibles of his fellow men.

Another notice of the Biglow Papers (by D March) occurs in the New Englander, vii. 63. See also Reviews of Mr. Lowell's Poems in The South. Lit. Mess., vii. 383; Brownson's Quar. Rev., 2d Ser., iv. 271; Bost. Chris. Exam., xxxvi. 173, xlv. 509, (by W. A. Davies); Democrat. Rev., xvii. 147; Bost. Liv. Age, iii. 161, (from the Lon. Inquirer.) An interesting biographical sketch of Mr. Lowell will be found in The Homes of American Authors, from which article we have already quoted a few lines, and will gratify the reader with a few more:

"Lowell is generally looked upon as a serious poet, and, indeed, no one has a better claim to be so regarded, for seriousness is one of the first essentials of all genuine poetry. But seriousness is not necessarily sadness. Much of his poetry overflows with manthful and jocund feelings and in his most pungent satire there is a constant bubbling up of a genial and loving nature the brilliant flashes of his wit are softened by an evident gentleness of motive . . . Lowell's prose-writings are as remarkable as his poetry: the copiousness of his illustrations, the richness of his imagery, the easy flow of his sentences, the keenness of his wit, and the force and clearness of his reasoning, give to his reviews and essays a fascinating charm that would place him in the front rank of our prose-writers, if he did not occupy a similar position among our poets."—302, 305.

His reviews and essays have appeared in the North American Review, Southern Literary Messenger, Knickerbocker, Democratic Review, Graham's Magazine, Putnam's Magazine, Boston Miscellany, and the National Anti-Slavery Standard. Nor should we omit to notice his edits. of the poems of Marvell, Donne, Keats, Wordsworth, and Shelley, pub. in Messrs. Little, Brown & Co.'s series of the British Poets.

One of the most accomplished of American critics remarks that Lowell

"Unites, in his most effective power, the dreamy, suggestive character of the transcendental bards with the philosophic simplicity of Wordsworth. He has written clever satires, good sonnets, and some long poems with fine descriptive passages. He reminds us often of Tennyson in the sentiment and the construction of his verse. Imagination and philanthropy are the dominant elements in his writings,—some of which are marked by a graceful flow and earnest tone, and many unite with these attractions that of high finish."—H. T. TUCKERMAN: Sketch of Amer. Lit., 1852.

Nor has Mr. Lowell failed of commendation abroad. The Italian correspondent of the London Critic ventures the assertion that the "American poet Lowell's powers of thought and expression will surely be recognised for ages to come;" and a highly-eulogistic review of his poetical writings (ed. Lon., 1853, 18mo) will be found in the Irish Quarterly Review for September, 1855; and see also Lon. Athen., 1853, 315.

Since the above was written, Mr. Lowell was married (in 1857) to Miss Frances Dunlap, niece of Ex-Governor Dunlap, of Portland, Maine.

Lowell, John, d. 1767, aged 63, minister of Newburyport, Massachusetts, and great-grandfather of the preceding, pub. a Serm. at the ordination of T. Barnard, 1738; a Serm. before Col. Titcomb and his soldiers, 1755; a Serm. on the death of Col. Moses Titcomb, who fell near Lake George, 1760. See Tucker's Funeral Sermons.; Allen's Amer Biog. Dict.; Sprague's Annals.

Lowell, Judge John, LL.D., 1743–1802, a native of Newburyport, Mass., son of the preceding, and grandfather of James Russell Lowell the poet, was the author of an English poem (No. 3) in the Pietas et Gratulatio, 1761, 4to, and of an Eulogy (Jan. 1791) on James Bowdoin, prefixed to vol. ii. of the Memoirs of the Amer. Acad. of Arts and Sciences, and also pub. in a separate form. He was a member of the Convention which framed the Constitution of Massachusetts, and introduced the clause in the Bill of Rights which effected the abolition of slavery in Massachusetts. He was appointed by Washington the first Judge of the U. States District Court, and at his death was Chief-Justice of the Circuit Court of the U. States. His letters to John Adams, and letters from Samuel and John Adams to him, are now in course of publication in the Historical Magazine, pub. in Boston: see vol. i. No. 9, &c.

"The memory of Judge Lowell, I am confident, is respectfully cherished by many persons whom I have now the honour to address. He was among those who enjoyed the public trust and confidence in the times when tried men's souls, and bore his part in the greatest work recorded in the annals of constitutional liberty,—the American Revolution."—HON. EDWARD EVERETT: John Lowell, Jun. Founder of the Lowell Institute: Everett's Orations and Speeches, 1853, i. 384.

Lowell, John, LL.D., 1769–1840, son of the preceding, uncle of James Russell Lowell the poet, and of John Lowell, the founder of the Lowell Institute, (Boston, 1839,) was the author of many pamphlets and numerous papers in periodicals on politics, theology, agriculture, &c., under the signatures of The Roxbury Farmer, The Yankee Farmer, The New England Farmer, The Boston Rebel, &c. He was a zealous and powerful advocate of the doctrines of the Federal School. See Dr. F. W. P. Greenwood's Serm. on the Death of John Lowell, LL.D., March 22, 1840, Bost., 1840, 8vo, pp. 36; a review of this Sermon in N. Amer. Rev., li. 243–248; Rich's Bibl. Amer. Nova, ii. 61, 68; Lon. Quar. Rev., viii. 193–214. The article last referred to is a review of the well-known pamphlet on "Mr. Madison's War," Bost., 1812.

"We consider his pamphlet as a production of no ordinary cast: it is evidently the offspring of a powerful mind accustomed to think deeply and reason soundly."—Ubi supra.

The reviewer of Dr. Greenwood's Sermon on the death of Mr. Lowell remarks:

"Rarely is so beautiful a tribute paid to departed worth. Most rarely does distinguished worth appear such as to justify such a tribute."—N. Amer. Rev., li. 247.

"Mr. Lowell entered with earnestness into the discussion of these questions in the public journals, and after the decease of Mr. Ames, in 1808, possessed a greater ascendency than any other person in New England over the minds of those who were opposed to the national administration. He was, however, as a political writer, not more intrepid and uncompromising than he was fair and honourable."—HON. EDWARD EVERETT: John Lowell, Jun. Founder of the Lowell Institute: Everett's Orations and Speeches, 1853, ii. 419, n.

Lowell, John, of the Suffolk Bar, editor of the Law Reporter, pub. at Boston, Mass., and author of legal treatises, &c.

Lowell, Maria White, 1821–1853, formerly Miss White, of Watertown, Massachusetts, the author of many excellent translations from the German and of original poems of more than ordinary merit, was married in 1844 to James Russell Lowell the poet. The death of this accomplished woman elicited one of the most exquisite effusions of modern days.—Longfellow's Two Angels, published in Putnam's Magazine, (New York,) April, 1854:

"Two angels, one of Life and one of Death,
Passed o'er the house at midnight with equal pace,
And each was clothed in vesture white and fair.
From the first robe the light shone out so bright
That all the house was filled with radiance strange,
And every one who saw it smiled in sleep.
But from the other issued such a cold
That all who felt it dreamed of dreary fields
Blighted by autumn, and shook in every limb.

"Then fell upon the house a sudden gloom,
A shadow on those features fair and dear,
And softly, from that hush'd and darken'd room,
Two angels issued, where but one went in."

The theme—alas!—is a common one, and will be common, so long as genius mourns for the gifted dead and sympathizes with the living; but we doubt whether in the whole range of English exequial poetry there can be found any thing more beautiful than Longfellow's lament for Maria Lowell.

Mrs. Lowell's eminent merits had elicited ardent eulogiums during her lifetime:

"In 1844, she was married to James Russell Lowell, and for her genius, taste, and many admirable qualities, she is worthy to be the wife of that fine poet and true-hearted man. She has published several elegant translations from the German, and a large number of original poems of the imagination, some of which illustrate questions of morals and humanity."—R. W. GRISWOLD: The Female Poets of America, 2d ed., 1853, 380.

"There is great tenderness of feeling and simplicity in all the productions of her pen, and her household hymns are full of pathos and beauty."—MRS. S. J. HALE: Woman's Record, 1853, 532.

"Her poetry, of which she has published but too little, is remarkable for pure beauty of thought, clothed in the richest yet simplest mantle of expression."—T. BUCHANAN READ: The Female Poets of America, 6th ed., 1855, 374.

Lowman, Moses, 1680-1752, a learned Dissenting divine, a native of London, entered as a student in the Middle Temple, 1697, subsequently studied divinity at Utrecht and Leyden, and in 1710 became minister at Clapham, where he continued until his death. His principal works are—1. The Argument from Prophecy in Proof that Jesus is the Messiah, vindicated, &c., Lon., 1733, 8vo. Written against Anthony Collins's Discourse on the Grounds and Reasons of the Christian Religion 1724, 8vo. Dr. Leland calls Lowman's Argument "a valuable book." 2. A Paraphrase and Notes on the Revelation of St. John, Lon., 1737, '45, 4to; 1791; 1807, 8vo. This work forms the concluding portion of the modern collective eds. of the Commentaries of Patrick, Lowth, Whitby, and Arnald; see ARNALD, RICHARD; LOWTH, WILLIAM, D.D.; PATRICK, SYMON; WHITBY, DANIEL, D.D.

"I can with pleasure refer my reader to the learned Commentary by Mr. Lowman, from which I have received more satisfaction with respect to many of its difficulties than ever I found elsewhere or expected to find at all."—DR. DODDRIDGE: Works, vol. ii., Leeds ed., p. 87.

"Bishops Ward, Halifax, Clayton, and others, have written with ability upon these abstruse parts of sacred writ. Drs. Apthorp, Mackenzie, and Brown have thrown pretty much light upon them; but of all who have treated upon the book of Revelation none seem to me to have excelled Lowman."—REV. DAVID SIMPSON.

See his Key to the Prophecies, p. 582.

"This is a respectable work of the same class with Locke, Benson, and Pierce, to whose doctrinal sentiments the author was inclined. The notes are few, and not very profound."—Orme's Bibl. Bib.

"Lowman labours chiefly to ascertain the fulfilment of the Prophecy, in a number of interesting historic facts."—WILLIAMS.

Bishop Tomline includes Lowman's work on the Revelation in his list of books for clergymen and Biblical students.

3. Dissert. on the Civil Government of the Hebrews, 1740, '45, 1816, 8vo. 4. Rationale of the Ritual of the Hebrew Worship, 1748, 1816, 8vo.

Lowndes, William Thomas, d. 1843, a bookseller of London, will ever be held in honourable remembrance by bibliographers for two invaluable works compiled by him,—viz.: 1. The Bibliographer's Manual of English Literature, containing an account of Rare, Curious, and useful Books published in, or relating to, Great Britain and Ireland, from the Invention of Printing; with Bibliographical and Critical Notices, Collations of the Rarer Articles, and the Prices at which they have been sold in the Present Century, Lon., 1834, 4 vols. 8vo, pp. xix. 2. 4 [illegible] columns, £4 4s., large paper, £8 10s. This excellent work—of course, not without errors, but with less than from the comprehensive character of the undertaking might have been reasonably anticipated—should be in every library of any pretensions. It meets with a ready sale at about £3 to £6. 2. The British Librarian; or, Book-Collector's Guide to the Formation of a Library in all Branches of Literature, Science, and Art, arranged in Classes, with Prices, Critical Notes, References, and an Index of Authors and Subjects, 1839, Parts 1-11, 8vo, all published. Mr. Lowndes, while engaged in the preparation of this work, was attacked by mental derangement, produced by pecuniary embarrassment, and did not live to resume his labours. The eleven Parts which were published contain 1320 columns of most valuable matter, unfortunately almost useless for want of an index. To both of these works we have been largely indebted in the preparation of this Dictionary. Cheap edits. of the Bibliographer's Manual and the British Librarian (completed) we doubt not would meet with liberal encouragement.

Lowrie, Rev. Walter Macon, 1819-1847, the excellent son of the Hon. Walter Lowrie, for many years a member of the Congress of the United States, was a native of Butler, Pennsylvania, graduated at Jefferson College, Canonsburg, in 1837, studied theology at the Theological Seminary of Princeton, New Jersey; was ordained November, 1841; sailed to China, to join the Presbyterian Mission there, Jan. 19, 1842, and died August 19, 1847, having been thrown into the sea by pirates, when about twelve miles' sail from Chapoo. A memoir of this devoted Christian, edited by his father, was pub., N. York, 1849, 8vo, pp viii., 500. Phila., 1851, 12mo, pp 405; 1855, 12mo. This vol. is chiefly composed of Mr. Lowrie's letters, and should be attentively perused by all who are interested in the important subject of Christian missions. Mr Lowrie was the author of—1. Letters addressed to Sabbath-School Children, N. York, 18mo. 2. The Land of Sinim; or, An Exposition of Isaiah xlix. 12, Phila., 1846, 18mo. 3. Sermons, preached in China, 1851, 8vo. See N. Lowth, Robert, D.D., 1710-1787, a native of Winchester, the son of William Lowth, D.D., (post,) was educated at Winchester School, and at New College, Oxford, (elected 1730,) succeeded Spence in the Professorship of Poetry, 1741, Preb. of Durham and Rector of Sedgefield, 1753, Bishop of St. David's, 1766; trans. to Oxford in the same year, and to London, 1777, declined the Archbishopric of Canterbury, 1783. His principal publications are the following: 1. Prælectiones de Sacra Poesi Hebræorum, &c., Oxf., 1753, 4to, 1763, 2 vols. 8vo. In Latin, et cum Notis Joannis Davidis Michaelis, Goet., 1758 et 1770, 2 vols. 8vo, Oxf., 1775, 8vo. Cum Notis et epimetris Jo. Da. Michaelis, ex Edit. Em. Frid. Car. Rosenmüller, Oxon., 1810, 2 vols. 8vo, 1821, 8vo.

"The edition of 1821 may be considered as the best, as it includes, besides the additional observations of Professor Michaelis, the further remarks of Rosenmüller, (whose edition appeared at Leipsic in 1815,) Richter, and Weiske. By Lowth's Lectures are reprinted in the thirty-first volume of Cgotinus.—Horne's Lond. Bib., 1839, 171.

In 1787, 2 vols. 8vo, G. Gregory pub. a trans. of Lowth's Prælections, under the title of Lects. on the Sacred Poetry of the Hebrews: trans. from the Latin, with the principal Notes of Prof. Michaelis, and Notes by the editor (Henley) and others, 1787, 2 vols. 8vo; 1816, 2 vols. 8vo; 4th ed., 1839, 8vo; 5th ed., 1847, cr. 8vo; 6th ed., 1853, p. 8vo. In consequence of these additions, the English version is of more value than the Latin original. But the student can by no means dispense with Calvin E. Stowe's trans. of the Prælectiones, from the original Latin, with Notes, Andover, Mass., 1829, 8vo. In addition to the Notes of Rosenmüller and Michaelis, Prof. Stowe gives us extracts from the writings of other learned commentators on the subject of the sacred poetry of the Hebrews,—viz.: Sir Wm. Jones, Eichhorn, Gesenius, De Wette, &c. He has also added greatly to the value of his work by original notes.

"He has displayed in the execution of his task much sound judgment and research. All the notes he has selected are of sterling value, and those which are the results of his own investigations exhibit originality and learning."—Rev. A. B. Cheever: N. Amer. Rev., xxxi. 357-379.

To the value of Lowth's great work it is easy to adduce ample testimonies:

"With regard to the transcendent excellencies of the poetical parts of the Old Testament, ample information will be derived from Lowth's Sacred Poetry."—Dr. Doddridge.

"An excellent work, highly interesting to every biblical student."—Dr. Adam Clarke.

"An excellent compendium of all the best rules of taste, and of all the principles of composition, illustrated by the boldest and most exalted specimens of genius (if no higher title be allowed them), which antiquity has transmitted to us."—Dr. G. Gregory.

"It is an elegant and interesting book, though somewhat calculated to lead the mind to admire the poetical beauties of Scripture rather than their spiritual tendency and design. It is not distinguished so much for its philological criticisms as for the felicity of its illustrations. . . Lowth was himself a poet, and deeply versant in the poetry of the Hebrews, as well as in the poetical writers of Greece and Rome."—Horne & Bibl. Info.

"Incomparable Prælections on the Poetry of the Hebrews."—Gibbon, the Historian.

"In this admired work Dr. Lowth has described and illustrated the properties and excellencies of each particular species of that poetry with such admirable taste and skill, with such exuberant richness of imagery, such variety, copiousness, elegance, and redundancy of style, as few writers have equalled in language not their own."—Bishop Porteus.

"The greatest authority on this subject."—Montgomery's Lects. on Gen. Lit., Poetry, &c., Lect. III. 49.

"Many instructive and elegant remarks on the Hebrew language. A delightful work of taste and criticism."—Beckwith's Ed.

"Bishop Lowth prepared the way for a more accurate knowledge of this important part of divine revelation the Prophetical Books by his admirable Prælections and by his annotated translation of the prophecies of Isaiah."—Wilkins's Ed.

"Before the appearance of his volume scarcely any thing had been accomplished in the whole wide range of sacred literature which it occupies. Lowth was fortunate indeed in being the first adventurer in a region so delightful."—E. Cheever, D.D.: N. Amer. Rev., xxxi. 366, 367.

See also Lowndes's Brit. Lib., 16, 98.

Not only at home, but in Germany also, Lowth's Prælections excited a spirit of research in the department to which he was the first to call the attention of the learned world:

"Let no man forget what he was for his own age—how beneficial was his influence upon his contemporaries, that we have become what we are, in part at least, by his aid and that he has helped us forward many steps by his investigations and masterly example."—Eichhorn.

Nor let the reader suppose that Lowth's excellent work is interesting to divines and Orientalists only. The layman, also, may peruse it with delight and instruction.

"If you have not read Bishop Lowth's Prælections on Hebrew Poetry, let me commend its perusal to you. It opened to me, some years ago, quite a new view of the beauties of the prophetical and poetical part of the Old Testament."—Hon. Daniel Webster: Letter to Mr. Fenge, March 27, 1844. Webster's Private Correspondence, Bost., 1857, ii. 186.

The literary history of the Prælectiones, and the controversies connected with its publication, have already come under our notice. See Edwards, Thomas; Hare, Francis, D.D., No 2; Jebb, John, D.D., No. 3. 2. The Life of William of Wykeham, Bishop of Winchester, Lon., 1758-59, 8vo; 1759, 8vo; 1777, 8vo.

"A model in its way."—Lon. Quar. Rev.

"The reflections are sparing, and the style is languid. Even as antiquarian lore there is a dearth of intelligence; but the subject was not suited to the taste, habits, and learning of Lowth."—Dibdin's Lib. Comp.

3. Short Introduction to English Grammar, with Critical Notes, 1763, 8vo. Often reprinted, and formerly used in schools.

"He gave to England the first regular grammar of his native tongue. [?] We are somewhat surprised that Murray's grammar, which is but an enlarged copy of Lowth's, should so generally have occupied its place, and that, too, with little acknowledgment to the individual from whom were derived its plan and most of its materials. Although Lowth's treatise was written so early as the year 1758, yet we doubt whether there is at the present day a single work of equal excellence in the same compass."—G. S. Cheever, D.D.: N. Amer. Rev., xxxi. 377.

—On this subject [study of the English language] the reader ought to peruse Dr. Lowth's Short Introduction to English Grammar, with Critical Notes. . . . Several niceties of the Language are well pointed out."—Blair's Lects. on Rhetoric and Belles-Lettres, Lects. IX. and XII.

Bishop Stock alters Lowth's trans. in some cases in the work entitled Isaiah in Hebrew and English, pub. by the former in 1804, 8vo. Lowth's version is deservedly held in great estimation, though it has not escaped censure for alleged undue freedom with the sacred text.

"A sublime and admirably executed version."—Horne's Bibl. Bib., 1839, 287; where see an account of the controversy elicited by Lowth's translation.

See also Lowndes's Brit. Lib., 181.

"Lowth's Isaiah does honour to our age and nation."—Dr. Beattie.

"No former translator has expressed the meaning and spirit of the evangelical prophet so felicitously as Lowth . . . Lowth is, perhaps, too partial to conjectural criticism and the version is too highly wrought for common use; but it is a valuable specimen of sacred criticism and indispensable to the interpretation of Isaiah."—Orme's Bibl. Bib.

"In this, as in his former work, [Prælectiones &c.] Dr. Lowth has very happily united the most critical judgment with the taste and spirit of poetry."—Gibbon, Int. Act. vam.

"His only fault as a sacred . . . duty . . . of what Archbishop Secker denominated the . . . textual and conjectural emendation . . . of . . . in his work on Isaiah was the only obstacle that prevented . . . attaining the same rank as a classic in sacred literature which has been accorded to the Lectures on the Sacred Poetry of the Hebrews."—G. 6. Lowth's Serms. and other Remains, now first collected and arranged, partly from original MSS.; with an Introductory Memoir by Rev. Peter Hall, Lon., 1834, 8vo.

"A valuable addition to our theological literature."—Lowndes' Remarks.

"There are some valuable things in the volume; but, upon the whole, the publication adds more to the quantity of the bishop's writings than to the quantity of his fame."—British Critic, 1834.

See also Lowndes's Brit. Lib., 897. See Memoirs of the Life and Writings of the late Rt. Lowth, Lon. and Oxf., 1787, 8vo; Hall's Memoir, as above. Dodsley's Annual Register, 1788; Darling's Cyc. We must not omit to notice our author's Ode to the People of Great Britain, 1746, which seems to have been his earliest publication, though he had previously written two poems,—The Genealogy of Christ, since inserted in Pearch's Collections of Poems,—and Culbarnie Hill, 1729.

We are much in want of a uniform ed. of Lowth's Works, and a biography of the learned and excellent author. As a classical scholar, and especially as an elegant Latin poet, it would be difficult to commend Bishop Lowth too highly. The epitaph on his daughter's tombstone is considered to be unsurpassed in sweetness and

"Cara, vale! ingenio præstans, pietate, pudore,
Et pluspuam natæ nomine cara vale!
Cara Maria, vale! At venient felicius ævum,
Quando iterum tecum, sim modo dignus, ero
Cara, redi: lenta tam diram vince, paterque
Ille ego in amplexus, cara Maria redi."

Lowth, Wm. See Batty, Basil.

Lowth, William, D.D., 1661–1732, father of Bishop Robert Lowth, (ante,) a native of London, was educated at Merchant Tailors' School, and at St. John's College, Oxford, (elected, 1675;) Prab of Winchester, 1696; Rector of Buriton, Hants, 1699. He pub. a number of serms., and the following works: 1. A Vindication of the Divine Authority and Inspiration of the Writings of the Old and New Testaments: in answer to [Le Clerc's] Five Letters, Oxf., 1692, sm. 8vo; Lon., 1699, 8vo; 3d ed., with two serms., 1821, 8vo. 2. Directions for the Profitable Reading of the Scriptures, &c., 1708, '12, '26, '84, '99; last ed., 1821, 12mo.

"A very excellent little treatise, and calculated to assist very beneficially in the reading of the word of God. Even those whose acquaintance with the Scriptures is extensive may derive some useful hints from it."—Orme's Bibl. Bib.

3. Comment. on Isaiah, 1714, 4to; Jeremiah, 1718, 4to; on Ezekiel, 1725, 4to; on Daniel and the Minor Prophets, 1726, 4to; all four together, 1727; 2 vols. fol., 1730, fol.; 1739, fol., &c. These Commentaries, which are a continuation of Bishop Patrick's, are pub. with those of Patrick, Whitby, Lawman, and Arnald. This collective ed. has already come under our notice in our articles on Arnald, Richard, q.v.; see also Hammond, Henry, D.D., No. 3. A beautiful ed. of Patrick, Lowth, Arnald, and Whitby's Commentaries, edited by Rev. J. R. Pitman, was pub. in 1822, 6 vols. r. 4to, £6 6s.; fine paper, 24 copies printed, £24. No. should we omit to notice the excellent ed. of Patrick, Lowth, Whitby, Arnald, and Lawman's Commentaries, pub. by Messrs. J. B. Smith & Co., of Philadelphia, 4 vols. imp. 8vo, $20. This ed. contains the Sacred Text placed at the head of each page. Lowth is an excellent commentator.

"Lowth has supplied a judicious commentary in which there are some good critical notes and a fine collection of parallels."—Dr. Dodridge.

"It contains many valuable hints on the prophecies."—Rev. G. Burnett.

"[Of] the . . . [ancient] commentators on the prophets . . . Jerome . . . strictly to the literal sense . . . generally evaporated in his interpretations. . . . The appearance of truth, but the original is . . . and . . . [the] doubts chiefly studied by . . . The following work, it will be seen, has been also highly commended. Kypke, (G. D.,) Observationes Sacræ in Novum Test., Wratislaviæ, 1755, 2 vols. in 1, 8vo.

"Of all the expositors of the New Testament conducted on principles like these, I know of none that are superior, or, indeed, equal, to those of Kypke. They are written without pedantry or ostentation of learning, and contain all that is important without being encumbered with extraneous matter."—Macknight.

Luders, Mrs. Catherine, of Indiana, under the nom de plume of Emily Hermann, has contributed a number of poems to The Literary World (N. York) and other periodicals.

Ludewig, Hermann E., b. at Dresden, Saxony, October 14, 1810, after completing his studies at Leipsic and Gottingen, commenced the practice of the law, devoting his leisure hours to books of travels and bibliographical studies.

In 1837, he published Le Livret des Ana: essai de Catalogue Manuel, Dresden, 12mo, giving a list of the books in Ana, which brought their number to about 400, instead of about 200 which had been collected before by Peignot and Hécart.

In 1840, he gave, in his Zür Bibliothekonomie, Dresden, 8vo, pp. xxx., 41, a sample of the catalogisation of la... public libraries.

In 1844 and '45, he came to this country, travelled for one year and a half in the different States of the Union, and has since settled as a lawyer in New York and become a citizen of the United States.

In 1846, he published (500 copies) The Literature of American Local History, New York, 8vo, pp. 180; and at the same time published, in the Leipsig Serapeum, articles on American Libraries and Bibliography, which were afterwards acknowledged by Prof. Jewett, in his Notes on American Libraries, as the pioneer-sketches on these topics.

In 1848, Mr. L. issued his First Supplement to American Local History, relating entirely to the local history of the State of New York; pub. in N. York Literary World, Feb. 19, and 30 copies printed in pamphlet-form.

In 1854, he communicated to the Société de Géographie of Paris an article entitled De L'Histoire des Aborigènes du Mexique, in which "he advanced some original and peculiar views respecting the origin, migrations, and mutual relations of the Mexican tribes."

A very valuable work by Mr. Ludewig—Literature of American Aboriginal Linguistics, (a list of vocabularies and grammars of over three hundred American Indian languages)—is now (1857) in the course of publication in London, by Messrs. Nicolaus Trübner & Co., 1 vol. 8vo, about 200 pages. This desirable volume (containing 345 articles) will be enriched by additions from the learned pen of Mr. Nicolaus Trübner, well known as a scholar as well as a publisher. As the first attempt to arrange the materials for a study of American aboriginal languages, this work will be indispensable to the comparative philologist. (See DUPONCEAU, PETER S.) It will form vol. i. of Trübner's Bibliotheca-Glottica,—the carrying-out of a plan suggested in 1804 by C. G. von Murr, in his prospectus of a Bibliotheca-Glottica,—that is, a list of all the grammars and vocabularies of the world, written and published. See Lon. Athenæum, Jan. 1857, 136, 156.

We regret to add to the above (alas! how frequent are our post-mortem memoranda in this Dictionary!) that all hopes of future literary labours on the part of Mr. Ludewig were cut short by his death, Dec. 19, 1856. The author of this Dictionary had urged upon Mr. L. the preparation of an enlarged edit. of his Literature of American Local History, and was not without hopes of success in this suggestion; but this important duty must now devolve upon some one of the Forces, the Murphys, the O'Callaghans, the Felts, the Sargents, or the Drakes, who cultivate this particular field of research. We are glad to observe an interesting biographical sketch of Mr. Ludewig in the (Boston) Historical Magazine for Feb. 1857, v. 1-4; see also the same periodical for April, 1857, 119.

Lunt, George, b. about 1807, at Newburyport, Massachusetts, was educated at Harvard College, subsequently pursued the study of the law, and was admitted to practice in his native town in 1831. After acting as the representative of Newburyport in the State Senate and House of Assembly, Mr. Lunt, in 1848, removed to Boston, and, in the next year, was appointed by President Taylor United States Attorney for the District of Massachusetts. He continued in office until the incoming of the Pierce administration, when he tendered his resignation and resumed private practice. He has pub., in addition to minor productions: 1. "The Age of Gold is a vigorous didactic and satirical poem on the times. It is written in the good old heroic couplet of Dryden and Pope. Mr. Lunt has mastered well the fine movement of this species of verse, which most poets of the present age have deserted for other kinds. This poem contains many excellently-pointed couplets, several finished and brilliant descriptions, and a vein of thought strongly and clearly brought out and weighty in its character."—*N. Amer. Let us ask the reader's attention especially to Mr. Lunt's Autumn Musings, the Jewish Battle-Song, and Pass on, Relentless World.

Lupset, Thomas, 1498-1532, an eminent scholar, educated at Pembroke Hall, Cambridge, and at Paris; Prob. of Salisbury, 1530; pub. several theolog. treatises, &c., 1520-42. His works were pub. 1546, 16mo; 1560, 16mo. See Athen. Oxon.; Tanner; Knight's Life of Collet; Dodd's Ch. Hist.

Lupton, Daniel, pub. several works upon tithes, other theolog. treatises, &c., and the following, by which he is best known: 1. Hist. of the Modern Protestant Divines, &c., trans. from the Latin, Lon., 1637, 8vo, and small 12mo, with 22 portraits: see Churton's Life of Dean Nowell. 2. The Glory of their Times: or, The Lives of the Primitive Fathers, &c., 1640. 8vo, 45 portraits; anon.: very rare. See Granger's Biog. Hist. of Eng; Brit. Bibliographer.

Lupton, Mary Ann. Ada Gresham, Lon., 1853, 3 vols p. 8vo.

Lupton, Thomas, wrote several works against the Papists, &c., and A Thousand Notable Things, Lon., 1586, 4to,—a collection of medical receipts, stories, &c. See Watt's Bibl. Brit.

Lupton, William, D.D., Prob. of Durham, d. 1726, pub. several occasional sermons, 1708-26; and a vol. of his serms. was pub. in 1724, 8vo; 1729, 8vo. Nelson styles his sermons

"A fit model for the preachers of the rising generation."

And they are also commended by Dr. Waterland.

Luttrell, Edward. Gangrene; Memoirs Med., 1792.

Luttrell, Henry, gained some reputation as a poet, and more as a witty and sparkling conversationalist. His principal poetical production—Advice to Julia; A Letter in Rhyme—was pub. in 1820; 3d ed. Letters to Julia, in Rhyme, with Lines written at Ampthill Park, 2d ed., 1822, p. 8vo.

"His Advice to Julia is pointed, witty, and full of observation, showing in every line a knowledge of society, and a tact rarely met with."—Lord Byron's Conversations with the Countess of Blessington, q. v.

"Read Letters to Julia—said to be by Mr. Luttrell. Very witty and sparkling—more French than English, though hudibrastic in the measure and manner. Rather too witty, and the wisdom rather facile, but the production of an able mind, and belonging to a highly civilized and cultivated and not bad state of society."—Pantfidio of a Man of the World: Lon. Gent. Mag., 1845, Pt. 2, 578.

"The Advice to Julia is the longest—but, to my mind, the worst—of Mr. Luttrell's poems. The verses on Ampthill Park, and on Rogers's Seat at Holland House, are full of ingenious thought and lively and happy expression."—Moore's Memoirs, &c., Lon., 1853, vol. ii. 300, n.; and see Index, vol. viii., for many notices of Luttrell.

"He is a poet of very exquisite powers."—Blackw. Mag., vii. 520-527, q. v.

"One of the most accomplished men in all England, a wit and a scholar."—Tickler, in Noctes Ambros., April, 1827: Blackw. Mag., xxi. 456.

"He is a most agreeable member of society, the best mayor of good things and the most epigrammatic conversationalist I ever met."—Lord Byron: ubi supra.

"Few men were better known, thirty years ago, in the world of fashion, than Henry Luttrell. The best man to make the table pleasant, to bring smiles to hostesses' lips, to restore the lost thread of conversation, to say good things as no other man could attempt, and to render mediocre stories to better style than anybody else."—Irish Quar. Rev., Sept. 1853, 662-665, q. v.

Luttrell, Narcissus, d. 1732, of the ancient family of the Luttrells of Dunstar Castle, Somersetshire, was noted, in his lifetime, for his passion for book-collecting, and has become known to the present generation by his Brief Historical Relation of State Affairs, from September, 1678, to April, 1714, Oxford Univ. Press, 1857, 6 vols. 8vo, with a copious Index. Printed from the original MSS., in 17 vols. sm. 4to, in the Library of All Souls' College. For the publication of this work we are indebted to Lord Macaulay's many references to it in his recently, published History of England, vols. iii. and iv. This "valuable manuscript," as Lord Macaulay justly terms it, is thought by some readers to make a very dry book:

"From what had been said we were induced to believe that, like the Diaries of Pepys and Evelyn, the Diary of Narcissus Luttrell would, when fully brought to light, clear up many passages of history otherwise obscure, and, taking us behind the scenes, show us the actors divested of buckram and tinsel, and without those trappings which modern writers had invested them with. But this expectation has not been realised. The volumes contain more than four thousand pages of what the editor—if there be one—terms 'a brief relation of state affairs,' but which 'brief relations,' from the way they are jumbled together in the same page, remind us very forcibly of the Stoke-Pogis shoplist, which contained a goodly assortment of Bibles, bear's grease, pickles, poetry, godly books, and gimlets."—Lon. Gent. Mag., June, 1857, 694-698, q. v.

"When we speak of the Diary of Narcissus Luttrell let us at once warn our readers from expecting much. They will, in such case, be sorely disappointed. There is nothing in it of the delectable conceit of Coryat. . . . We cannot, however, dismiss Narcissus Luttrell without the acknowledgment that he has, by his industry and perseverance, rendered some service to those engaged in historical inquiries. . . . There is in him no charming trace of 'that spotless wit

That heals the folly which it deigns to hit;'

but he, nevertheless, may be studied with profit, if not with pleasure."—Lon. Athen., May 16, 1857, 621-624, q. v.

"We do not exactly know whether this book of Dr. Lyall's will be thought the best which has yet been published on Russia; but we are pretty certain that no other English writer has either had the same opportunities to make a good one, or shown a better disposition to make use of his advantages. . . . His testimony, we think, may in all cases be safely depended on, even where his opinions are open to objection; and his work, accordingly, seems to us much more valuable for the facts it contains than for the results which it seeks to embody. . . . It contains many curious and entertaining particulars; but it is a great deal too long and too minute. . . . However, there is a great deal of curious reading for curious readers; and the plates with which the work is illustrated and embellished are for the most part very beautiful."—Lord Jeffrey: *Edin. Lydgate, John, a monk of the Benedictine Abbey of Bury St. Edmund's, supposed to have been born about 1373, was ordained a sub-deacon in 1389, a deacon in 1393, a priest in 1397, arrived at his greatest eminence as a poet about 1430, and died, as is supposed, about 1461. After pursuing his studies at Oxford, he travelled in France and Italy; returning home, fraught with all the learning of the Europeans, he opened a school in his monastery, and, when not engaged with his pupils, amused himself by writing poetry. That he did not restrict himself in the use of his pen may be inferred from the fact that Ritson enumerates no less than two hundred and fifty-one of his pieces, and seems to have lost his patience before he finished his catalogue, as he concludes the list by calling him a "voluminous, prosaick, and drivelling monk." See Ritson's Bibliog. Poet., ii. 66-89. His best known works are: 1. The Story of Thebes; printed by Caxton in his ed. of Chaucer. 2. The Fall of Princes, or, Boke of Johan Bochas: 1st ed. by Pynson, 1494, and several eds. since. That printed by John Wayland, large paper, 1558, fol., bound by Clarke, has been recently marked at £8 18s. 6d. in Joseph Lilly's Catalogue.

"This work is not improperly styled a set of tragedies. It is not merely a narrative of men's sentiments in their rank and misfortunes: the plan is precisely dramatic, and partly suggested by the pageants of the times. Every personage is supposed to appear before the poet, and to relate his respective sufferings: and the figures of these spectres are sometimes finely drawn."—Warton: Hist. of Eng. Poet.

At the end is a single leaf, "A Memorial of suche Princes as since the tyme of King Richard the Seconde hau been unfortunate in the realme of England," having at the back "The copy of the Queene's Majesties Letters Patentes, for the printing of Prymers and Manuals of Prayers, &c."

3. The Hystory, Siege, and Dystruccyon of Troye; 1st ed., printed by Pynson, 1513, fol. More correctly printed by Marshe, 1555, sm. fol.

"Warton, in his History of English Poetry, speaks with great praise of this famous old poem, 'for its rich and splendid descriptions of rural beauty,' 'its elegance of sentiment and expression,' 'the strength and spirit of its descriptions of combats,' 'its touches of feudal life and manners and the practices of chivalry,' 'its exhibition of a multitude of Oriental fictions and Arabian traditions,' 'its anecdotes of ancient architecture and dramatic exhibitions,' and, what is more curious, its evident allusion to the circulation of the blood. Copies have been sold as high as £11 11s."

4. The Life and Death of Hector, his most Famous Acts at the Siege of Troy, 1614, fol.

"This modern versification from the heroic couplet into six-line stanzas is generally attributed to T. Heywood: Fuller and other writers, mistaking it for the original, are amazed that the language is so much more intelligible than that of Chaucer."—MS. note by Dr. Farmer in a copy of the above.

Of his minor poems perhaps the London Lyckpenny is one of the best, and is not without value as a picture of London customs in the early part of the fifteenth century. Bishop Percy treats Lydgate with contempt; Ritson ridicules his "cart-loads" of poetical rubbish, and otherwise insults his memory, as we have seen; and Pinkerton considers him very stupid: but, on the other hand, Gray esteemed him highly; Coleridge vindicates his merits; Turner says that he "has been oftener abused than read;" and Warton, the greatest critic of all, with the exception of Gray, devotes to the monk time, space, and commendation:

"On the whole, I am of opinion that Lydgate made considerable addition to those amplifications of our language in which Chaucer, Gower, and Occleve led the way: and that he is the first of our writers whose style is clothed with that perspicuity in which the English phraseology appears this day to an English reader. To enumerate Lydgate's pieces would be to write the catalogue of a little library. No poet seems to have possessed a greater versatility of talent. He moves with equal ease in every mode of composition. . . . His muse was of universal access; and he was not only the poet of his monastery, but of the world in general. . . . His manner is naturally verbose and diffuse. This circumstributed in no small degree to give a clearness and a fluency to his phraseology. For the same reason he is often tedious and languid. His chief excellence is in description—especially where the subject admits of a flowery diction. He is seldom pathetic or animated."—Hist of Eng Poet.

"Occleve and Lydgate, with equal popularity, but with merit incalculably inferior, supported the renown of English poetry after the death of Chaucer."—Sir Walter Scott. Edin. Rev., v. 155.

"After the death of Chaucer, in 1400, a dreary blank of long duration occurs in our annals. The poetry of Hoccleve is wretchedly bad, abounding with pedantry and destitute of all grace or spirit. Lydgate, the monk of Bury, nearly of the same age, prefers doubtless a higher claim to respect. An easy versifier, he seemed to make poetry familiar to the many, and may sometimes please the few. Gray—no light authority—speaks more favourably of Lydgate than either Warton or Ellis, or than the general complexion of his poetry would induce most readers to do. But great poets have often the taste to discern and the candour to acknowledge those beauties which are latent amidst the tedious dulness of their brethren. Lydgate, though probably a man of inferior powers of mind to Gower, has more of the inner qualities of a poet: his lines have sometimes more spirit, more humour, and he describes with more graphic minuteness. But his diffuseness becomes generally feeble and tedious, the attention fails in the school boy stories of Thebes and Troy; and he had not the judgment to select and compress the prose narratives from which he commonly derived his subjects. It seems highly probable that Lydgate would have been a better poet in satire upon his own times, or delineation of their manners—themes which would have gratified us much more than the fate of princes."—Hallam's Lit. Hist. of Europe, 4th ed., 1854, i. 125-126.

Lydiat, Thomas, 1572-1646, a native of Oxfordshire, educated at and Fellow of New College, Oxford, obtained the living of Okerton, where he lived happily enough in the midst of his books, until he was thrown into the King's Bench prison in consequence of his inability to pay some debts for which he had become security to oblige a relation. After his release, through the intervention of Archbishop Usher and Sir William Boswell, who discharged the debt for which he was held captive, he suffered greatly in consequence of his courageous adhesion to Charles I. His unhappy experience has been commemorated by Dr. Johnson in the Vanity of Human Wishes:

"If charms yet flatter, once again attend:
Hear Lydiat's life, and Galileo's end."

He was a man of profound learning, and pub. several chronological and astronomical works, in the first of which—Tractatus de variis Annorum formis, &c., Lon., 1605, 8vo—he attacked several of the positions of the renowned Scaliger. The latter treated his adversary with great contempt. (see Scalig. Epist., 291;) but Lydiat, nothing daunted, followed up his blows, and in his Defensio Tractatus de Variis Annorum formis, contra Jos. Scaligerum, (1607, 8vo,) and his Emendatio Temporum, (1609, 8vo,) carried the war on the Scaligerian Chronology quite into Africa: so, at least, thought Usher, if Wood is to be credited. His Canones Chronologici was pub. at Oxford, 1676, 8vo. To Wood's Athen. Oxon., the Gen. Dict., Usher's Life and Letters, Fuller's Worthies, and Hallam's Lit. Hist. of Europe, we must refer the reader who desires to know more of this eminent scholar and loyal subject.

"He was a person of small stature, yet of great parts, and of a public soul; and, though a poor and contemptible priest to look upon (for so he was held by the vulgar,) yet he not only puzzled Christ. Clavius, and the whole college of mathematicians, but also that Goliath of literature, Joseph Scaliger,—who, when he was worsted by our author's writings (though he would never acknowledge it, howbeit great men, particularly the famous Usher, held it for granted,) he betook himself unmanly to his tongue, by calling him, in a scornful manner, a beggarly, beardless, and gelt priest."—Wood: Athen Oxon., Bliss's ed., iii. 187.

"Learned men of unbiassed judgment will maintain that Lydgate had the best in that contest, but here it came to pass what Solomon had long before observed:—Nevertheless the poor man's wisdom is despised, and his words are not heard."—Fuller's Worthies, ed. 1840, iii. 22.

Doubtless the reader feels some curiosity to read the complimentary remarks which Scaliger lavishes upon his opponent:

"Ante aliquot dies tibi scripsi, ut scirem ex te quis sit Thomas Lydiat iste, quo monstro nullum portentosius in ventre Anglus natum puto; tanta est insania hominis et confidentia. Nescio quidem illi verum dicere an scire. . . . Non est similis morbo in orbe terrarum. Pauris asinitatem ejus perstringam ut lector rideat. Nam in tam prodigiosè imperitum scarabæum scribere, neque necessitatis est, neque otii."—Scalig. Epist., 291.

Lye, Edward, 1694-1767, a native of Totnes, Devonshire, educated at Hertford College, Oxford, took holy orders in 1719, was presented to the living of Haughton-Parva, Northamptonshire, which he exchanged for that of Yardley Hastings, and devoted his leisure hours to the cultivation of Anglo Saxon literature. In 1743 he printed, from the MS. in the Bodleian Library, the Etymologicum Anglicanum of Francis Junius, (fol.) to which he prefixed an Anglo-Saxon Grammar, and prolegomena. He next gave to the world (with a Gothic Grammar prefixed) Sacrorum Evangeliorum, Versio Gothica, 1750, 4to, (prepared for the press by Eric Benzel, Archbishop of Upsal,) and after this laboured with great assiduity, until his death, on his Dictionarium Saxonico et Gothico-Latinum, accedunt Fragmenta Versionis Ulphilanæ, which was completed by his friend the Rev. Owen Manning, and pub. five years after Lye's death, in 1772, 2 vols. fol. A grammar of both languages is prefixed. A leading feature in this work is the exhibition of the Gothic equivalents. This valuable Dictionary is now worth about the price at which it was published, £3 3s. For a further account of Mr. Lye, see Nichols's Lit. Anec., vol. ix. 751-753. See also Horne's Bibl. Lyell, Charles, 1767-1849, a native of Forfar, Scotland, an eminent scholar and distinguished botanist, educated at the College of St. Andrew's and at the University of Cambridge, is known to the literary world by a translation of the lyrical poems of Dante, and an essay on The Anti-Papal Spirit of Dante. His collection of the various edits. of Dante and his commentators excited the wonder and admiration of bibliographers, and his botanical library was equally the delight of naturalists. See Lon. Gent. Mag., Jan. 1850, 90. The genus of plants Lyellia was named after the subject of our notice, (by Mr. Robert Brown and Sir W. J. Hooker,) and Professor Lindley dedicated works to the same gentleman.

Lyell, Sir Charles, b. November 14, 1797, at Kinnordy, Forfarshire, son of the preceding, after completing his education at Exeter College, Oxford, devoted some attention to the study of the law, but soon abandoned Coke and Blackstone for the more congenial pursuit in which he has gained such distinguished reputation. In 1832 he was appointed Professor of Geology in King's College, London, but did not long retain this position; in the same year he was married to the eldest daughter of the late Leonard Horner, Esq.; in 1836, and also in 1850, he was elected President of the Geological Society; in 1848 he was knighted, and in 1855 received the degree of D.C.L. from the University of Oxford. Sir Charles has given to the world the following works: 1. Principles of Geology; or, The Modern Changes of the Earth and its Inhabitants as illustrative of Geology: vol. i., 1830; ii., 1832; iii., 1833. Second eds. of vols. i. and ii. were called for before the appearance of vol. iii. The 3d ed of the whole work was pub. in 1834, 4 vols. 12mo; 4th ed., 1835, 4 vols. 12mo; 5th ed., 1837; 6th ed., 1847, 8vo; 7th ed., 1849, 8vo; 8th ed., 1850, 8vo; 9th ed., 1853, 8vo.

"We cannot but express our obligations to him for the great addition he has made in the present volume to our knowledge of nature and the beneficial influence it is likely to have in communicating a right direction and a philosophical spirit of induction to geological inquiries."—Sir Henry Thomas De La Beche; Lon. Quar. Rev., lxiii. 471–469; review of vol. i.

"It is very interesting and amusing, and should be read by every one who takes an interest in this rising branch of natural history."—Jamieson's Philosophical Journal; notice of vol. i.

"This is a work of no ordinary mind. It bears deeply stamped upon it the impress of talent, knowledge, and research; and, independent of the interesting and important nature of the subject, the depth and general justness of the author's views come to recommended to us by the perspicuous and elegant language in which they are clothed. . . We cannot conclude this notice of the volume without strongly recommending it."—Lon. Athenæum; notice of vol. i.

"No one, twenty years ago, would have conceived it possible that a work on the principles of geology should appear replete with such reasonings as those into which Professor Lyell leads us. This interesting and instructive volume."—Lon. Quar. Rev., xlvii. 106–132; review of vol. i.

"The eloquent Lyell."—Prescott; Hist. of the Conq. of Mexico, 2d ed., Bost., 1850, iii. 357 n.; preface to an extract from vol. ii., 1832, p. 121.

A review of the 3d ed. of the whole work, by Dr Whewell, will be found in the Lon. Quar. Rev., lvi. 406–448, and a review of the 8th ed.—we know not by whom—occurs in the Lon. Quar. Rev., lxxxv. 412–444. We need not say that these papers should be read through, if the reader desire to know what impression the author has made on the mind of his critics. The Principles of Geology was not reviewed in the Edinburgh Review,—and, however, from the want of a due appreciation of the merits of the author: that periodical refers to it, in a review of the Elements of Geology, as "One of the most popular books ever published in England on the principles of that fascinating department of natural science, and certainly one of the most valuable that has appeared since Mr Playfair's well known Illustrations of the Huttonian Theory." Vol. lxix. 406.

"How distinctly the general plan of these volumes (Principles of Geology) is to open up new, interesting and extensive views of the mighty work of creative intelligence! . . . No reader can peruse it without being deeply impressed by the fresh and striking proofs it affords, in every page of the Almighty Power, Wisdom, and Goodness."—Dr Whewell; Lon. Quar. Rev., lvi. 448.

2. Elements of Geology, 1838, 12mo; 2d ed., 1847, 2 vols. 12mo; 3d ed., pub. as A Manual of Elementary Geology, or The Ancient Changes of the Earth and its Inhabitants as illustrated by its Geological Monuments, 1851, 8vo; 4th ed., 1852, 8vo; 5th ed., 1855, 8vo. There has been pub., within a few weeks past, Recent Discoveries in Geology and Palæontology, being a Supp. to the 5th ed. of the Manual of Elementary Geology, April 18, 1857.

"The author has given us a clear and condensed abstract of what he conceived to form the proper Elements of his subject, and has transfused into it not only the result of much reflection but also a great number of facts which to us were new."—Edin. Rev., lxix. 406–466; review of 1st ed.

"None among its votaries has marked each movement more minutely, or weighed its value and purpose more judiciously, than the distinguished author of this Manual. He has indeed done his task well, and both the beginner and the experienced investigator will find his book an invaluable guide and companion."—Lon. Literary Gazette, 1851, 87–88; notice of 5th ed.

"The two works to which we have now referred (The Principles of Geology, and the Elements of Geology) placed our author in the very highest rank of geological writers. Distinguished by the eloquence and vigour of their style, by the extensive knowledge which they display and the grand generalizations which they advocate, these volumes have engrossed the reputation of their author, and raised geology to its present position as one of the most interesting of the inductive sciences."—*North Brit. Many valuable geological papers by Sir Charles Lyell will be found in the Trans. Geolog. Soc.; Proceedings Geolog. Soc.; Trans. of the Brit. Assoc. for the Advancement of Sciences, Brewster's Jour. of Science, Silliman's Amer. Jour. of Science; Reports of the British Assoc. Many of these papers treat of the geological characteristics of various parts of the United States. One of his best productions is a review (in the Lon. Quar. Rev., xxxvi. 437–484) of G. P. Scrope's Memoir on the Geology of Central France. Lon., 1827.

"Mr Buckland, Professor Sedgwick, and Sir Charles Lyell are the most eminent of the new school of geology which has sprung up simultaneously in France and England, and which, by a strict application of the Baconian method of philosophising, has made such rapid revival the secret of its formation entailed by the law of mind, to the remains imbedded in its bosom. A more fascinating inquiry never was presented to the investigation of the philosophermust it derives additional interest to the Christian believer from the confirmation which it affords, at every step, of the Mosaic account of creation, and the truth of Holy Writ."—Sir Archibald Alison, Hist of Europe, 1815–1852, chap. v.

3. Travels in North America, [in 1841–42,] with Geological Observations on the United States, Canada, and Nova Scotia, 1845, 2 vols. p. 8vo; 2d ed., 1855, 2 vols. cr. 8vo.

"These volumes unfold in a narrow compass more of the bright side of the American character and institutions than we have discovered in the p[illegible] of th[illegible]est ardent democrats who have [illegible] the land [illegible]ful, good hu[illegible]s [illegible] own favourable [illegible]. . . copied into the first Liv. Age, viii. 608–612.

Not reviewed in the Lon. Quar. Review; see vol. lxxxv. 483.

"Although, as we have already intimated, only a small part of these volumes is made up from the materials of an ordinary book of travels, yet no such it is now the worse because the author came to inspect Am[illegible]ca rather than American manners. The remarks [illegible] have often [illegible]ere as sensible and discriminating, as evidently the r[illegible]t out by one who possesses that rare knowledge,—how to observ[illegible]—and who thinks (as himself that we only regret that the [illegible]ches are slight and cursory, and are a little provoked when he cuts short his observations upon the current topics of the day and fills [illegible] stopping the chapter stones' again."—N. Amer. Rev., lxi. 498–518.

"Mr Lyell visited America not merely as a man of science or a philosopher, but as a man of sense and of the world, eminently imbued with qualifications to constitute him an astute observer."—Lon. Lit. Gazette.

"We regard the work as one of the best books of travels that has appeared for some years."—Lon. Spectator.

4. A Second Visit to the United States, [in 1845–46,] 1849, 2 vols. p. 8vo; 2d ed., 1850, 2 vols. p. 8vo; 3d ed., 1855, 2 vols. cr. 8vo.

"This is very pleasant, and the same time very instructive, reading. Sir Charles Lyell can[illegible]s, with great ease, liveliness, and rapidity over an infinite variety of subjects religious, scientific, political, social, from the most profound inquiries into the structure of the immense continent of North America, and the institutions, the resources, the destiny of the mighty nation which is spreading over it with such unexampled activity, down to the lightest touches of travelling chat[illegible] and manners. . . Sir Charles Lyell's present volumes will contain[illegible] the interest of the ordinary reader in a much higher degree than his former valuable Tour, which we shame to ourselves for not having reviewed] in this Journal."—Lon. Quar. Rev., lxxvi. 253–254.

"If books were loved like the[illegible]s and good and true books are but as the rarer shells; and two[illegible]gers and travels, having passed on beyond the interest of mere discovery, are to be estimated by those deeper qualities which make civilized nations acquainted with each other. To[illegible]eal judgment and candour are more than all the arts of composition, and true candour is perhaps even more than judgment. Charles Lyell's books upon the inexhaustible field of America distinguished by both these qualities, but more especially by the last, and are worthy therefore to be studied for the real increase of knowledge. They comprise observations upon every thing to that theatre of great experiments which would naturally attract the attention of a liberal and cultivated Englishman possessing those advantages of access and intercourse which were at the command of a man not only eminent in science, but conversant with the best world[illegible] of Europe,—a gentleman by station and a gentleman by nature. We believe these two books of Sir C. Lyell's and Mr Mackay's (The Western World, or, Travels in the United States in 1846–47, 1849, 3 vols. p. 8vo) to be the most comprehensive, as well as impartial, that have been published in [illegible] Sir C. Lyell is by nature and [illegible]ickly resolves [illegible]ring faithful as [illegible]"—Lon. Spectator, xxii. 378–379.

"We know of no books of modern travels so full of agreeable and useful reading, so pregnant with instruction respecting the geology and physical geography of America, and so liberal and candid in their judgments on all the social, political, and religious questions which now everywhere agitate the public mind. There is an object too, how far our author's motive, and hope too high for his grasp. Whatever wrongs the heart of the philanthropist, or excites the zeal of the missionary, or perplexes the genius of the statesman or exercises the intellect of the sage, calls forth all his powers of observation, and rouses all his energies of thought The condition of the criminal and the slave, the educational instruction of the ignorant, the moral and religious training of the people, the amelioration of the condition of the poor, and the equalization of political rights, are all advocated with that earnestness and talent which seldom fail to advance the object at which they aim.'—North Brit Rev, vol xiv

"It is less as a book of travels that the first is to be regarded than as an account of remarkable scenery and natural phenomena, and a picture of manners and society on both these points of view Sir Charles Lyell possessed great advantages He looks at Nature with learned as well as pictorial eyes He not only sees her wonders and her beauties, but he knows their sources and consequences, so that he instructs as well as pleases the mind, and we think this is done most agreeably than on his first journey."—Lon Spectator copied into Liv Age, xxii 179-175

"We take leave of our intelligent and fair-minded author with renewed thanks for the pleasure and instruction we have derived from his book His scientific observations are full of information and entertainment though we cannot always go along with him in his theories but the materials which he has brought together so assist one in forming a correct view of the condition and prospects of various portions of our country, and of the character of the several classes of its inhabitants, as more complete and trustworthy than can be found in any single book of travels in America with which we are acquainted"—Prof Francis Bowen N Amer Rev xxix 527 558

"It is for the learned to compare the facts we have laboriously collected upon the subject, and publish his decided one. We entered upon the sea with elasticity animation, one of the party was sleepy, dull, sluggish, I think he never made a different account.
